(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) Introduction to a wide range of texts drawn from Jerome's Vulgate Bible with focus on understanding the peculiarities of this Hebraizing-Hellenizing Latin within its original historical linguistic context. No knowledge of Greek or Hebrew required. Special emphasis on the Book of Psalms, which will be carefully read, along with modern and ancient Christian commentaries including Augustine's Enarrationes in Psalmos.

CLLA 40027. Medieval Latin Texts

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students who have completed CLLA 20003 or equivalent.) A survey of medieval Latin texts, designed to introduce intermediate students to medieval Latin literature and to help them progress in translation skills.

CLLA 40028. Introduction to Meister Eckhart

(3-0-3)

This course will attempt to introduce Eckhart's thought by reading a selection of his most important Latin works. This close textual study will demonstrate the extent to which Eckhart presents a possibly unique combination of extreme technical exactitude and exegetical flexibility and how, thanks to these skills he is able to develop a radically Neoplatonic (Dionysian) philosophy within the context of Augustinian readings and a methodology responsive to the demands of the Aristotelian or scholastic traditions. Selections will be from works including the "Exposition of Genesis" the book of the "Parables of Genesis," the "Exposition of John," the "Parisian Questions," the "Prologue to the Tripartite Work," and the "Prologue to the Work of Propositions." Although the works to be selected for study are available at least in German, and sometimes also in French or English translations, a reading of knowledge of Latin is essential for this course. Requirements: regular translation exercises (written and oral) and one short oral presentation.

CLLA 40029. Anselm and His Biographer

(3-0-3) Gersh

The course will be of a philosophical-theological, historical, and literary-philological nature. It will also have two more specific aims: (1) to introduce the philosophical work of Anselm of Canterbury, and investigate some of its sources and influences during the Middle Ages; and (2) to pursue Latin readings in works by Anselm himself, and in works by other medieval writers about Anselm. One session of each week will be devoted to Latin reading. Students will be required to prepare a Latin text for oral translation and be prepared to comment on philological issues. Texts will be distributed in advance by the instructor. The second session of the week will be devoted to lectures on Anselm and his milieu by the instructor, although students will be required to make a short oral presentation on a topic of their choice but approved by the instructor toward the end of the semester. Requirement: competence in classical Latin (intermediate or advanced level).

CLLA 40031. Virgil

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course deals with the full corpus of Virgil's poetry, and explores the creative history of Rome's greatest poet through close readings of passages from his pastoral poetry, the Georgics and Eclogues, and his masterpiece the Aeneid. Special attention is given to the settings in which Virgil composed his works, and current and traditional critical interpretations of his poetry are considered.

CLLA 40032. Livy

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course introduces students to the historian Livy through close reading and detailed study of passages from his grand narrative of Rome's history from the founding of the city to the age of Augustus. Aeneas's flight from Troy, Rome's conquest of Italy, and Hannibal's dramatic invasion of Italy across the Alps are some of the stirring topics to which attention is given. Livy's artistic and historical methods, and his position in the emperor Augustus's cultural program are key themes for discussion in the course.

CLLA 40033. Roman Satire

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course introduces students to the genre of satire, a distinctively Roman creation in which poets express reflections on contemporary life and morals grounded in personal experience. Readings from such authors as Lucilius, Horace, Persius, and Juvenal reveal a wide range of literary tone, from the self-deprecating to the brutally acerbic. The relationship of satiric poetry to its social, cultural, and political context is a key theme for discussion in the course.

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course provides an introduction to Seneca's philosophical letters and treatises. Seneca was a stoic, subscribing to a philosophy that emphasized such virtues as self-control and self-sufficiency, for which many upper-class Romans had high regard. Readings from the Moral Epistles and essays such as "On Anger" show how Seneca understood the workings of the soul and how he developed practical strategies for psychological self-management. The role of stoicism in Roman cultural life is an important theme for discussion in the course.

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course in Latin prose literature begins with an introduction to the genre of history-writing in classical antiquity, and examines representative readings from the major Roman historians Sallust, Livy, Tacitus and Ammianus Marcellinus. It concentrates, however, on alternative modes of preserving memory in Latin prose writing, and takes as its primary text the Letters of the younger Pliny, which are studied from two points of view: first as a self-conscious portrait for posterity of a prominent Roman senator of the early Antonine age, and secondly as a set of documents exposing features of Roman social, political, economic, and cultural life. The biographical Lives of the Twelve Caesars by Pliny's contemporary Suetonius are also considered.

CLLA 40041. Ovid

(3-0-3) Bloomer

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills) This advanced course provides an introduction to the poetry of the prolific author Ovid. It explores the creative history of the one writer who can truly be called a poet of the Augustan age through close reading of passages from his love poetry (the Amores and the Ars Amatoria <.i>, a handbook on seduction), his great mythological poem, the Metamorphoses, and the poems written after Ovid was exiled by Augustus to a remote spot on the shores of the Black Sea (the Tristia and Epistulae ex Ponto). Special attention is paid to the contexts in which Ovid composed his works, and current and traditional interpretations of his poetry are considered.

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course introduces students to Latin comic drama. Comic plays were a popular attraction at Roman religious festivals, and Rome produced two outstanding comic writers of completely opposite temperament, the boisterous and broad Plautus, and the wry and elegant Terence. Both continue to influence Western dramatic forms. Readings from Plautus and Terence reveal the conventions of comic drama and its use as a distinctive instrument to reflect upon the concerns of Roman life.

CLLA 40044. The Roman Novel

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course offers close reading and detailed study of excerpts from Petronius' Satyricon and Apuleius' The Golden Ass. Ribald and full of comic adventures, these works have much in common with modern picaresque novels. Petronius's Trimalchio, an ex-slave buffoon, and Apuleius's Lucius, a young aristocrat magically transformed into an ass, are two of Latin literature's most memorable creations. Narrative technique, critical interpretation, and the special perspective on Roman life the works present, are major subjects for discussion in the course.

CLLA 40054. Augustine's Confessions

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This advanced course introduces students to the thought and manner of writing of Augustine through close reading and detailed study of excerpts from his highly self-reflective autobiography, the Confessions. Augustine's extended analysis of his spiritual development combines in a masterful way the language and habits of thought of the Christian tradition with those of classical philosophy and literature. The style of the Confessions, the significance of the work, and its relation to Augustinian thought at large are major topics for discussion in the course.

CLLA 40055. Creation, Time, and City of God in Augustine of Hippo

(3-0-3)

In his youth, Augustine (A.D. 354–430) received an excellent education in the Latin classics, the benefits of which remained with him throughout his life. Later, he also read philosophical writings, and, after his conversion, works by Christian authors. The book he quoted most frequently was the Bible. From his childhood, Augustine was endowed with a most unusual ability to ask awkward questions. Initially targeting his teachers, he later addressed his questions to the authors whose books he read, and to God. His writings, therefore, tend to take a dialogic form where the interlocutors include not only the reader but God, and among human being Cicero, Vergil and other Romans, and also Augustine's Christian contemporaries, including Jerome, Paulinus of Nola, and Count Marcellinus to whom he addressed the City of God. In following these dialogues, we will read not just Augustine's best known writings (Confessions and City of God), but also his commentaries on Genesis, and some of his letters and sermons. The purpose is to arrive at an understanding of Augustine's ideas about creation and time, and about the nature of human society and its goals. We will also ask what can be learnt from Augustine's dialogic and sometimes disputatious way of thinking, explaining, and debating. Almost all of Augustine's writings have been translated into English, but obviously, an ability to read Latin will be most useful.

(3-0-3) Krostenko

This course will examine the phonological, morphological, syntactic, semantic, and stylistic development of the Latin language from Proto-Italic to early medieval Latin. Analysis of sample texts will alternate with discussion of relevant topics, which will include the principles of historical and comparative linguistics, Latin and its sister languages, the creation of the Latin inflectional system, the varieties of classical Latin, the development of Latin poetics and metrics, and the influence of Greek on Latin. Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.

CLLA 40094. Augustan Poets

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) With an initial glance back to Catullus and Lucretius, this course will concentrate on the Roman poets who flourished under the aegis of Augustus. The focus of the course, alongside the basic literary and stylistic marvels of this poetry, will be the poets' use of emotion and its consequent destabilizing effects. We will look at the complexities of the poetry that belongs to this era of social and political upheaval. Our readings in Latin will consist of selections from Catullus and Lucretius, the last three books of Virgil's Aeneid (the whole of which students should know in translation), and readings from Horace's Odes and Propertius's Elegies. We will also look at some modern critical views of Augustan poetry. Students' mastery of the Latin texts, and their ability to speak and write about these, will be evaluated.

CLLA 40095. Ovid's Metamorphoses

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) In this course, we translate and discuss selected passages from the Metamorphoses, Ovid's idiosyncratic poetic history of the world. Topics for our discussions include the spiritual, moral, religious, political, and physical transformations portrayed between the creation story at the beginning and the deification of Caesar at the end of the text; the tension between Ovid's adherence to Roman traditions and his irreverent, sometimes subversive, artistic originality; the poem's narrative techniques, poetic style, and structure; the significance of intertextual allusions to Greek drama, Virgilian epic, and Ovid's own love poetry; the instability of gender; portraits of the poet within the work; and the innumerable faces of love, as presented through characters who are pious, raging with passion, inseparable, violent, infatuated, lovesick, devoted, and much more. Above all, this course aims at clarifying how Ovid's inexhaustible playfulness and delightful wit contributed to shaping a work of both epic grandeur and lyric intimacy that continues to inspire poets, composers, novelists, painters, and at least one playwright whose version recently made it all the way to Broadway. Daily preparation and active participation in class are essential components of the course; brief written assignments, one midterm exam, one brief project, and a final exam also count toward the final grade.

CLLA 40096. Postclassical Satire

(3-0-3)

(Recommended for students with advanced Latin skills.) This survey will begin with introductory readings in classical satire and satiric invective and narrative, and then move on to consider specimens of a variety of late antique and medieval texts written in a satiric mode: satire, invective, parody, mock epic, etc. A sound knowledge of Latin is required. Course requirements include in-class reports, an annotated translation, and an interpretative essay.

CLLA 43555. Augustine: Select Readings

(3-0-3) Mueller

In this course, we will read select passages from Augustine's earliest extant works, the so-called Cassiciacum dialogues. Augustine spent the winter between his conversion (386) and his baptism (Easter 387) at a friend's villa in Cassiciacum near Milan, where he wrote four philosophical works, Contra Academicos, De Beata Vita, De Ordine, and Soliloquia. In choosing the form of the philosophical dialogue, he paid homage to his pagan predecessors, above all Cicero. The influence of pagan philosophy, especially Neoplatonism, is present throughout the dialogues, as is the interest in classical literature and in the liberal arts. The dialogues represent Augustine's first attempt to express and structure his newfound belief (as well as the experience of his conversion), and the views and sentiment expressed in them sometimes widely differ from his later works; yet it is unmistakably Augustine who is speaking. We will discuss the position of the dialogues in the course of Augustine's intellectual development by comparing them to selections from later works (above all, Confessions) and from pagan philosophers (Cicero, Plotinus). Prerequisite: three years of college Latin or by permission of the instructor.

CLLA 47801. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Individual or small group study under the direction of a departmental faculty member.

CLSS 43221. Undergraduate Seminar: Advanced Syriac

(3-0-3)

Syriac is a form of Aramaic that was the literary language of Jews and pagans in Western Asia before becoming the common dialect of Aramaic-speaking Christians in the region. Christianity had its matrix in Judaism, and early literature in Syriac preserves the only surviving sustained evidence of the distinctive character of Aramaic-speaking Christianity that is largely un-Hellenized and that reflects the linguistic and cultural milieu of first-century Palestine. Because of the shared literary culture of Judaism and early Syriac Christianity, examination of the intertextuality of early Syriac literature reveals a deep acquaintance with the thought and culture of Late Second Temple Judaism and the intertestamental period. A full appreciation for the dependence of Syriac literature upon Jewish literary and intellectual models requires an interdisciplinary focus that takes into account a full range of issues; among the most important are hermeneutical questions related to Jewish and Christian interpretations of scripture. Participants in the seminar will investigate a range of questions based on the following: (1) In what sense may particular texts be called Christian (Jewish, Manichaean, Gnostic)? (2) What evidence is there for intertextuality; i.e., to what extent can texts be shown to occupy "the space between" Judaism and Christianity? (3) From what social and cultural milieu did the texts emerge? (4) What evidence do the texts retain of possible oral or non-literary origins? (5) In what sense are the texts literary? Do peculiarities of language, diction, or genre in any way distinguish the texts? Can the texts be shown to be typical of the time and circumstances from which they emerged? (6) How are the texts to be read? Is it enough to evaluate them as historical documents, relating them to the historical circumstances in which they were generated, and the literary culture to which they originally belonged? These questions will be based on a deep reading of Syriac texts.

MEAR 10001. First-Year Arabic I

(4-0-4)

This two-semester sequence of courses is a basic introduction to all aspects of the Arabic language through a comprehensive and integrated method. The focus is on language proficiency in all areas of the language including speaking, reading, and writing. The course also introduces students to aspects of Arabic culture and everyday life in the Middle East. MEAR 10001 is offered each fall semester, and MEAR 10002 is offered each spring semester.

MEAR 10002. First Year Arabic II

(4-0-4) Bualuan; Shahin

Prerequisite: (MEAR 10001 OR MEAR 101)

MEAR 13186. The Arabian Nights and World Literature

(3-0-3)

This course has as its focal point the famous collection of tales, the Thousand and One Nights (better known as the Arabian Nights). We examine issues of provenance. We study the stories as literary texts as well as historical documents. We examine how these tales have been interpreted by later societies. Finally, we use this course to introduce us to the study of the Middle East, its languages, history, literature, and peoples.

MEAR 20003. Second Year Arabic I

(3-0-3) Bualuan; Saadi

Prerequisite: (MEAR 10002 OR MEAR 10101)

This second-year Arabic course builds on the previous two semesters. The emphasis is on speaking and writing for self-expression with continued study of the basic grammatical structures. Proficiency remains the focus through readings and conversations in the language. Students develop skill in the use of the Arabic dictionary.

MEAR 20004. Second-Year Arabic II

(3-0-3) Saadi; Shahin

Prerequisite: (MEAR 20003 OR MEAR 103)

This course is geared to consolidating skills gained in the previous three semesters while enhancing the ability to converse and conduct oneself in Arabic. Reading skills are enhanced by exposure to more sophisticated examples of literature. Original written expression is encouraged through the composition of short essays.

MEAR 30005. Third Year Arabic I

(3-0-3) Saadi

Prerequisite: MEAR 20004

This third-year Arabic course emphasis is on developing listening, speaking, reading, and writing skills in interactive settings. Vocabulary building will be the focus of drills; we will cover basic vocabulary in various authentic uses of the language. Special attention will also be given to media Arabic. Basic Arabic grammar should be completed by the end of the year. We will continue with part 2 of the KITTAAB sequence. Supplementary materials, mainly from Arabic media (BBC Arabic News, newspapers, magazines), will be provided. Tests, both oral and written, will cover the textbook materials, in addition to the basic grammar and the cumulative vocabulary.

MEAR 30006. Third-Year Arabic II

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MEAR 30005 OR MEAR 105 OR MEAR 301 OR MEAR 410)

This third-year Arabic course emphasis is on developing listening, speaking, reading, and writing skills in interactive settings. Vocabulary building will be the focus of drills; we will cover basic vocabulary in various authentic uses of the language. Special attention will also be given to media Arabic. Basic Arabic grammar should be completed by the end of the year. We will continue with Part 2 of the KITTAAB sequence. Supplementary materials, mainly from Arabic media (BBC Arabic News, newspapers, magazines), will be provided. ### MEAR 30007. Media Arabic/Arabic Media

Prerequisite: MEAR 20004

The goal of this course is twofold: It consists of an overview of contemporary Arabic media and an introduction to media Arabic. Simply put: It's a survey course on Arabic media with a language component. In addition to printed texts (newspapers, magazines, journals), a substantial portion of the material, of written, audio, and visual texts, is drawn from major Arabic Internet sites (al-Jazeera, al-Arabiyya, BBC Arabic, etc.) and TV programs. Texts vary according to interests of students. Some suggested topics: the social, political, and institutional context of media production; the role media plays in the present debates in the Arab world of problems like cultural identity; the position of Islam in society, secularism, nationalism, development, illiteracy, women and gender, sexuality, pop culture, etc. Taught in English, with extensive readings and some discussion, in Arabic. The course fulfills the third year Arabic requirement for Arabic majors.

MEAR 32300. Language Across the Curriculum Arabic Discussion Group

(1-0-1)

A 1-credit reading course on reading the Quran in Arabic. Students will develop both their understanding of Arabic grammar and their recitation of the Quran as they discuss the issues raised by the text.

MEAR 40007. Fourth-Year Arabic I

(3-0-3)

MEAR 40007 is designed as a continuation of third-year Arabic for those students who have requested to continue beyond what is required for the major. The syllabus will combine lessons from the textbook Al-Kitaab as well as texts from print and electronic "Media Arabic." The course will lay equal stress on formal (fusha) as well as contemporary Middle East colloquial dialect Arabic (amiyya).

MEAR 40008. Fourth-Year Arabic II

Prerequisite: MEAR 40007

The focus of this course is the integration of formal and spoken Arabic. This is accomplished through a series of readings students prepare in advance of class. Class time is spent conversing in idiomatic Arabic about the text. Arabic media (movies, online resources) are intended to supplement the readings and expand contexts and vocabulary for further interaction in Arabic.

MEAR 47801. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Individual or small group study under the direction of a departmental faculty member.

MEHE 10001. Elementary Hebrew I

(3-0-3) Winitzer

This is a two-semester introductory course in biblical Hebrew; under normal circumstances, the student must complete the first to enroll in the second. The fall semester will be devoted to learning the grammar of biblical Hebrew. The spring semester will be divided into two parts. For the first six weeks, we will finish and review the grammar. In the remaining part of the course, we will read and translate texts from the Hebrew Bible, Qumran, and Rabbinic literature. The course will focus on developing reading and comprehension skills in biblical Hebrew through the study of biblical texts. In addition, students will learn how to use reference grammars, concordances, and apparatus to the Biblia Hebraica. The course encourages students to think about the grammatical forms and their implications for biblical interpretation.

MEHE 10002. Elementary Hebrew II

(3-0-3) Winitzer

Prerequisite: (MEHE 10001 OR MEHE 481)

MELC 10101. Introduction to Arabic Culture and Civilization

(3-0-3) Bualwan

This course is an introductory survey of Arabic culture and civilization from the pre-Islamic era to the conquest of Constantinople in 1453. The course will trace the origins of the Arab people and their distinctive culture and literature. The revelation of the Qur'an to the Prophet Muhammad and subsequent development of Islam will be treated in detail. Following this, the course will focus on the spread of Islamic civilization, its interactions with other cultures, and its contributions to scholarship in the areas of literature, art, and architecture.

MELC 13186. Literature University Seminar in English

(3-0-3)

Introduces first-year students to the study of classical literature on a comparative basis, with readings from Greco-Roman and Arabic literature.

MELC 20010. Arabic Fiction in Translation

(3-0-3)

The object of this course is to introduce the student to Arabic literature—a major world literature that remains largely unexplored in the West—from its beginning to the present. The course will read and discuss, in a seminar context and from a comparative perspective, key works of medieval Arabic narrative prose, the Arabian Nights and the Maqamat, and selected works of modern Arabic fiction by the Nobel laureate Naguib Mahfouz (Egypt), among others. There will also be several screenings of the film adaptations. Some of the issues to be discussed are: the influence of the Arabian Nights in Western literature, representation and interpretation, and literary compositional strategies in "domesticating" an "imported" genre—fiction—used by modern Arab writers.

MELC 20020. Revelation to Revolution: Arabic Literature in a Global Context

(3-0-3)

This basic introduction to Arabic literature links the phenomenon of "literature" to the larger world of Islamic studies. The course emphasizes connections between Arabic literature, the classics, and contemporary Western literary tradition from a broadly comparative perspective. Topics include early Arabic mytho-poetics; the idea of scripture; philosophy, science, and the Renaissance; the literature of empire; and Arab Spain. No knowledge of Arabic is required.

MELC 20040. Islamic Societies of the Middle East and North Africa: Religion, History, and Culture

(3-0-3)

This course is an introductory survey of the Islamic societies of the Middle East and North Africa from their origins to the present day. It will deal with the history and expansion of Islam, both as a world religion and civilization, from its birth in the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century to its subsequent spread to other parts of Western Asia and North Africa. Issues of religious and social ethics, political governance, gender, social relations and cultural practices will be explored in relation to a number of Muslim societies in the region, such as in Egypt, Morocco, and Iran. The course foregrounds the diversity and complexities present in a critical area of what we call the Islamic world today.

MELC 20050. The Ancient Middle East

(3-0-3)

Discover the origins of human civilization, the first written language, and the myths that revolutionized religion. This is an introduction to the civilizations of Mesopotamia that formed the basis of the way we think, see reality, believe, and express ourselves today. Topics include Sumerians, Akkadians, and Babylonians; Phoenicians, Aramaic, and the beginnings of law, literature, and legend.

MELC 20060. Islam: Religion and Culture

(3-0-3)

This course will discuss the rise of Islam in the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century of the Common Era and its subsequent establishment as a major world religion and civilization. Lectures and readings will deal with the life of the Prophet Muhammad, the Qur'an and its role in worship and society, early Islamic history, community formation, law and religious practices, theology, mysticism, and literature. Emphasis will be on the core beliefs and institutions of Islam and on its religious and political thought from its formative period until our own time. The latter part of the course will deal with resurgent trends within Islam, both in their reformist and extremist forms, and contemporary Muslim engagements with modernity. We will also discuss the spread of Islam to the West and increasing attention focused on "political Islam" or "Islamism" today. All readings are in English translation.

MELC 20070. Introduction to Islamic Civilization

(3-0-3) Guo

This course is designed to introduce students to Islamic civilization and Muslim culture and societies. The course will cover the foundations of Islamic belief, worship, and institutions, along with the evolution of sacred law (al-shari'a) and theology, as well as various aspects of intellectual activities. The Koran and the life of the Prophet Muhammad will be examined in detail. Both Sunni and Shi'i perspectives will be considered. Major Sufi personalities will be discussed to illuminate the mystical, and popular, tradition in Islam. Topics on arts, architecture, literary culture, and sciences will be covered. Although the course is concerned more with the history of ideas than with modern Islam as such, it has great relevance for understanding contemporary Muslim attitudes and political, social, and cultural trends in the Muslim world today. MME minor will need to secure an override from the department office to register.

MELC 20080. Women in Islamic Societies

(3-0-3) Afsaruddin

This course is a broad survey of women's and gender issues in various Islamic societies, with a focus on the Arab Middle East. The first half of the semester will concentrate on the historical position of women in Islamic societies, defined by the normative values of Islam and by cultural traditions and norms. We will discuss how the interpretations of these values in diverse circumstances and who gets to do the interpreting have had an important impact on women's societal roles. The second half of the course will privilege women's voices and agency in articulating their gendered identities and roles in a number of pre-modern and modern Islamic societies. Our sources for discovering these voices are women's memoirs, fiction, magazine articles, and public speeches. We will also focus on how historical phenomena such as Western colonialism, nationalist liberation movements, and civil and other forms of war have given rise to women's organized movements and a feminist socio-political consciousness in many cases.

MELC 20150. Contemporary Political Islam

(3-0-3) Shahin

This course is designed to provide students with an understanding of the phenomenon of political Islam in the Arab and Muslim worlds. It examines the reasons, implications, and consequences of the reassertion of Islam in today's politics. The first part of the course provides a thorough analysis of the Islamic order and the model(s) that inspires modern Islamist activists. The second part critically examines the ideas of the main ideologues of contemporary Islamic movements. The third part discusses the approaches to the understanding of contemporary political Islam and the Islamic movements and presents cases studies of mainstream and radical Islamic movements in a number of Arab and Muslim countries. Finally, the course concludes with a critical analysis of the future of political Islam and its relations with the West.

MELC 30030. Love, Death, and Exile in Arabic Literature and Cinema

(3-0-3) Guo

This course explores literary and artistic presentation of the themes of "love, death, and exile" in Arabic literature and popular culture from pre-Islamic era to the present day. Through close readings of Arabic poetry, essays, short stories, and novels (in English translation), and analyzing a number of Arabic movies (with English subtitles), we discuss the following issues: themes and genres of classical Arabic love poetry; gender, eroticism, and sexuality in Arabic literary discourse; alienation, fatalism, and the motif of Al-Hanin Ila Al-Watan (nostalgia for one's homeland) in modern Arabic poetry and fiction. Mediterranean Middle East minors should contact the department to obtain an override.

MELC 30035. Medieval Middle East

(3-0-3)

This course offers a survey of Middle Eastern history from the rise of Islam in the seventh century C.E. until the rise of Mongol successor polities in the 15th century. The course is structured to cover political and cultural developments and their relationship with broader changes in society during the formative centuries of Islamic civilization. Specific topics include the career of the Prophet Muhammad and the origins of the earliest Muslim polity; the creation and breakup of the Islamic unitary state (the Caliphate); the impact of Turkic migrations on the Middle East; social practices surrounding the transmission of learning in the Middle Ages; the diversity of approaches to Muslim piety and their social and political expression; popular culture; non-Muslims in Islamic society; and the creation of the medieval Islamic "international" cultural order. Among the more important themes will be long-term cultural and social continuities with the Islamic and ancient Near East, and concepts of religious and political authority.

MELC 30040. Christianity in the Middle East

(3-0-3)

The spread of Christianity from Palestine to the West is well documented. Less well known is the development of Christianity in the lands of its origin, the Middle East. This course introduces students to the largely untold story of Christianity that expresses itself in the native Aramaic language and culture of the Semitic East. Topics include the origins of the indigenous Christian churches of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Armenia, Iraq, and Iran. The development of these traditions will be viewed in relation to Western/European forms of Christianity that have come to dominate and that are viewed as "mainstream" and "normative." The course concludes with an assessment of the impact of religious "fundamentalisms," the diaspora of Middle Eastern Christians throughout Europe and the United States, and the contemporary state of Christianity in the Middle East.

MELC 30050. Canon and Literature of Islam

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to the fundamental religious texts and literature of Islam. The list includes the Qur'an (the central, sacred scripture of Islam), the hadith (record of the speech and actions of the Prophet Muhammad), biography of the Prophet, exegetical literature, historical texts, and mystical and devotional literature. Students will read primary texts in English translation with a focused discussion and analysis of form, content, historical background, religious significance, and literary allusions of the various texts. Themes such as "the unity and majesty of God"; "prophecy and revelation"; "good and evil"; and "this world and the hereafter" will be dealt with in the lectures and conversation in class. The course lays heavy emphasis on class discussion and student preparedness.

MELC 30060. Historical Survey of the Arab Middle East

(3-0-3) Amar

This course will chart the history of the Arab Middle East from the formative period of the emergence of Islam in the seventh century through the fall of Constantinople in 1453 and the creation of the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Intended to be broad in its coverage and comprehensive in its scope, the course will introduce students to the social, cultural, and religious crosscurrents that came to define the Arab life and culture in the region.

(3-0-3)

Islam and its compatibility with modernity is a much-debated issue in the contemporary period. The course will engage this timely topic and discuss the most important “hot-button” issues involved in these debates: political Islam, democracy, pluralism, rights of women, and secularism. The historical contexts that provide the backdrop for the range of responses to the phenomenon of modernity and its attendant issues will also receive attention. What internal resources exist within Islamic thought that are being drawn upon by modernists to make a strong case for an essential compatibility between Islam and democracy, for example? Is democracy (or Islam, for that matter) a monolithic concept? Students will be expected to actively take part in discussions centered on such questions, the assigned readings, and class lectures. Prior exposure to at least one class on Islam or the Middle East is strongly recommended.

(3-0-3)

This course will be a survey examination of ethnographic work on the Muslim world appropriate for students with all levels of background in anthropology and Islam. The course will look at the Muslim world broadly defined, including ethnographic work on the Middle East, Central Asia, South Asia, Southeast Asia, Europe, Africa, and North America. The course will consider many aspects of life in Muslim societies, not just religion, including trade, travel, identity, literature, and politics. Because of its relevance to current events, a significant portion of the course will deal with gender relations and constructions of masculinity/femininity in the Muslim context. We will consider such questions as the impact of religion on gender relations, negotiations between textual traditions and “popular” traditions in determining gender relations, and the circumstances in which gender constructions in the Muslim world attract attention from the “West.” The aim of this course is to give students an understanding of a wide array of approaches to ethnography. Lectures and supplementary reading material will situate the central texts in the dominant theories and assumptions of the discipline.

MELC 30159. Israeli-Palestine Conflict

This class discusses the roots, evolution, current situation and prospects of resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In order to better understand this theme, the class will also locate this conflict in larger regional and global perspectives. Thus, issues such as nationalism in the Middle East, colonial impact in the region, the Arab states and their involvement in the conflict, Cold War and post-Cold War dynamics, will all be an integral part of the class discussions. We will also juxtapose the competing narratives of Israelis and Palestinians towards this conflict. Finally, we will engage in an un-historical practice by looking at the future and thinking about possible avenues for concluding this protracted conflict.

MELC 30160. Middle East and the West

(3-0-3)

This course explores the complicated relationships between the Middle East and the Western world as they evolved over the past several centuries.

MELC 30392. Diplomacy and Conflict in the Middle East

(3-0-3)Bligh

This course examines the role of diplomacy in shaping the Middle East and in managing conflict in the region today.

MELC 30522. Politics and Democratization in Middle Eastern and North Africa Monarchies

(3-0-3)

This course examines the politics of monarchies in the Middle East and North Africa. The course examines how these regimes developed and their effect on politics in these regions, and explores the prospect for democratization in such countries.

MELC 30800. Muhammad and the Qur’an

(3-0-3)

Islamic law, theology, and spirituality are all derived primarily from the Qur’an and the practice (sunna) of the messenger and exemplar Muhammad. This course provides students with an in-depth introduction to these twin foundations of the Islamic religious tradition. Students will read a comprehensive biography (sira) of Muhammad based on the earliest sources. Students will also read selections from the Qur’an, contextualized within the narrative of Muhammad’s prophetic career. In addition to familiarizing students with the traditional narrative of Muhammad’s life and the style, content, and structure of the Qur’an, this course also explores contemporary questions and debates in the historical-critical study of Islamic origins.

MELC 46801. Directed Readings

(3-0-3)

Individual or small group study under the direction of a faculty member. Permission of the department required.

MELC 47801. Special Studies

(3-0-3)

Individual or small group study under the direction of a faculty member.

Economics

ECON 10010. Principles of Microeconomics

(3-0-3)

An introduction to economics, with particular attention to the pricing mechanism, competitive and monopolistic markets, government regulation of the economy, labor-management relations and programs, income determination and public policy, and trade and the international economy.

ECON 10011. Principles of Microeconomics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MATH 10240 OR MATH 10250 OR MATH 10350 OR MATH 10550 OR MATH 10850)

An introduction to economics, with particular attention to the pricing mechanism, competitive and monopolistic markets, government regulation of the economy, labor-management relations and programs, income determination and public policy, and trade and the international economy.

ECON 10020. Principles of Macroeconomics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

A continuation of introduction to economics with emphasis on the measurement of national economic performance, alternative explanations of short-run economic fluctuations and long-run economic growth, money and credit, and fiscal and monetary policy.

ECON 13181. Social Science University Seminar

(3-0-3) Jensen, Leahy

Economics sections will deal with different aspects of economic analysis and policy issues. The focus will be on understanding how economists think about theoretical issues and how they apply their analytical tools to real-world economic problems and policies. No background in economics is assumed.

ECON 13191. Honors Seminar

Prerequisite: ALHN 13950

The primary lesson of economics is that incentives matter: Economic agents alter their behavior in predictable ways when faced with changing costs and benefits. Over the past 30 years, the power of economics as a predictive social science has been demonstrated time and time again as scholars have shown that seemingly uneconomic decisions can be modeled from an economic perspective. In this seminar, we will use academic readings and popular books such as Freakonomics to indicate the breadth and scope of questions that can be analyzed from an economic perspective. A sample of topics that will be covered include why AIDS is more prevalent in Africa than in the United States, how to efficiently combat global warming, the theory behind nuclear deterrence strategies, why obesity is on the rise, and why there is cheating in sumo wrestling.

ECON 20010. Principles of Microeconomics

(3-0-3)

An introduction to economics, with particular attention to the pricing mechanism, competitive and monopolistic markets, government regulation of the economy, labor-management relations and programs, income determination and public policy, and trade and the international economy.

ECON 20011. Principles of Microeconomics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MATH 10240 OR MATH 10250 OR MATH 10350 OR MATH 10550 OR MATH 10850)

An introduction to economics, with particular attention to the pricing mechanism, competitive and monopolistic markets, government regulation of the economy, labor-management relations and programs, income determination and public policy, and trade and the international economy.

ECON 20020. Principles of Macroeconomics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

A continuation of introduction to economics with emphasis on the measurement of national economic performance, alternative explanations of short-run economic fluctuations and long-run economic growth, money and credit, and fiscal and monetary policy.

ECON 20290. Alternative Approaches to the Firm

(1-0-1) Warlick

This course examines contemporary economic issues related to the firm—including globalization, trade, labor, and the environment—from multiple perspectives through film, student-led discussion, and guest lecturers. The class facilitates a broader understanding of economics and its interrelatedness with the global issues confronting society. Students will gain familiarity with important resources that increase their critical engagement with economics and in the process develop a learning community committed to incorporating these issues into their economics education.

ECON 20501. Poverty in Rural America

(1-0-1)

This one-credit course examines poverty in rural America to determine in what ways it is similar and in what ways it is distinct from poverty in urban American settings.

ECON 20502. Poverty and the Bishop's Pastoral Letter

(1-0-1)

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011)

This class is designed to rewrite the poverty section of Chapter 3 in the Bishops' 1986 letter, "Economic Justice for All." There will be hearings with groups of economists, theologians, community activists, et al. The idea is to simulate the process the bishops went through in writing the original document and to update the material in light of changes in the economy over the past 23 years. Each student will prepare a paper (8–10 pp.) that rewrites the poverty section.

ECON 20503. Wal-Mart: Structure, Behavior, and Performance

(1-0-1)

Wal-Mart has greater sales revenue and more employees than any other corporation in the world. As such, it is both a determinant of and a window on the way that Americans shop and work in the New Economy. This course examines how Wal-Mart is structured, how it behaves, and how it performs compared with other dominant firms now and in the past. Wal-Mart says it gives us low prices every day; its critics say it does so, but at too high a price in social costs. Who is right?

ECON 20504. Distributivism: Economics of the Catholic Worker Movement

(1-0-1)

This course seeks to understand "Distributivism," an approach to economics based upon the medieval guilds and developed by G.K. Chesterton, Hilaire Belloc, and Arthur Penty, among others. It was embraced by Dorothy Day, Peter Maurin, and the Catholic Worker Movement.

ECON 20505. Markets and Morals

(1-0-1) Wilber

This class is designed to investigate questions such as: Do markets need ethical standards? Do markets make us moral? Should a market for transplant organs be allowed? What should we think about sweatshops?

ECON 23210. Economics and Ethics

(1-0-1)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 20210. This course will focus on the interaction between ethics and economics, both in economic theory and economic policy. There are three ways in which ethics are important in economics: (1)

Economists have ethical values that help shape the way they do economics. (2) Economic actors have ethical values that help shape their behavior. (3) Economic institutions and policies impact people differentially, and thus ethical evaluations must be applied in addition to economic evaluations.

ECON 30010. Intermediate Economic Theory—Micro

(3-0-3) Betson, Gresik

Prerequisites: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20020)

An examination of the language and analytical tools of microeconomics, emphasizing the functional relationship between the factor and product markets and resource allocation.

ECON 30020. Intermediate Economic Theory—Macro

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20020)

An intensive examination of macroeconomics with particular reference to the determination of economic growth, national income, employment, and the general price level.

ECON 30200. Introduction to Political Economy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ((ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011)) OR ((ECON 20020))

The course is an introduction to the “other” side of economics: heterodox economics or political economy. Political economy perspectives include Marxian, Post Keynesian, radical, institutionalist, feminist, and other approaches. The course will also investigate the theoretical and social consequences of different approaches and how policies and institutional changes that promote social justice and human dignity can be formulated in our current economic environment.

ECON 30220. Marxian Economics

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

An introduction to Marxian economic analysis. Topics include the differences between mainstream and Marxian economics, general philosophy, and methodology; Marxian value theory; and critical appraisals and current relevance of Marx’s “critique of political economy.”

ECON 30260. Political Economy of Development

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ((ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021)) OR ((ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR (ECON 20020))

The course is divided into two parts. The first part provides an overview of the institutional and empirical features of the developing world, followed by a survey and critical evaluation of the conventional development theories. The second part looks into the selected topics evoking the critical, controversial stakes in Third World development debates today. The topics include; rent-seeking activities, land tenure and peasantry, micro-financing, corporate governance, failed state and market failure, market and democracy, income-distribution and poverty, feminism in development, ethnic conflicts in resource use, and population pressures. The approach taken in this course is a political-economy perspective with references to the historical, cross-cultural, and empirical materials. The course aims at providing the students with intellectual spaces for alternative development paradigms and strategies. Where appropriate, the tools used in economic analysis will be reviewed at an elementary and accessible level.

ECON 30330. Statistics for Economics

(3-0-3) Betson

This course seeks to introduce the student to the principles of probability and statistical theory appropriate for the study of economics. The emphasis of the course will be on hypothesis testing and regression analysis.

ECON 30331. Econometrics

(3-0-3) Buckles, Lugauer

Prerequisite: (ECON 30330 OR BAMG 20100)

Provides students with an understanding of when and how to use basic econometric methods in their work as an economists, including the ability to recognize which econometric technique is appropriate in a given situation as well as what explicit and implicit assumptions are being made using the method. Topics covered include estimation and hypothesis testing using basic regression analysis, problems with basic regression analysis, alternative econometric methods, limited dependent variables, and simultaneous equation models.

ECON 30400. Labor Economics

Prerequisites: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20010)

A survey course covering the economics of employment and unemployment; wages and income distribution; poverty, education, and discrimination; unions and labor and industrial relations systems; and comparative labor systems.

ECON 30460. Economics of Gender and Ethnic Discrimination

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

Women and ethnic minorities have the lowest incomes, worst jobs, and highest levels of unemployment and poverty in the United States today. This course examines the role of racism and sexism in the U.S. economy.

ECON 30490. Economics of Aging

Prerequisite: ((ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR (ECON 20020))

The course covers how the risks of work and the conflict between labor and capital have been handled by welfare capitalism and government policy. We will pay attention to worker response and demands in retirement security—a touchstone for the debate on security and risk. We are concerned with how labor force institutions will respond in the next century given the aging of the workforce. We look especially at two issues: the emergence of women workers into a more secure labor market, and the debate about Social Security reform and privatization. We also examine issues of intergenerational equity. This is an ambitious class mixing current policy issues with history and economic theory.

ECON 30500. Introduction to Poverty Studies

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ((ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR (ECON 20020))

An examination of the extent and causes of poverty in the United States. The current system of government programs to combat poverty is analyzed. Reforms of this system are also considered.

ECON 30530. Environmental Economics

(3-0-3) Jensen

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

An analysis of the welfare economics of environmental problems, emphasizing market failures due to negative environmental externalities. Air, water, and land pollution are classic examples of these externalities, which occur when third parties bear costs resulting from the transactions of the two primary market participants. The theory and practice of environmental policy to promote efficiency at the U.S. local, state, and federal levels and in other countries is explored. International problems such as transboundary pollution and global warming are also studied.

ECON 30800. Development Economics

(3-0-3) Ros

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

The current problems of Third World countries are analyzed in a historical context, with attention given to competing theoretical explanations and policy prescriptions. The course will combine the study of the experiences of Latin American, African, and Asian countries with the use of the analytical tools of economics.

ECON 30810. Regional Economic Development

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

The course looks at the spatial dimensions of economics with major emphasis on where economic activity takes place and why. Theories and methods of regional analysis and regional programs will be stressed with reference to selected regions in the United States and elsewhere. A major part of this class will be a major research project, paper and presentations by students on a selected region. Research presentations and discussions will be a regular feature of the class.

ECON 30820. Economic Development of Latin America

(3-0-3) Ros

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is an introduction to the study of Latin America's economic development, its historical background, and contemporary problems. Part I provides a historical overview from independence in the early 19th century to post-war industrialization in the 20th century. Part II examines structural problems that are common to most countries in the region and reviews the ideologies and debates that have emerged around them. Parts III and IV of the course discuss some major contemporary policy issues, focusing the attention on the market-oriented reforms since the mid-1980s and the impact of the new economic model on equity and growth performance.

ECON 30840. European Economic Development

(3-0-3)

This course provides an account of the policies adopted in the former socialist states of Eastern and Central Europe during their transition from planned to market economies. It seeks to identify the economic problems faced by socialist and post-socialist governments; to set out the theoretical analysis underlying the policies adopted to deal with them; and to assess their impact on economic performance and the welfare of the population.

ECON 33100. Philosophy of Economics

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30100. What does it mean to do good work in economics? If you thought the answer to this question was straightforward, you will be in for a surprise! The intention of the course is to problematize such notions as "prediction is the goal of economics" or "there is progress in economics" or "assumptions in economics should be (un)realistic." To do this, we will explore literature on philosophy of science, sociology of scientific knowledge, and economic theory.

ECON 33120. Seminar in the History of Economic Thought

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30120. The course explores literature on philosophy of economics, history of economic thought, and new directions in economic methodology.

ECON 33200. Introduction to Political Economy

(3-0-3) Wolfson

Prerequisites: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30200. The course is an introduction to the "other" side of economics: heterodox economics or political economy.

Political economy perspectives include Marxian, Post-Keynesian, radical, institutionalist, feminist, and other approaches. The course will also investigate the theoretical and social consequences of different approaches, and how policies and institutional changes that promote social justice and human dignity can be formulated in our current economic environment.

ECON 33220. Marxian Economic Theory

(3-0-3) Ruccio

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR ECON 20020

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30220, An introduction to Marxian economic analysis. Topics include the differences between mainstream and Marxian economics, general philosophy and methodology, Marxian value theory, and critical appraisals, and current relevance of Marx's "critique of political economy."

ECON 33240. Economics of War and Peace

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: ( (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) ) AND ( (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR ECON 20020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30240. The course examines the consequences of wars, including international wars, civil wars, and terrorism. It also examines approaches to peace building and post-war reconstruction. While it focuses mainly on economic factors at work and makes use of the tools of economic analysis, it adopts a broader political economy framework.

ECON 33250. Justice Seminar

(3-0-3) Roos

An examination of major theories of justice, both ancient and modern. Readings include representatives of liberal theorists of right, such as John Rawls, as well as perfectionist alternatives. The course also serves as the core seminar for the philosophy, politics, and economics concentration.

ECON 33260. Political Economy of Development

(3-0-3) Kim

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30260. The course is divided into two parts. The first part provides an overview of the institutional and empirical features of the developing world, followed by a survey and critical evaluation of the conventional development theories. The second part looks into the selected topics evoking the critical, controversial stakes in Third World development debates today. The topics include rent-seeking activities, land tenure and peasantry, micro-financing, corporate governance, state and market failure, market and democracy, income distribution and poverty, feminism in development, ethnic conflicts in resource use, and population pressures. The approach taken in this course is a political-economy perspective with references to the historical, cross-cultural, and empirical materials. The course aims at providing the students with intellectual spaces for alternative development paradigms and strategies. Where appropriate, the tools used in economic analysis will be reviewed at an elementary and accessible level.

ECON 33270. Economics of Science

(3-0-3) Mirowski

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 10020 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30270. Economists often fret over whether they qualify as a hard science, but of late they have begun to turn the tables and apply their theories to the operation of the sciences themselves. This phenomenon is related to the increasing commercialization of science since the 1980s, but other factors include a shift within economics to portray the market as an ideal information system, the globalization of the modern intellectual property regime, and the transformation of the post-Cold War university. These phenomena all have profound political and social consequences for the future, and so we will not restrict the course to a few abstract models, as is frequently the case in economics curricula. Part of the course consists of a discussion of what topics the “economics of science” should take as its subject matter. The remainder explores some of the major transformations, especially with regard to intellectual property and the social structures of science. In this class we describe the changing history of the organization and subsidy of scientific research, especially (but not exclusively) in America; and then we survey the different classes of economic theories applied to the scientific process. The second half of the course is then concerned with issues in the modern globalization and privatization of science, focusing on various case studies.

ECON 33280. Political Economy of Southern Africa

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR ECON 20020

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30280. Southern Africa has long been considered an economic and political basket case. Poverty, famine, AIDS, environmental degradation, and capacity deprivation, have all been considered corollaries to the region's colonial legacies, and postcolonial struggles of identities and policies. Yet scholars and activists argue that the region, indeed the continent, is capable of transcending its blighted history, but this requires collective, conscientious will and actions of institutions and individuals within the African continent, as well as in the West. This seminar-based course, through theories, literary works, case studies, and direct interviews of Southern Africans, makes intelligible the major perspectives that attempt to explain, predict, and effect transformative change in Southern Africa and in those who study the region.

ECON 33410. Labor Relations Law

(3-0-3) Leahy

Prerequisites: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30410. A study of the development of common and statutory law with reference to industrial relations in the United States with emphasis on the case method.

ECON 33420. Employee Relations Law and Human Resources Practices

(3-0-3) Leahy

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30420. A study of the development of common statutory law with reference to discrimination in the United States on the basis of race, creed, color, national origin, and disability, and giving emphasis to the case method.

ECON 33430. Collective Bargaining: Private Sector

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30430. The analysis of the procedures and economic implications of collective bargaining as it now operates in the United States. Emphasizes a game theory approach resulting in the negotiation of a labor contract

ECON 33440. Collective Bargaining: Public Sector

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) OR ECON 20020

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30440. This course will examine the relevant state and federal laws covering the public-sector collective bargaining. It will examine the various issues and techniques covering collective bargaining in government. The major part of this course will be a game theory approach in which an actual contract will be bargained.

ECON 33470. Labor Arbitration

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: ( (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) ) AND ( (ECON 10020 OR ECON 10021) OR ECON 20020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30470. Analysis of the practice and procedures of arbitration in labor grievances with emphasis on rights and interest issues is both public and private sector employment. Course stresses an analysis of arbitral awards.

ECON 33480. Migration, Education, and Assimilation: Three Forces that Built America

(3-0-3)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30480. This course uses the tools of economics to understand driving trends and episodes of migration, education, and assimilation throughout America's history. Readings will apply economic concepts in various historical contexts, from the settling of the country by Europeans to the present day. Examples of course topics include the major waves of European migration to the United States, including waves of Irish immigration; the development and rise of the high school in America; important trends in educational attainment particularly of women and minorities; the economic effects of Civil Rights legislation; and the English-language-only debate. Economics knowledge at the level of Principles of Microeconomics would be helpful but is not required. A research paper is required.

ECON 33500. Economics of Poverty

(3-0-3) Warlick

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30500. An examination of the extent and causes of poverty in the United States. The current system of government programs to combat poverty is analyzed. Reforms of this system are also considered.

ECON 33510. Addressing U.S. Poverty at the Local Level

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course focuses on four arenas where poverty manifests itself: homelessness, education, healthcare, and jobs. Writing-intensive.

ECON 33530. Environmental Economics

Prerequisite: (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30530. An analysis of the welfare economics of environmental problems, emphasizing market failures due to negative environmental externalities. Air, water, and land pollution are classic examples of these externalities, which occur when third parties bear costs resulting from the transactions of the two primary market participants. The theory and practice of environmental policy to promote efficiency at the U.S. local, state, and federal levels and in other countries is explored. International problems such as transboundary pollution and global warming are also studied.

ECON 33540. Restoring Economic Vitality to the Inner City: What Works, What Doesn't, and Why

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30540. This community-based learning and research course examines the political economy of U.S. inner-city revitalization, with South Bend as a case study. Community-Based Learning (CBL) requires that students both learn and apply what they are learning within a setting outside the classroom. In addition to in-class seminar sessions, CBL activities will include meetings with local organizations that link public agencies and private enterprise, visits to varied businesses in urban South Bend, and meetings with area government representatives and relevant church and neighborhood organizations. During the first third of the semester, students will learn about the central problems of the U.S. city and their roots, viewing the issues firsthand locally. In the second third, they will study how inner-city problems are being addressed in selected areas of the country as well as in South Bend. The South Bend Heritage Foundation (SBHF) will act as a client organization for this course by posing research questions for students to investigate during the last third of the semester. The SBHF is a private, not-for-profit service and community development corporation dedicated to the stabilization, enhancement, and empowerment of South Bend's inner-city neighborhoods.

Prerequisite: ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011 OR ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011

This course is the seminar version of ECON 30810. The course looks at the spatial dimensions of economics with major emphasis on where economic activity takes place and why. Theories and methods of regional analysis and regional programs will be stressed with reference to selected regions in the United States and elsewhere. A major part of this class will be a major research project, paper, and presentations by the student on a selected region. Research presentations and discussions by you will be a regular feature of the class.

(3-0-3)

Independent study under the direction of a faculty member. Course requirements may include substantial writing as determined by the director. The director will disenroll a student early for failure to meet course requirements. Students who have been disenrolled or who have failed at the end of the first semester are disqualified for Special Studies in the following term.

ECON 40050. Game Theory and Strategic Analysis

(3-0-3) Gresik

Prerequisite: (MATH 10250 OR MATH 10550) AND (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210)

The objective of this course is to help students develop a good understanding of the basic concepts in game theory and learn how to employ these concepts to better understand strategic interactions. Topics covered will include normal form games, extensive form games, pure and mixed strategies, Nash Equilibrium, subgame perfect equilibrium, repeated games, and introduction to games of incomplete information. Selected applications will include competition and collusion in oligopoly, entry deterrence, political competition and rent-seeking, social norms and strategic interaction.

ECON 40060. Advanced Microeconomics Theory

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course will focus on some selective topics in modern micro economic theory. It may vary from term to term. A possible choice of a broad range of topics are choice under uncertainty, game theory, market mechanisms, coalitional analysis, public goods, and welfare economics. Each of these topics will be discussed with mathematical rigor. Some of the objectives of the course are to familiarize students with important analytical techniques of micro theory and their applications to the study of various economic phenomena and to help students to cultivate the ability to critically evaluate the usefulness and limitations of economic models.

ECON 40280. Consumption and Happiness

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210 OR ECON 30020

Do increases in consumption increase happiness? This course will look at the available evidence that suggests that happiness does not increase with consumption and income for people beyond a point, by their own reckoning. It will examine why this may be so, looking especially at the idea that happiness from consumption depends on not the amount we consume but rather on the amount we consume relative to others. It will also examine how increases in consumption can adversely affect other things many people think are important—including time with family and friends, the environment, economic growth, and income distribution.

ECON 40300. Math for Economists

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND ECON 30020

Exposition of mathematical methods used in economic theory and analysis with application of these methods to economic theory. Major methods covered include differential and integral calculus and matrix algebra. Recommended for students planning to go to graduate school in economics.

ECON 40330. Forecasting for Economics and Business

(3-0-3) Lugauer

Prerequisite: ECON 30331

This course is an introduction to forecasting. The course focuses on creating and working with forecasts of economic, finance, and other business data. Basic theory will also be presented. The forecasts are constructed from estimated summary statistics and parameters generated by several methods, including time series procedures and exponential smoothing. Students will learn how to interpret the uncertainty in the forecasts and in the estimated parameters. Diagnostic statistics and model selection criteria will be presented. Requirements: ECON 30331; econometrics or some other regression-based stats class (something beyond the Stats for Econ course).

ECON 40360. Money, Credit, and Banking

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND ECON 30020

An examination of the money and credit-supply processes and the role of money and credit in the economy. Topics include financial intermediaries, financial markets, the changing regulatory environment, monetary policy, and international monetary arrangements.

ECON 40362. Monetary Policy: Formulation, Conduct, and Crisis Management

(3-0-3) Mark

Central banks wield enormous influence over a country's economic performance. In this course, students will examine the evolution of monetary policy over time and analyze successes and failures of monetary policy and of measures taken to manage times of economic crisis. Special emphasis will be placed on the Federal Reserve System with some attention paid to policies of the Bank of Japan and the European Central Bank. The course will host a Fed Challenge team for the fall 2008 competition. Students interested in learning how the Fed formulates policy should take the course. Anyone interested in participating in the Fed Challenge must take the course. Prerequisites: intermediate macroeconomics. Money and banking desired.

ECON 40363. Bubbles, Crises, and Speculative Attacks: The Economics of Extreme Events

Prerequisites: ECON 30030 AND ECON 30020 AND (ECON 40700 OR ECON 40710 OR ECON 70720)

Individuals' economic incentives are displayed clearly during extreme events, such as hyperinflation and currency collapse. In this course we will study the history of such events, such as the German Hyperinflation, during which time German prices rose at more than 50 percent/month and the so-called bubbles such as 17th-century Tulipmania. We will study the history and then apply modern-day modeling and econometrics. From more modern times we will look at the 1980s and 1990s currency crises in Mexico and East Asia as well as the combination crises in many developing countries hit simultaneously by currency, banking, debt, and output crises. In all the experiences, we will first get the facts straight and then apply modern methods. Familiarity with econometrics is useful.

ECON 40400. Advanced Labor Economics

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND ECON 30331

Labor economics (ECON 30400) is not a prerequisite for this class, but those who have taken ECON 30400 are welcome to enroll. This class presents a detailed exposition of neoclassical labor market theory and empirical research in labor economics. Topics include the determinants of labor supply and demand, occupational and educational choice, mobility, wage dispersion, and discrimination. Students will use the econometric methods introduced in ECON 30331 to analyze the effects that policies have on worker behavior and labor market outcomes. Policies that will be examined include the minimum wage, welfare reform, affirmative action, education policy, and income redistribution policies.

ECON 40447. Health Economics

(3-0-3) Evans

Prerequisite: (ECON 30010 OR ECON 301)

The first segment of the course demonstrates how economics can be applied to the analysis of the health care sector. The second part focuses upon the pending policy debate of how we as a society will provide for the health care needs of the elderly.

ECON 40520. Economics of Education

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND (ECON 30330 OR ECON 30331 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY))

This course reviews economic literature addressing current educational issues in America, including the adequacy of our K–12 public school system, the effectiveness of market-based reforms (vouchers and charter schools) and administered forms of accountability (standardized testing). We also examine the rate of return to additional years of education (how much education should individuals undertake?), access to higher education, financial aid systems, and options to offset the rising cost of higher education.

ECON 40540. Public Economics

Prerequisite: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210)

This class will survey the field of public economics, showing students how economic research can address many of the most important questions and controversies facing policymakers today. Some of the issues the class will discuss are contraception, taxation, Medicare, Social Security, welfare programs, and education. The course will familiarize students with current policy programs and policy debates, introduce students to cutting-edge research methods used to study these programs, and show students what economists know and do not know about improving public policy.

ECON 40550. Public Budget Expenditure Policy

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

This course will introduce students to normative and positive economic theories of the role of governmental agencies in the economy, privatization, and the role of nonprofits; discussion of what level of government should undertake collective action (fiscal federalism); examination of the level and composition of our federal and local governments' budgets as well as the current budgeting process; cost-benefit analysis, theoretical and pragmatic practices; and the impact of governmental rules and regulations on the economy.

ECON 40560. Tax Policy

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

This course will introduce students to the following topics: description of alternative tax instruments; historical trends of tax policies of the federal and state governments; discussion of what would be a "good" tax and criteria for choosing among different taxes; theoretical analysis of taxes on household and business decisions; empirical evidence of the distribution and efficiency consequences of different taxes; and debt and deficits.

ECON 40565. Health Economics

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

The course is designed to illustrate how economists analyze topics related to the production of health and the delivery of health care in the United States. Topics covered include the social and economic determinants of health, the economic control of unhealthy behavior, economic consequences of the AIDS epidemic, using economics to explain the rise of obesity, economic models of insurance, the problems of moral hazard and adverse selection, the economic impact of employer-provided health insurance. Medicare and Medicaid, the problem of the uninsured, medical technology and the pharmaceutical industry, the malpractice system, and the rise of managed care. Readings for the class will come from a required textbook and academic readings downloadable from the class Web page. Class assignments will include problem sets, exams, and short policy memos.

ECON 40570. Economics of the Law

(3-0-3) Betson

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

This course will introduce students to the economics analysis of our legal framework pertaining to property, contract, and tort law. Additional topics will include an examination of the legal process and the relationship between crime and punishment.

ECON 40575. Public Policy, Care for the Poor, and Religious Activity

(3-0-3) Hungerman

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course will explore cutting-edge work by economists on care for the poor, considering both government and nongovernment activities. The course will also consider religious organizations' role on these topics and economic topics on religion more generally. The course will improve student's understanding of economic theory and empirical scientific economic research.

ECON 40580. The Economics of Industrial Organization

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

An investigation into the structure of American industry and an analysis of the implications of corporate economic power for public welfare.

ECON 40700. International Economics

(3-0-3) Rakowski

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

A study of the general theory of international trade: the pattern of trade, gains from trade, tariffs, trade and special interest groups, trade and growth, foreign exchange markets, balance-of-payment problems, and plans for monetary reform.

ECON 40710. International Trade

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

This course examines major theoretical, empirical, and institutional issues in the study of international trade and international factor movements. The topics covered include determinants of trade patterns, trade and welfare, commercial policy, trade and growth, customs unions, international capital and labor movements, and trade and development.

ECON 40720. International Money

Prerequisite: ECON 30020

This course examines major institutional changes in the international financial system, theoretical developments in the field of international monetary economics, and policy issues in the contemporary global finance. Topics include balance-of-payments accounts, exchange rate markets and systems, open-economy macroeconomics, international debt, and contemporary international monetary and financial arrangements.

ECON 40820. Economic Development of Latin America

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ECON 30020

An examination of the roots of independence in Latin America. An analysis of the key problems of economic development and the policies prescribed for their solution.

ECON 40830. Economic Growth

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course is an introduction to the study of economic growth. After a brief preamble, the first two parts of the course review the “proximate determinants” of income levels and growth rates—factor accumulation, technology and efficiency—and discuss the relevant theoretical models. The third part looks at the “fundamental determinants” of differences in income levels and growth rates across countries. A final section of the course discusses current and future trends of demographic change, technical progress, and the environment.

ECON 40860. Mexico’s Economic Development

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course is an introduction to the study of Mexico’s economic development, its historical background, and contemporary problems.

ECON 43110. History of Economic Thought

(3-0-3) Mirowski

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40110. The course intends to ask how it is that we have arrived at this curious configuration of doctrines now called “economics”; and importantly, how differing modes of historical discourse tend to ratify us in our prejudices about our own possible involvement in this project. The course will begin in the 18th century with the rise of a self-conscious discipline, and take us through the stabilization of the modern orthodoxy in WWII. Effort will be made to discuss the shifting relationship of economics to the other sciences, natural and social. A basic knowledge of economics (including introductory economics and preferably intermediate economics) will be presumed.

ECON 43201. Topics in Political Economy

Prerequisite: ECON 30220 OR ECON 33200

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40201. It focuses on Labor and the U.S. economy. It will address the following questions: What has happened to workers’ wages, working conditions, and union organization? What has happened to family income and the distribution of wealth? How have women and people of color fared? How have workers been affected by government policies, such as tax cuts, budget deficits, deregulation, welfare reform, trade agreements, and Social Security policy? What are the possibilities for change, of policies as well as the basic structures of power and influence in our economy? The course will compare and contrast orthodox views with perspectives drawn from the writings of Marx, Keynes, Veblen, Polanyi, and other economists in the political economy tradition.

ECON 43202. Political Economy of Globalization

Prerequisite: ECON 30200 OR ECON 33200

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40202. The course will use the tools of political economy to understand the problems of globalization and to evaluate policies and strategies for change to address these problems. To develop students’ analytic, communication, group-process, and writing skills. This course is writing-intensive and will be run as a seminar. For Kroc M.A. students; others by permission only.

ECON 43203. Political Economy of Labor and U.S. Economy

(3-0-3) Wolfson

Prerequisite: ECON 30200 OR ECON 33200

This is a seminar course that will investigate how labor has fared in the U.S. economy, and what its prospects might be in the future. The course will use the tools of political economy to address this question, in particular theories and perspectives drawn from the writings of Karl Marx, John Maynard Keynes, Karl Polanyi, and Thorstein Veblen, among others. Some of the specific issues that the course will address include the following: the state of workers’ wages, working conditions, and union organization; trends in income inequality and family income; the advancement of women and people of color. In addressing prospects for change, the course will examine policies, institutions, and the basic structures of power and influence in the economy.

ECON 43230. The Political Economy of War and Peace

(3-0-3) Ruccio

Prerequisites: ( (ECON 10010 OR ECON 10011) OR (ECON 20010 OR ECON 20011) ) AND (ECON 10020 OR ECON 20020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40230. This course reviews key economic concepts and methods relevant for peace research and examines the relation between political economy issues and war and peace. It examines the political economy of the causes of war, including the roles of arms races, poverty, inequality, ethnicity, natural resources, the environment, and globalization. It explores the economic consequences of war and military expenditures, including those on human development indicators and economic growth. Finally, it discusses the political economy of the prevention of conflict and of postwar reconstruction.

(3-0-3) Dutt

Prerequisite:(ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210 OR ECON 30020)

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40280. Do increases in consumption increase happiness? This course will look at the available evidence that suggests that happiness does not increase with consumption and income for people beyond a point, by their own reckoning. This course will examine why this may be so, looking especially at the idea that happiness from consumption depends not on the amount we consume but rather on the amount we consume relative to others. It will also examine how increases in consumption can adversely affect other things many people think are important—including time with family and friends, the environment, economic growth, and income distribution.

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40290. The purpose of this course is to explore a topic that is often dealt with only obliquely in the history and philosophy of science: the dual ideas that in some eras, politics has a direct impact on the process and outputs of science, and that science may perform a role in certain political movements and structures. We begin in the early 20th century with the two phenomena of the Soviet Revolution and the collapse of Weimar, and explore how these both were justified/blamed on the progress of science. Next, we survey the contrasting positions of J.D. Bernal and Michael Polanyi, as representations of the “left” planning orientation and the birth of “neoliberalism.” This leads into a section on treatments of the different meanings of “liberty” in the postwar era. We will also briefly survey the effect of science studies on this discussion, from Ezrahi to Latouret to modern controversies over whether the Society for Social Studies of Sciences (4S) should remain “neutral” in its stance. We wind up with modern arguments over whether science has been “perverted” in recent political developments, for the Sound Science movement to the attempt to turn stem cells into a partisan issue.

ECON 43570. Economics of the Law

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40570. The course will introduce students to the economic analysis of our legal framework pertaining to property, contract, and tort law. Additional topics will include an examination of the legal process and the relationship between crime and punishment.

ECON 43581. Corporate Structure and Behavior

Prerequisite: ECON 30010

This course describes and explains the range of industrial organization forms from perfect and monopolistic competition structures to oligopoly and monopoly ones; it then considers the variety of historic policy responses to those forms that were presumed or seen to be undermining or preventing desirable (i.e., competitive) outcomes. Assigned readings and class discussions feature case studies. General Motors, U.S. Steel and GE, for example, illustrate the postwar system and stand in sharp contrast to today's Wal-Mart, American Airlines, and Intel. Students will research and report on selected industries and/or firms for both analytical and policy purposes.

ECON 43600. Current Economic Policy

Prerequisite: ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210 OR ECON 30020 OR ECON 30330 OR BA 20100

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40600. The purpose of this seminar is to discuss current economic policy issues. Students will be required to read newspapers (Wall Street Journal, New York Times) on a daily basis and be prepared to discuss the economics of what was in the newspapers. Periodically throughout the semester, the students will write one-to two-page critiques of the coverage of an issue they found in the newspaper and will write a major paper on a current issue and make a presentation in the seminar.

ECON 43730. European Union

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND ECON 30020

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40730. This course focuses on Europe's movement toward economic and monetary union since the end of World War II. The course will discuss monetary theory, monetary policy, labor and capital market mobility, fiscal transfers political economy issues of central banking, and EU enlargement. Class discussion is a critical part of the course in addition to standard lectures. Grades will be based on two exams, in-class discussion, attendance, and presentations.

ECON 43850. World Poverty and Inequality Across Nations

Prerequisites: (ECON 30010 OR FIN 30210) AND ECON 30020 AND ECON 30330

This course is the seminar version of ECON 40850. Analysis of the trends, causes, and consequences of the inequality between rich and poor nations, or what are called the North and South. The course uses theoretical, empirical, and broader political-economy analyses to examine the implications of international trade, capital and labor movements, technological transfers, and environmental interactions between rich and poor countries. Particular emphasis is given to globalization and its effects on poor countries.

ECON 43961. Senior Honors Program Seminar

(1-0-1)

This seminar provides instructional support for economics majors completing the undergraduate economics honors program. It also provides a venue where honors program students present progress reports on their senior honors essays to their peers at regular intervals. The seminar is graded on a satisfactory/unsatisfactory basis and may be taken twice.

ECON 47950. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Independent study under the direction of a faculty member. Course requirements may include substantial writing as determined by the director. The director will disenroll a student early for failure to meet course requirements. Students who have been disenrolled or who have failed at the end of the first semester are disqualified for Special Studies in the following term.

(2-0-2)

Independent study under the direction of a faculty member. Course requirements may include substantial writing as determined by the director.

ECON 47960. Senior Honors Essay

(3-0-3)

A tutorial requiring a completed essay on a selected topic in economics in depth. The faculty of economics awards the John Harold Sheehan Prize Essay Award with inscribed plaque to the graduating senior who has written the best senior honors essay. Senior economics majors only.

Department of English

ENGL 10501. Introduction to Irish Writers

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ENGL 22514

This course will include the study of Irish writers such as W.B. Yeats, Elizabeth Brown, Bram Stoker, J.M. Synge, Seamus Heaney, and Medbh McGuckian.

ENGL 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction, emphasizing the analysis of literary texts.

ENGL 20000. Introduction to Creative Writing

(3-0-3)

An introduction to writing fiction and poetry, with outside readings and coverage of basic critical terms. In-class discussion of student work.

ENGL 20001. Fiction Writing

Prerequisite: AMST 13186 OR ANTH 13181 OR ARHI 13182 OR LLEA 13186 OR ECON 13181 OR ENGL 13186 OR FTT 13182 OR GE 13186 OR HIST 13184 OR IRL 13186 OR MUS 13182 OR PHIL 13185 OR POLS 13181 OR PLS 13186 OR PLS 20201 OR PLS 30202 OR PSY 13181 OR LLRO 13186 OR SOC 13181 OR THEO 13183

Students in this course will practice making up stories using material from life and from the imagination, creating rich characters, and developing strong storytelling voices. Besides writing several short stories throughout the course, students will have the chance to explore the many possibilities of form that fiction presents, including journal writing, epistolary fiction, short-short stories, and character sketches. We will take inspiration from reading such masters as Anton Chekhov, Ernest Hemingway, David Foster Wallace, George Saunders, Lorrie Moore, Vladimir Nabokov, A.M. Homes, and others. Class participation will include discussion of readings, as well as offering detailed peer feedback.

ENGL 20002. Poetry Writing

Prerequisite: AMST 13186 OR ANTH 13181 OR ARHI 13182 OR LLEA 13186 OR ECON 13181 OR ENGL 13186 OR FTT 13182 OR GE 13186 OR HIST 13184 OR IRL 13186 OR MUS 13182 OR PHIL 13185 OR POLS 13181 OR PLS 13186 OR PLS 20201 OR PLS 30202 OR PSY 13181 OR LLRO 13186 OR SOC 13181 OR THEO 13183

This course is for students who have no familiarity with contemporary, innovative writing and for those who want to learn more. While our focus will be on poetry, we will also write, read, and discuss prose and “hybrid” forms. Our objective is to discover the adventure that writing is. Assignments will include writing exercises, assigned readings, and feedback to group members.

ENGL 20003. Writing Fiction

(3-0-3) Benedict

Prerequisite: AMST 13186 OR ANTH 13181 OR ARHI 13182 OR LLEA 13186 OR ECON 13181 OR ENGL 13186 OR FTT 13182 OR GE 13186 OR HIST 13184 OR IRL 13186 OR MUS 13182 OR PHIL 13185 OR POLS 13181 OR PLS 13186 OR PLS 20201 OR PLS 30202 OR PSY 13181 OR LLRO 13186 OR SOC 13181 OR THEO 13183

Introduction to writing fiction designed for pre-professional students in the colleges of arts and letters and of science.

ENGL 20021. Fiction Writing: Writing Speculative Fiction

Prerequisite: (AMST 13186 OR AMST 180J) OR (ANTH 13181 OR ANTH 180E) OR (ARHI 13182 OR ARHI 180F) OR (LLEA 13186 OR LLEA 180J) OR (ECON 13181 OR ECON 180E) OR (ENGL 13186 OR ENGL 180J) OR (FTT 13182 OR FTT 180F) OR (GE 13186 OR GE 180J) OR (HIST 13184

OR HIST 180H) OR (IRLL 13186 OR IRL 180J) OR (MUS 13182 OR MUS 180F) OR (PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 180I) OR (POLS 13181 OR POLS 180E) OR (PLS 13186 OR PLS 180J) OR (PLS 20201 OR PLS 243) OR (PLS 30202 OR PLS 346) OR (PSY 13181 OR PSY 180E) OR (LLRO 13186 OR LLRO 180J) OR (SOC 13181 OR SOC 180E) OR (THEO 13183 OR THEO 180G)
A creative fiction-writing course for students interested in writing speculative (historical, fantastical, or scientific) fiction.

ENGL 20072. Narrative Nonfiction for the Popular Audience

(3-0-3)

Most of what’s being read by Americans in the fields of politics, sports, and the rest of popular culture isn’t written for scholars and doesn’t “prove” its case in a formal sense. Most essays and books rely on the humanizing effects of personal narratives—in either the first or third person—for their persuasive power. How does a story about a single case serve to convince a broad audience to feel a certain way or take a course of action? We can learn these skills by studying the rhetorical qualities of popular nonfiction. This course will develop skills in producing and critiquing such pieces, both structurally and, more importantly, at the level of the building block of communication, the individual sentence. We’ll use the seminar and workshop formats to discuss each other’s work along with published work. Students will produce a few guided short pieces and two longer essays on topics of their choosing.

ENGL 20106. Point-of-View in the Novel

This course focuses on an introduction to the novel as a form, as a means to view the world of the author/artist and that of the reader.

ENGL 20107. Satire

(3-0-3)

An introduction to satire in Western literature.

ENGL 20108. Text and Image

(3-0-3)

This course examines topics in the tradition of illustrated texts from the ancient Egyptian scrolls to contemporary textual media. Topics include the history of writing systems, text as image, illuminated manuscripts, illustrated books, photographic literature, the embedded graphic of nonfiction prose, and the graphic novel. In addition to our texts, students will work in the Medieval Institute facsimile collection and with original works from the Rare Book Collections of the Hesburgh Library. For the older works, required texts are widely available and familiar classics are on reserve in the library and accessible on line. Students will purchase contemporary works, a history of the genre, and course packet of criticism and examples. Coursework includes three illustrated research papers and a class presentation based on a 15–20 page research paper.

ENGL 20109. Twentieth-Century Short Story

An in-depth study of the short story as a literary form using examples from around the globe and written in the 20th century.

ENGL 20111. Realism and the Supernatural

(3-0-3)

An attempt to develop a theory of the supernatural and the uncanny in “realistic” fiction from Daniel Defoe to Henry James.

ENGL 20112. Comedy

(3-0-3)

A multimedia examination of different and recurring patterns, themes, characters, types, and problems in comedy-in drama, opera, and operetta, film, fiction, and radio and TV—with particular focus on the role and treatment of women.

ENGL 20118. Reinventing the Fairy Tale

(3-0-3)

A historical examination of “Cinderella,” The Arabian Nights, “Beauty and the Beast” and “The Pied Piper of Hamelin” with theoretical emphasis on issues of gender, sexuality, racial stereotyping, and national identity construction.

ENGL 20133. Catholic Fiction and Film

(3-0-3)

An examination of Catholicism in modern fiction, cinematic adaptations of those works of fiction, and other freestanding stories and films.

ENGL 20137. War, Peace, and the Literary Imagination

(3-0-3)

In this seminar-style course, we will investigate the nature of war and peace through literature, principally 20th-century fiction and poetry. Through texts drawn from various regions of the world, we will (1) examine the metaphors and themes that unmask the realities of war and present struggles for peace; (2) explore the ways the literary works themselves—through language, rhythms, and images—become battlegrounds, as it were, on which the human imagination creates individual identities, links individuals to communities, and constructs, deconstructs, and reconstructs cultural ideologies; and (3) consider the role human imagination plays in moral and civic life. In addition to the literary works, participants in the class become a rich resource for our investigation.

ENGL 20150. Women and War

(3-0-3) Cameron

A study of how literature of the early 20th century takes up the relations between women and war.

ENGL 20151. Literature of Sport

(3-0-3) Benedict

Sports and athletics have held prominent roles in human societies since the beginnings of civilization. Across centuries, nation-states have used athletic competition for a variety of purposes, from paying homage to distant gods to demonstrating superiority over neighboring tribes/cultures. And the individuals, the “warriors,” who excel on those “fields of battle” are venerated as heroes, champions, “gods.” In this course, we’ll look at a variety of literature (fiction, nonfiction, poetry, film, broadcasts of athletic events, etc.) related to sports and athletics. From depictions of wrestlers on temple walls in Ancient Egypt to Grantland Rice’s New York Herald Tribune “Four Horsemen” article to podcasts of ESPN’s “SportsCenter,” our investigation of the literature of sport will cover a range of topics—race, gender, class, globalization, and the purposes and functions of athletic competition, to name a few—including the rise of the “super star” athlete as a “god.” Required work: quizzes, two essays, midterm, final examination.

ENGL 20203. Shakespeare in Performance

(3-0-3)

A performance-oriented Shakespeare course based on the rapprochement of theatrical and literary disciplines, techniques, and interpretations.

ENGL 20204. Shakespeare and Film

(3-0-3)

A survey of how Shakespeare uses sex and violence as potential literary devices within his plays, and how film adaptations of the plays help us understand the effects of this sensationalism.

ENGL 20206. Dante: Divine Comedy

(3-0-3)

A study of The Divine Comedy, in translation with facing Italian text, with special attention to the history of ideas, the nature of mimesis and allegory, and Dante’s sacramental vision of life.

ENGL 20211. Shakespeare’s Comedies

(3-0-3)

A survey of the comedic plays of William Shakespeare.

ENGL 20213. The World of the Middle Ages

Corequisite: MI 22001

The Middle Ages have been praised and reviled, romanticized, and fantasized. The spectacular popularity of Harry Potter, The Lord of the Rings, and Narnia have brought a revival of interest in and curiosity about the Middle Ages. But what were they like, these 10 centuries between Rome and the Renaissance? In this course, we will explore major themes and issues in medieval civilization in an attempt to offer some basic answers to that question. We will have in view three kinds of people: rulers, lovers, and believers. But we will also study carefully those who wrote about those kinds of people. We will constantly ask how can we know about the Middle Ages, and what kinds of things can we know? We will consider major literary texts as both works of art and historical documents. We will explore various kinds of religious literature. We will try to understand the limits, boundaries, and achievements of philosophy and theology. Some lectures will incorporate medieval art so as to add a visual dimension to our explorations. This course will constitute an extended introduction to the dynamic and fascinating world of the Middle Ages.

ENGL 20214. Arthurian Literature

(3-0-3) Frese

An exploration of the fascinating world of Arthurian legend.

ENGL 20215. Introduction to Shakespeare

(3-0-3)

An examination of selected plays of Shakespeare, with an emphasis on Shakespeare’s development as a dramatist and his techniques of character development.

ENGL 20218. Love and Romance in the Middle Ages

(3-0-3)

Close readings of some of the seminal texts associated with “courtly love”: the love songs of the troubadours, the Arthurian romances of Chrétien de Troyes, Chaucer’s Troilus, and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, among others, with a focus on how romantic love is portrayed.

ENGL 20220. Migration and Identity in the New Ireland

(3-0-3) O’Brien

In less than two decades, the Republic of Ireland has shifted from a relatively poor country with a high level of national, racial, and ethnic homogeneity to a country with the world’s fourth highest per capita income experiencing an exponential expansion of cultural diversity. One of the names used to describe this shift is “New Ireland,” and this course will discuss the cultural dimensions of this term. We will examine selections from contemporary Irish literature and film that contribute to this analysis and contextualize our discussions with legal, political, and economic approaches to Irish social issues. Class work will include several short papers, a long research paper, and an exam.

ENGL 20232. Shakespeare Media: Book and Screen

(3-0-3)

This course will cover not only standard film versions of the plays but also adaptations and appropriations in order to examine the way in which Shakespeare circulates in popular and elite culture. Likely films include Olivier’s Hamlet and The Last Action Hero (with Arnold Schwarzenegger); Zeffirelli’s Romeo and Juliet, Luhrmann’s Romeo + Juliet and Shakespeare in Love; Polanski’s Macbeth and Billy Morrisette’s Scotland, PA; Derek Jarman’s The Tempest; and Peter Greenaway’s Prospero’s Books. In each case, we will begin with a reading of the play before moving on to film versions and adaptations.

ENGL 20240. Staging the Religious: Shakespeare and His Contemporaries

(3-0-3) Dodson

How do we imagine religious experience? What happens when religion becomes an image, either visually, dramatically, or on the page? In this course, we will approach this question through the plays of William Shakespeare and a handful of his contemporaries, focusing on English Renaissance playwrights whose works “stage” the cultural tensions and competing religious claims of Protestants, Catholics, Jews, Muslims, and atheists, not to mention the supernatural (ghosts, witches, devils, etc.). While we will explore a handful of themes in relation to these works—faith and the will, religious outcasts, and violence and justice—we will spend most of our time asking how the presentation of these religious themes in dramatic form and on the stage affects their meaning. We will do so by way of comparison, both comparing Shakespeare’s plays with the frequently under-read works of Christopher Marlowe and Ben Jonson, as well as setting their images of religious experience against the Bible, Renaissance painting (e.g., Bosch, Bruegel, Caravaggio, and Rembrandt), and contemporary film versions of the plays.

ENGL 20302. The Romantic Tradition

(3-0-3)

Between 1790 and 1830, the movement known as Romanticism profoundly changed the artistic, musical, historical, religious, and political sensibilities on the Continent and in Britain. Romanticism marked a turn from the rational formalism of the Classical period and reawakened an interest in myth, religious faith, the imagination, and emotional experience. In this course, we will focus principally on the German contribution to Romanticism and trace its origins, development, and eventual decline in works of literature, philosophy, theology, music, painting, and architecture. Works to be studied will include those by the writers Ludwig Tieck, Friedrich von Hardenberg (Novalis), and Friedrich Schlegel; the philosophers Fichte and Schelling; the theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher; the painters Caspar David Friedrich and some members of the Nazarene school; the composers Franz Schubert, Felix Mendelssohn, and Robert Schumann; and the architect Karl Friedrich Schinkel.

ENGL 20305. Victorian Empire Writing 1868–1901

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the empire as theme in selected Irish writers of the late-19th century.

ENGL 20313. Science in Fiction

(3-0-3) Benedict

Readings in literature that explore science. Designed for preprofessional students in the colleges of arts and letters and of science.

ENGL 20316. Jane Austen, Writer and Reader

(3-0-3) Creech

Jane Austen’s hugely popular novels are even more rewarding when read together with the 18th-century literature that shaped her art. We will study in depth four of Austen’s novels in relation to novels, essays, poems, and plays that influenced her. These works will enrich our examination of Austen’s engagement with some of the intellectual, ethical, and social questions that vexed 18th-century Britain: the difficulties of coming of age in the modern world, the proper roles of men and women, the promise and perils of romantic relationships and marriage, and the significance of class divisions. Finally, we will consider the 18th-century ideas about literature that informed Austen’s novels as well as Austen’s innovative and influential narrative technique. Students will give a group presentation on a film adaptation of one of Austen’s novels in order to explore the continuing relevance of her work and the interplay between medium and meaning.

ENGL 20320. Geography and the Victorian Imagination

(3-0-3)

During the 19th century, ideas about geography preoccupied the Victorian imagination. This course explores how writers such as Elizabeth Gaskell, Arthur Canon Doyle, Emily Lawless, Rudyard Kipling, and Joseph Conrad created literary maps of England and the British Empire for their readers. In particular, we will devote time to uncovering how geography was used to define the “otherness” of Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. Assignments include a group presentation, short response papers, and two longer papers.

ENGL 20400. World War I: Narratives of War

(3-0-3)

A study of how narratives concerning World War I affected two connected discourses: feminism and psychoanalysis, particularly in light of men’s and women’s differing roles in the war through the work (physical, emotional, and artistic) in which they were engaged.

ENGL 20405. Decadent Modernity

(3-0-3) Thomas

Does the term decadence simply indicate a 19th-century fashion craze of debauched poets? Not at all. This course explores visions of decadence spanning the last two centuries and more, considering respects in which “modernity” itself can seem decadent. The course emphasizes literary texts, along with forays into drama, visual arts, cinema, and criticism. Early on, we lay conceptual groundwork with texts by Freud and Nietzsche. Other writers include Charles Baudelaire, Oscar Wilde, Joris-Karl Huysmans, Walter Pater, Virginia Woolf, and Patrick Süskind. We also read several lesser-known authors and study films by Ken Russell, Peter Greenaway, and Sally Potter. PLEASE NOTE: Much of our discussion matter is not for the faint-hearted. Bring a tolerance for the grotesque and a readiness to think carefully about authors who challenge deeply held Western attitudes concerning morality and values.

ENGL 20406. Mysticism in Modern Literature

(3-0-3)

This course examines the persistence of mystical and spiritual traditions in the literary texts of the early 20th century: Underhill, Hopkins, Yeats, Conrad, Joyce, Owen, Eliot, Crane, Hesse, Forster, Mansfield, Woolf, and Waugh.

ENGL 20407. Christianity and Modernism

(3-0-3)

A study of Christian writers and how they struggle with the literary and cultural movement labeled “modernism.”

ENGL 20408. Faith and Fragmentation in Modernity

(3-0-3)

How British and American modernist writers responded to an upheaval of traditional religious belief in the first half of the 20th century.

ENGL 20411. Shakespeare in Performance

(3-0-3) Zomorodian

Shakespeare’s plays are not isolated artifacts that exist in a vacuum. As literary scholar and artistic director Kevin Ewert has said, Shakespeare’s “creations were not birthed, Athena-like, from his balding pate into this world to stand alone as singular, finished and fully-formed edifices; neither playwright nor play existed or ‘worked’ autonomously.” The plays were originally produced as popular entertainment and both reflected and constructed the cultural conditions of early modern England. Modern interpretations of the plays—on paper, on stage, on film—likewise engage with their own historical moments: each interpretative act is a socially, politically, theoretically informed, and further generative, response. In this course, we will focus on six of Shakespeare’s plays to develop an understanding of the formal, linguistic, and stylistic aspects of the genre. We will examine not only the literariness, but also the liveliness of these texts, considering each in terms of performance by viewing contemporary theatrical and cinematic works, including the Actors From The London Stage’s production of Much Ado About Nothing here at Notre Dame; Chicago Shakespeare Theater’s staging of Macbeth, and various film adaptations. Through reading, discussing, watching, and maybe even performing Shakespeare, students will develop the analytical skills to consider diverse interpretations and make their own informed, critical interventions.

ENGL 20501. Irish Fiction, 1945–2000

(3-0-3)

A study of major Irish writers since World War II.

ENGL 20502. National Cinema: Irish Cinema/Culture

Corequisite: ENGL 21001

Every industrialized country, and many non-industrialized ones, has developed distinctive national cinemas. Often these productions are a dynamic mix of Hollywood influences, assertive local cultures, and government control. This course examines the films of one or more countries to reveal their distinctive styles, stories, and visual and narrative techniques. (The nationality varies each year.) The idea of “nation” as a critical concept is also addressed. May be repeated. Fulfills the film/TV international area requirement.

ENGL 20503. Northern Irish Writing and Politics

(3-0-3)

A study of Irish writers in the North since the Troubles began in the 1960s.

ENGL 20504. Writing in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course explores the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

ENGL 20506. Celtic Heroic Literature

(3-0-3)

An exciting introduction to Celtic literature and culture, this course introduces the thrilling sagas, breathtaking legends, and prose tales of Ireland and Wales. Readings include battles, heroic deeds, feats of strength and daring, and dilemmas faced by the warrior heroes of the Celts. Celtic Heroic Literature, which requires no previous knowledge of Irish or Welsh, studies the ideology, belief system, and concerns of the ancient Celtic peoples as revealed in their saga literature. By examining the hero's function in society, students investigate the ideological concerns of a society undergoing profound social transformation and religious conversion to Christianity and the hero's role as a conduit for emotional and social distress. Among the heroes to be studied in depth are Cu Chulainn, Lug, St. Patrick, and the king-heroes. Wisdom literature and archaeological and historical evidence will also be considered in this course. No prior knowledge of Irish required. All texts provided in English.

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the literature of medieval Ireland. Particular emphasis will be placed on the prose saga texts such as the Tain Bo Cuailnge or Cattle Raid of Cooley, which features the legendary hero Cu Chulainn; also the various texts in both prose and poetry of the Fenian cycle of Fionn Mac Cumhaill (Finn McCool). The manner in which such texts shed light on the nature of medieval Irish society will be examined. There will be regular reading and writing assignments, and students will be expected to take part in class discussion.

ENGL 20509. Twentieth-Century Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The cultural and political factors that have shaped Ireland's extraordinary literary achievement, paying particular attention to Irish Decolonization and the Northern Troubles. Readings from Shaw, Yeats, Joyce, Bowen, Friel, Heaney, and Deane.

ENGL 20510. The Hidden Ireland

(3-0-3)

Daniel Corkery's study of the literature and society of Irish-speaking Munster in the 18th century (The Hidden Ireland, first published in 1924) is an acknowledged classic of Irish literary history. This course will examine aspects of the corpus of 18th-century poetry in the Irish language in the light of Corkery's analysis and of subsequent reassessments of that analysis (Louis Cullen and Brendan O Buachalla, for example). Selections from the corpus of poetry will be taken from O'Tuama and Kinsella An Duanaire: Poems of the Dispossessed (1981).

ENGL 20511. Modern British and Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

Dramatic representations of the Irish “character” and the Irish nation from the end of the 19th century through the 20th. Includes Yeats, Lady Gregory, O'Casey, Shaw, and Synge.

ENGL 20512. Culture and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course explores the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

ENGL 20513. Introduction to Irish Writers

Corequisite: IRL 32109

This course introduces undergraduate students to Irish literature; explores its dominant themes and motifs; and surveys canonical texts and major authors from the 18th century to the present day. A broad range of texts and genres—poetry, novels, short stories, folklore, and drama—are studied from a historical and cultural perspective and in relation to transnational literary trends and movements. Attention is also paid to modernization and tradition as well as post-colonialism, feminism, and censorship. No prior knowledge of Ireland or the Irish language is required. Irish-language texts will be available in translation.

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the literature of medieval Ireland. Particular emphasis will be placed on the prose saga texts such as the Tain Bo Cuailnge or Cattle Raid of Cooley, which features the legendary hero Cu Chulainn; also the various texts in both prose and poetry of the Fenian cycle of Fionn Mac Cumhaill (Finn McCool). The manner in which such texts shed light on the nature of medieval Irish society will be examined. There will be regular reading and writing assignments, and students will be expected to take part in class discussion.

ENGL 20520. Alienation and Intimacy in British and Irish Modernism

(3-0-3)

The 20th century arrived to a world altered by industry and the metropolis, by scientific theory and psychoanalysis, by mechanical transportation and communication devices. Such a climate challenged traditional values, social mores, class distinctions, gender roles, and conceptions of nation, propriety, and home. The literature from the first half of the century suggests that the increasingly alienating world forces interpersonal connection to take place under new circumstances, often outside of the traditional settings regulated by marital, social, and religious convention. Through close reading, students in this course will examine how the literature presents colonialism, the Great War, the deterioration of aristocratic class values and privilege in both Britain and Ireland, the destruction of the metropolis and the home during the London air raids of World War II, and the shift in personal values vis-à-vis alcohol consumption and marital infidelity. The course will look at these modernist works in light not only of the alienating circumstances they represent, but also of the effect that alienation has on the interpersonal connections between individuals.

ENGL 20521. Reading the Irish Revival

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the Irish Revival (1891–1939) as a dynamic moment in modern Irish literature in which key literary figures such as W.B. Yeats, Lady Gregory, John Millington Synge, and James Joyce worked to make Ireland a center of cultural innovation once again. This significance of this period to Ireland's decolonization and to related debates over the appropriate forms and language for an Irish national literature will provide a central focus. Texts to be considered will include the drama of J.M. Synge and Lady Gregory, the poetry of W.B. Yeats, and Joyce's Dubliners.

ENGL 20522. Mapping Ireland

(3-0-3)

In this course we will read modern Irish history, film, poetry, drama, short fiction, and the novel to explore the various ways Irish artists and writers have sought to give shape to national identity and the political geography of Irish life. Our primary intention will be to read and appreciate the individual works, but over the course of the semester we shall seek to compare the different visions of nation and culture those works present. Because of Ireland's exceptional history, we may in fact discover that the central element of so much of its best art is precisely to imagine what it means to be Irish. In consequence, Irish works provide us a window through which to examine the relation between art and politics, imagination, and the nation. Readings will range from John Ford's The Quiet Man, to poems by Seamus Heaney, W.B. Yeats and Eavan Boland, to fiction by Edna O'Brien, John McGahern and James Joyce. Assignments include four short essays, several in-class presentations, and a final exam.

ENGL 20523. The Hidden Ulster

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the literature, language, culture, and history of Ulster in Ireland and confronts the stereotypes of binary opposition that commonly mark the region. Through close textual readings of literary texts from the 17th century onward, we discuss and interrogate the literary, religious, cultural, and linguistic forces that shaped identity in Ulster from the colonial period onwards and explore the shared heritage of both communities—Irish/English, Catholic/Protestant, Native/Planter. This course will suit English majors and those interested in the study of identity formation and competing cultural ideologies. No prior knowledge of Irish is required for this course. All texts will be in translation.

ENGL 20524. Great Irish Writers

(3-0-3)

The early modern period (16th to late-18th centuries) is a time of English conquest in Ireland. It is, therefore, a period of cumulative crisis for the Irish and is important in the formation of their identity. We will read closely a selection of texts, both prose and poetry, representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them. All texts, originally written in Irish, will be read in English translation. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature (we will, in fact, read some English writing on Ireland in this period), and it will also be of interest to students of Irish history. We will supplement the material with readings from the work of historians on early modern European nationalism in order to place it in its wider context. In addition, we will examine some recent work on the interface between language, literature, and anthropology in order to deepen our cultural understanding of the texts we are studying.

ENGL 20525. Victorian Irish Literature

The 19th century was a dynamic period for Ireland, and writers from a many different backgrounds offer a range of perspectives on these changes. The central works of the class reflect diverse ideas on Irish and British history and literature and will provide a frame for debate and discussion of violence and social change, sexuality, economics, and politics during the Victorian period. Readings will include works from a variety of genres including Somerville and Ross, Oscar Wilde, Robert Louis Stevenson, W.B. Yeats, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Matthew Arnold, and James Clarence Mangan. Coursework will include several brief essays and a research paper.

ENGL 20533. Performing Irishness: A Century of Irish Drama

(3-0-3) Pocock

As members of a school whose sports teams are called the "Fighting Irish" and whose mascot is a leprechaun, Notre Dame students are no strangers to performances of Irish stereotypes. Yet these types of performances extend far beyond the football field, and have histories of which many Domers are unaware. In the 19th century, the "stage Irishman" was a popular comic figure on the British and American stage. Drunken, fiery-tempered, and full of blarney, the stage Irishman represented a popular and enduring stereotype of what it meant to be Irish. This course will examine how Irish playwrights of the 20th and 21st centuries have reacted to the stage Irishman in creating their own versions of Irishness: sometimes by accepting (or cashing in on) the popular stereotype, and sometimes by challenging it. Students will read works by some of the best-known Irish playwrights: W.B. Yeats, Sean O'Casey, and Brian Friel, while also exploring the work of some less familiar playwrights, such as Lady Augusta Gregory and Dion Boucicault. Class participation will be a vital part of this course as students interpret, stage, and act out portions of plays, both as a regular part of class discussion and also as a graded group presentation. Students will also be required to write three short response papers (2 pages each) and one longer paper (7–10 pages) on a text or production of their choice.

ENGL 20534. The Irish Short Story

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

This course studies the Irish short story as a literary genre that reflects the changing political and cultural forces at play in Ireland. We begin the course by surveying various critical theories that can be applied to the genre before reading and discussing a wide selection of short stories. The course considers Irish writing in the broader sense literature written in either Irish or English. Among the authors included are Patrick Pearse, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Séamus Mac Grianna, James Joyce, Liam O'Flaherty, Elizabeth Bowen, Frank O'Connor, Sean O'Faolain, Éilís Ní Dhuibhne, Angeal Bourke, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Eithne Strong, Pádraic Breathnach, Alan Titley, Mary Lavin, William Trevor, Gerry Adams, and Bernard MacLaverty.

ENGL 20535. Modern British Poetry

(3-0-3)

A survey of British poetry and poets of the first half of the 20th century.

ENGL 20536. Narrating the Mind in Modern Fiction

(3-0-3) Ayo

Anyone who has ever engaged with a great work of literature knows that it opens up new avenues of thinking. But how does one think about thinking? Better yet, how does one write about thinking? We will ponder these questions as we take a careful look at works from perhaps the most recognizable figures of modernism: Marcel Proust, Dorothy Richardson, James Joyce, and Virginia Woolf. As we investigate these authors' preoccupation with thought processes, we will think about the texts in relation to various psychoanalytical attempts, beginning with Sigmund Freud's, to conceptualize consciousness and unconsciousness (How do we distinguish the self from the other? Do our conscious and unconscious selves involve our intellect, emotions, sensations, perceptions, and/or dreams?). We will invade characters' minds to ask: How does one transfer an intangible thought to paper? How does one write a male's consciousness compared to a female's? What about an adult's compared to a child's? Can sentence structure, punctuation, and word choice articulate these differences? Finally, we will expand our inquiry to another media form to question: How does one film consciousness?

ENGL 20545. The Modern British and Irish Short Story

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course will trace the generic development and changing structures of the short story form—there is more involved here than mere brevity—and will also provide a series of readings from the major British and Irish short-story writers from the 20th century. We will read from the short story theories of these individual authors, where such theory exists, and will examine the important connections between the form and the idea of a "national" literature. Writers will include James Joyce, Frank O'Connor, Liam O'Flaherty, Mary Lavin, Kate Roberts, D.H. Lawrence, and Virginia Woolf.

ENGL 20594. Heroism and Eroticism in Chinese Fiction

(3-0-3) Ge

In this course, we will read works in Chinese fiction from the late imperial periods. We will discuss the aesthetic features of such works and their cultural underpinnings, especially the infusion of Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist meanings. Particularly, we will focus on heroism and eroticism as two major themes in Chinese fiction and their specific expressions in each work. We will consider the transition from heroism to eroticism as a shift of narrative paradigm, which coincided with a general trend of “domestication” in traditional Chinese fiction. Through the readings and discussions, the students are expected to become familiar with pre-modern Chinese narrative tradition and acquainted with some aspects of Chinese culture. All the readings are in English translation, and no prior knowledge of China or the Chinese language is required.

ENGL 20601. Early Modern American Fiction

(3-0-3)

An examination of selected literatures written between the Civil War and World War II, specifically focusing on how this fiction shows the impact of economic and technological transformations on religious beliefs, conceptions of human identity, and work environments and men’s and women’s places in them.

ENGL 20602. Readings in Nineteenth-Century American Literature

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on major literary figures and works of 19th-century America, focusing chiefly on the two decades before the Civil War, a period often hailed as the first flowering of a genuine “American” literature.

ENGL 20603. Literatures of the Early Americas

(3-0-3)

Close examination of selected works written by Americans from the 17th century through the Civil War.

ENGL 20604. American Fiction

(3-0-3)

An exploration of selected novels, written by a variety of American authors, that consider the question “what characteristics and values define ‘American identity’?”

ENGL 20605. American Literature: Varieties of Religious Experience

(3-0-3)

Many American authors are skeptical toward religion, yet they are, nonetheless, preoccupied with the religious experience. This course explores the relationship between these attitudes in American literature.

ENGL 20606. American Women Writers to 1930

(3-0-3)

A close reading of “major” and “minor” American women writers of the 18th, 19th, and early 20th centuries.

ENGL 20607. Religious Imagination in American Literature

(3-0-3) Werge

A consideration of the forms, ideas, and preoccupations of the religious imagination in literature and of the historical relationships between religious faith and traditions and particular literary works.

ENGL 20609. Chicago in Words

Early 20th-century Chicago was famous for its railways and stockyards, jazz, and gangsters. The city saw the creation of great industrial fortunes and the birth in 1905 of the Industrial Workers of the World. The literature taken up in this class brings the dynamic contradictions of the Chicago experience to life. We will look at work by Jane Addams, Nelson Algren, Sherwood Anderson, Gwendolyn Brooks, John Dos Passos, Carl Sandburg, Upton Sinclair, Theodore Ward, and Richard Wright, covering a range of literary expression from impassioned journalism, to poetry, novels, and drama. We will consider the relation of modernism to realism. We will look at the ways in which Chicago capitalism altered nature, challenged traditional forms of identity, and created new forms of urban community. We will spend a week exploring Chicago’s jazz and blues, while we will also look at the 1932 gangster film Scarface screenplay by Chicago journalist and Oscar winner

Ben Hecht. Chicago is a city of tremendous vitality and shocking brutality that has reinvented itself time and again, and the writers we will read have taken up this task of urban invention with a shared urgency and a wide range of voices. Course requirements: Active class participation, short response papers, creative responses (poems), a class presentation of a scene from Big White Fog by Theodore Ward, and an 8- to 10-page paper.

ENGL 20611. Second City: Literature on Location in Chicago

(3-0-3) Irving

A study of literature that takes up the history, urban concerns, and national pretense of what for much of the 20th century was America’s second largest city.

ENGL 20620. Coming of Age in the American Novel

(3-0-3) Dedo

What does it mean to “come of age” in America? How do we know when we have become adults? How have 20th-century American novelists depicted the struggle of leaving childhood behind and embracing new responsibilities? What are the consequences of growing up? In this course, we will approach how select groups of American youth struggle to come to terms with what it means to be an adult in America; from Sylvia Plath’s harrowing narrative of a gifted young woman’s psychological breakdown in The Bell Jar to Ernest Hemmingway’s fictionalization of post-WWI anomie in his classic The Sun Also Rises. We will explore this theme in novels by authors including Horatio Alger Jr., Ralph Ellison, Toni Morrison, and Junot Díaz in order to better imagine how different social, racial, and economic groups deal with what it means to grow up in America. Course requirements include four short response papers (2 pages each), a midterm and final exam, presentation, and final research paper (8–10 pages). Films will include The Graduate, Igby Goes Down, Harold and Maude, and Juno.

ENGL 20626. American War Literature

(3-0-3)

Beginning with Mary Rowlandson’s captivity narrative and ending with Tim O’Brien’s The Things They Carried, an exploration of the aesthetic, historical, and theoretical functions and values of war writing in the United States.

ENGL 20701. African American Literature

(3-0-3)

A survey of selected seminal works of African American literature.

ENGL 20702. Travel in American Literature

(3-0-3)

A close examination of the theme of “travel” in American literature from the Puritans to the present, focusing on literatures written by slaves seeking freedom, settlers in search of fertile land, Native Americans forced from ancestral homes, and other characters seeking “freedom” or a return to “home.”

ENGL 20704. Contemporary Short Fiction

(3-0-3)

A study of short stories and novellas written in the last half of the 20th century.

ENGL 20707. American Novel

(3-0-3)

Novels from Hawthorne to Morrison.

ENGL 20708. The City in American Literature

(3-0-3)

Literary representations of the city and social identity in American texts from the 1890s to the present, including Riis, Dreiser, Wharton, Sinclair, Yeziarska, Wright, Paley, and Cisneros, as well as contemporaneous nonfiction and films

ENGL 20709. God and Evil in Modern Literature

(3-0-3)

A study of selected modern writers whose concern with God and evil, faith and despair, and the reality and significance of suffering animates their writings.

ENGL 20710. Latino/a Literatures: Stories of New America

(3-0-3)

A survey of selected 19th- and 20th-century Latino/a American writings.

ENGL 20714. Contemporary American Literature

(3-0-3) Benedict

What does it mean to write fiction in the “Naughts” (2000–10)? In the age of MySpace, RSS feeds, American Idol, and YouTube, is the term “fiction” even valid anymore? Or, for that matter, books? In this class, we will read several novels published since January 2001. In addition to covering the “usual” topics (plot, character relationships, themes, etc.), we’ll also think about what it means to write “fictions,” to write “novels,” in a world, in an “America,” that is increasingly being parsed into smaller and smaller pieces. A partial list of texts include (subject to change): Mark Danielewski, Only Revolutions: A Novel; Jennifer Egan, Look at Me; Joshua Ferris, Then We Came to the End; Dinaw Menegstu, The Beautiful Things This Heaven Bears; and Dana Spiotta, Eat the Document: A Novel. We’ll also view excerpts of television shows, movies, and other media, as well as attend some campus literary events. Required work: two short essays, midterm, final, occasional quizzes.

ENGL 20715. American Poetry After 1945

(3-0-3)

A survey of poetry and poets of the second half of the 20th century.

ENGL 20760. Twentieth-Century American Drama

(3-0-3)

This class is designed to fulfill the University’s literature requirement. It will focus on key works of modern and contemporary American drama from three plays by Eugene O’Neill (Desire Under the Elms, The Iceman Cometh, Long Day’s Journey into Night) to Nilo Cruz’s Pulitzer Prize winning 2003 play Anna in the Tropics.

In addition to critical readings and selected European plays on reserve, focal playwrights include Edward Albee, Sam Shepherd, Paula Vogel, Amiri Baraka, Luis Valdez, David Mamet, August Wilson, Josefina López, Yellow Robe, Anna Devere Smith, Eve Ensler, and Moisés Kaufmann. Requirements will include group-staged scenes, journal entries on selected plays, and three 4-page papers. In addition, students are required to attend one campus play over the course of the semester and write a critique of the production and performance.

ENGL 20800. Ethnic Identities

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the interconnectedness among literatures of prominent authors from the Americas, Africa, England, and the Caribbean.

ENGL 20801. African American Literature and the Bible

(3-0-0)

An examination of the Bible, from Genesis to the Gospel writers’ parables of Jesus and how these Hebrew and Christian stories inspired African American artists.

(3-0-3)

An exploration, based on the theme of memory, of several ethnic American novels, specifically the ways in which remembering one’s own or one’s ancestors’ past becomes part of one’s self-identification as an ethnic American.

ENGL 20803. A Survey of Black Women Writing in America

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to familiarize students with the diverse concerns of black women’s writing, from the first novel written in 1854 through the present.

(3-0-3)

An exploration, based on the theme of memory, of several ethnic American novels, specifically the ways in which remembering one’s own or one’s ancestors’ past becomes part of one’s self-identification as an ethnic American.

ENGL 20806. Latin American Images of the United States

(3-0-3)

Drawing upon a wide variety of sources—novels, essays, poems, travel literature, social science texts, film, art, etc.—a survey of Latin American views of North American society, customs, politics, and individual character, with a particular emphasis on United States interventionism.

ENGL 20807. The Harlem Renaissance

(3-0-3)

A study of the historical, cultural, and political circumstances that led to the flowering of African American literature in the ‘20s and early ‘30s and the writers it fostered: Hughes, Hurston, Toomer, Redmon Fauset, Larson, and Thurman.

ENGL 20808. Latino- and Latina-American Literature

(3-0-3)

Studies of Latino and Latina authors, including Chicano, Caribbean, or South American.

ENGL 20809. West Indian Poetry

(3-0-3)

Poems from the many languages and cultures of the Caribbean region.

ENGL 20810. African American Migration Narratives

(3-0-3)

Life writings and issues of self-representation in the African American expressive cultural tradition in the 19th and 20th centuries.

ENGL 20813. Latino/a Poetry

(3-0-3) Menes

Close readings of prominent contemporary Latino poets.

ENGL 20814. Introduction to African American Literature

(3-0-3)

A survey of 300 years of African American literature.

ENGL 20819. “Black Arts”: Figuring the African Diaspora

(3-0-3)

This course offers a survey of black diasporic artistry. At the same time, it is an ongoing analysis of how these artists asked, “what constitutes the African diaspora” in divergent and convergent ways. The main goal of the course is not simply to label certain artists as part of this diasporic formation, but to understand how artists reflected upon their participation in it (and, in some ways, outside of it). We will focus primarily on this conversation’s development from the inter-war period of the 20th century to the turn of the 21st century through poetry, prose fiction and nonfiction, film, television, and dance. From the United States, we will look at how creative intellectuals such as the poet Langston Hughes, dancer and anthropologist Katherine Dunham, novelist and anthropologist Zora Neale Hurston, fiction writer and essayist Richard Wright, and journalist Alex Haley used art to understand their relationship to black peoples in the Caribbean, Europe, and Africa, along with key events impacting those different geographies. But the course will also consider how black creative intellectuals outside the United States reflected on their relationship to the diaspora. These will include Algerian philosopher Frantz Fanon, Cuban poet Nicolás Guillén, Nigerian musician Fela Kuti, and Pulitzer-Prize winning poet Derek Walcott. In exploring different conceptions of diaspora, we will encounter other themes including the idea of overlapping diasporas, black nationalism, the body, and the significance of translation to cultural solidarity and difference.

ENGL 20820. Contemporary Black Literature

(3-0-3)

A survey of late-20th-century black literature in the United States and its relation to other ethnic literatures.

ENGL 20821. Latino Literatures

(3-0-3)

A survey of Latino fiction, poetry, and other literary works.

ENGL 20838. Twentieth-Century American Feminist Fiction

(3-0-3) Brogan

Close readings of major 20th-century novels, written by both men and women, which may be described as “feminist.”

ENGL 20900. Postmodern Fiction

(3-0-3)

This course will explore some of the most playful and ingenious fiction of the late-20th century, drawing its inspiration from critic and author John Barth's influential essay, The Literature of Exhaustion. We will first gain an understanding of the concept of postmodernism before moving on to Barth's essays and short stories. Next, we will read stories from one of the earliest and most influential postmodern writers, Argentinean Jorge Luis Borges. We will read a deceptively simple short novel by Barth's ideal postmodern writer, Italian author Italo Calvino. We then move on to the predominantly French experimental fiction group, Oulipo, and will read a sample of the novels, stories, and poems they produced using inventive mathematical techniques and strict constraints. We will then consider the idea of self-conscious fiction, or metafiction, through a novel by Paul Auster. Lastly we turn to the short-short stories known as ‘flash fiction’ of Lydia Davis and Donald Barthelme. All foreign texts are translated into English. The course requirements include an in-class presentation on a topic related to the course materials, a midterm take home exam, one 5- to 6-page paper on common metaphorical themes, and one 5- to 6-page critical review. Students who have completed the University requirement in Italian may elect to register for a one credit Language Across the Curriculum discussion section. Students choosing this option will do approximately 10–15 pages of additional reading per week, in Italian, and complete brief reflection papers. The LAC discussion section will be graded on a pass/fail basis and credited to the student's transcript. Up to three LAC credits may be applied toward a major or minor in Italian.

(3-0-3)

Presumes no previous background in linguistics. We will begin the course with technical aspects of linguistics, such as phonetic transcription, morphology, and syntax, as a necessary foundation for examining the historical and structural development of the English language (including the varieties of contemporary American dialects). In the last half of the semester, we will consider the applications of linguistics to the study of literature and will conclude with the pedagogical implications to the teaching of English, especially if ethnic dialects (primarily, in this instance, Ebonics) are considered. Assignments include a midterm (30 percent), a final (30 percent), one long paper (20 percent), and several exercises (20 percent).

ENGL 20903. Introduction to Post-Colonial Literature

(3-0-3)

Traces the development of literatures from the former colonies of various empires, but principally the British and French

ENGL 20950. Multicultural China in Contemporary Fiction

(3-0-3)

This course showcases the multifaceted aspects of China, not only in the ethnic sense, but also in the political sense. We will read literary works by writers of different ethnic backgrounds (e.g., Han, Tibetan, the Atayal tribe from Taiwan) and geographical origins (the PRC, Taiwan and Hong Kong). The objective of this course is to help students to gain a deeper understanding of the notion of “Greater China” and the concept of “Chineseness.” Through analyzing works by different ethnic writers, we will learn to appreciate the diversity of Chinese culture that is often overshadowed by a misconception about Chinese homogeneity. Likewise, fictional creation by writers from the three regions will give us a broader knowledge of Chinese culture that is constantly threatened by a political need for unity. This course is taught in English, and no prior knowledge of the Chinese language is required.

ENGL 20952. The Samurai in Classical Japanese Literature

(3-0-3)

The sword-wielding samurai warrior is perhaps the most familiar icon of pre-modern Japan, one that continues to influence how Japanese think of themselves and how others think of Japan even in modern times. Who were the samurai? How did they see themselves? How did other members of Japanese society see them in the past? How did the role and the image of the samurai change over time? To answer these questions, we will explore the depiction of samurai in various kinds of texts: episodes from quasi-historical chronicles, 14th-century Noh plays, 17th-century short stories, and 18th-century Kabuki and puppet plays (many Kabuki plays, a theater of live actors, were first written for the puppet theater). While some of these texts emphasize themes of loyalty, honor, and military prowess, others focus on the problems faced by samurai in their domestic lives during times of peace. The last part of the course will be devoted to the most famous of all stories, “The Revenge of the 47 Samurai.” Students will read eyewitness accounts of this vendetta, which occurred in 1702, and then explore how the well-known Kabuki/puppet play Chushingura (A Treasury of Loyal Retainers, 1748) dramatizes the conflicting opinions surrounding it. All readings will be English translation and no previous knowledge of Japan is required.

ENGL 21001. National Cinema: Irish Cinema/Culture Lab

(0-3-0)

Film lab/coreq for ENGL 20502.

ENGL 22514. Introduction to Irish Writers/Discussion

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: ENGL 20513

Corequisite discussion section for ENGL 20513.

ENGL 27999. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Independent study under the direction of a faculty member.

ENGL 30101. Introduction to Literary Studies

(3-0-3)

A seminar-style course introducing beginning English majors to the critical skills necessary to analyze, interpret, and appreciate literary works of different kinds and eras.

ENGL 30110. British Literary Traditions I

(3-0-3)

This course is an intensive survey of literary history in England from the seventh to the 17th centuries. Early British literature is anything but dull: dragon fights, scatological humor, scheming devils, cross-dressing, seduction poetry—it's all here. You'll learn about major periods and authors during this long history, about changes in the English language, about the development of genres, and about key questions with which writers struggled. You will also learn how to read poetry well. To accomplish these goals, you must make three commitments: to read carefully with an openness to the power and pleasure of early literature, to express freely your thoughts about what you read, and to write (and rewrite) with passion and precision. Course requirements will likely include several 4- to 5-page essays, short take-home written assignments, occasional quizzes, an oral class presentation, and a final examination.

ENGL 30111. British Literary Traditions II

(3-0-3)

Intensive survey of British writers and literary forms of the 18th and 19th centuries.

ENGL 30115. American Literary Traditions I

(3-0-3)

Introduction to American literature from its beginnings through the Civil War, emphasizing important figures, literary forms, and cultural movements.

ENGL 30116. American Literary Traditions II

(3-0-3)

Introduction to American literature from the Civil War through the 20th century, emphasizing important figures, literary forms, and cultural movements.

ENGL 30120. Satire: Jonathan Swift to Jon Stewart

(3-0-3)

A study of literary satire from the early 18th century to the present with some attention to visual satire and current popular culture. Authors to be studied will certainly include Jonathan Swift, Alexander Pope, Voltaire, William Blake, Mark Twain, Dorothy Parker, Nathanael West, and probably one or more of the following: Aldous Huxley, Langston Hughes, George Orwell, Don DeLillo, and T. C. Boyle. Some of the questions we will consider are: Does great satire, which is often highly historical, complicate ideas of art as timeless or universal? How does satire differ from comedy and irony, while frequently incorporating both? Is satire fundamentally a form of moral engagement or anarchistic play? What links aggression and laughter in verbal art? What do traditional satires tell about recent phenomena such as the Daily Show and Colbert Report—and vice versa?

Meet—or reacquaint yourself with—Shakespeare in a class that will examine his works from both literary and performative perspectives. Close textual readings of the plays will find realization in class performances of scenes and soliloquies. Co-taught by a former chair of Princeton's English Department and a professional actor trained in London and the United States.

ENGL 30390. Introduction to Irish Writers

Corequisite: IRL 32109

This course introduces undergraduate students to Irish literature, explores its dominant themes and motifs, and surveys canonical texts and major authors from the 18th century to the present day. A broad range of texts and genres—poetry, novels, short stories, folklore, and drama—are studied from a historical and cultural perspective and in relation to transnational literary trends and movements. Attention is also paid to modernization and tradition as well as post-colonialism, feminism, and censorship. No prior knowledge of Ireland or the Irish language is required. Irish-language texts will be available in translation.

ENGL 30850. Fiction Writing/English Majors

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ENGL 30101 OR ENGL 30301 OR ENGL 30302 OR ENGL 30303 OR ENGL 30304 OR ENGL 30305 OR ENGL 30306 OR ENGL 30307 OR ENGL 30308 OR ENGL 30309 OR ENGL 30310 OR ENGL 30311 OR ENGL 30312 OR ENGL 30313 OR ENGL 30314 OR ENGL 30315 OR ENGL 30316 OR ENGL 30317 OR ENGL 30318 OR ENGL 30319 OR ENGL 30320 OR ENGL 30321 OR ENGL 30325

An intensive fiction workshop exclusively for English majors.

ENGL 30852. Poetry Writing for Majors

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ENGL 30101 OR ENGL 30301 OR ENGL 30302 OR ENGL 30303 OR ENGL 30304 OR ENGL 30305 OR ENGL 30306 OR ENGL 30307 OR ENGL 30308 OR ENGL 30309 OR ENGL 30310 OR ENGL 30311 OR ENGL 30312 OR ENGL 30313 OR ENGL 30314 OR ENGL 30315 OR ENGL 30316 OR ENGL 30317 OR ENGL 30318 OR ENGL 30319 OR ENGL 30320 OR ENGL 30321 OR ENGL 30325

A intensive poetry workshop exclusively for English majors.

ENGL 32110. British Literary Traditions I/Discussion

Corequisite: ENGL 30110

Coreq discussion session for ENGL 30110.

ENGL 40011. Television as a Storytelling Medium

(3-0-3) Becker

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Corequisite: ENGL 41011

In a communications world dominated by visual culture, television has become society's primary storyteller. Stories are packaged and presented for our consumption in scripted dramas and sitcoms, unscripted reality shows and docudramas, news broadcasts and sporting events, and even commercials and promos. Through exploring the structures, methods, meanings, and impacts of television's various narrative forms, this course will consider how the medium of television enables creators and viewers to tap into the fundamental cultural practice of storytelling. Across the semester, students will read theories of narratology and assessments of television's narrative techniques, screen a variety of narrative examples (chiefly from American television, though some non-American television might be screened), and write their own critical analyses of television's storytelling practices.

ENGL 40103. Images of War and Peace in Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Using English-language novels and poetry of the 20th century, an examination of the metaphors and themes that unmask the realities of war, and how the texts themselves become battlegrounds on which the human imagination both creates an individual's sense of self and constructs and deconstructs cultural ideologies.

ENGL 40104. Dramatic Literature Since 1900

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced survey of theatrical literature and criticism since the beginning of the 20th century. Students will read one to two plays per week along with selected secondary critical literature.

ENGL 40107. Religion and Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A consideration of the forms, ideas, and preoccupations of the religious imagination in literature and of the historical relationships between religious faith and traditions and particular literary works. The conflicts and tensions between modern gnosticism, in literature and ideology, and the sacramental imagination will constitute a recurring point of focus. We will also lend special attention to the vision and imagery of the journey and wayfarer and the conflicts and affinities between private and communal expressions of faith. Readings will be selected from the following: Criticism by Tolstoy, T.S. Eliot, John Gardner, Flannery O'Connor, Hillis Miller, Elie Wiesel, Martha Nussbaum, Wayne Booth, George Steiner, and others on the relations among ethics, religion, and literature; selections from the Bible, Dante, and saints' lives; Emily Dickinson, Final Harvest; Roth, Job; Kazantzakis, Saint Francis; Melville, Billy Budd, Sailor; DeVries, The Blood of the Lamb; Greene, The Power and the Glory and The End of the Affair; Wiesel, Night; Dostoevsky, Crime and Punishment; Emerson, Sermon on the Lord's Supper; selected O'Connor short stories or The Violent Bear It Away; selected Updike short stories and criticism; Weil, Waiting for God; Singer, "Gimpel the Fool" and other stories; Bernanos, Diary of a Country Priest; Bergman (director), The Seventh Seal; and Hemingway, The Old Man and the Sea.

ENGL 40108. Dramatic Literature Before 1900

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced survey of theatrical literature and criticism from the earliest plays to the beginning of the 20th century. Students will read one to two plays per week along with selected secondary critical literature.

ENGL 40110. Studies in Comedy

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A multimedia examination of recurring patterns and themes in comedy.

ENGL 40112. Understanding Story

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101*Corequisite:* ENGL 41001

An investigation of the shape(s), purposes, and multiple meanings of narratives both in the lives of individuals and within institutions and cultures by sampling the work of journalists in reporting news as story, medical professionals in collecting case histories, ethnographers in describing unfamiliar cultural practices or investigating inter-group or inter-state conflict situations, historians in interpreting the past, political leaders in establishing public policy and political power, and advertising and marketing interests.

ENGL 40113. Literature of Southern Africa

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the literary culture of Southern Africa in the last 25 years of the 20th century, specifically the ways in which individual writers confronted the apartheid regime and their responses to the new South Africa in the post-apartheid period.

ENGL 40114. Modern Jewish Writers

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of influential 20th-century Jewish writers in Europe and the United States.

ENGL 40115. Bible and Literary Theory

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An intense focus on the distinctive poetic and literary qualities of the English translation of the Bible (King James Version) through close formal analysis and through discussions of theme, image, myth, and narrative form.

ENGL 40117. Christian Autobiography

(5-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course examines three major yet very different attempts at Christian autobiography: St Augustine's Confessions, St. Teresa of Avila's Life, and John Henry Newman's Apologia pro vita sua. Throughout, we will attend to three demands: a close reading of the texts themselves, including their narrative and rhetorical structures; an sense of how the self is imagined by the three writers; and an awareness of the authors' religious contexts.

ENGL 40118. Philosophy and Literature Seminar

(4-0-4)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This intensive 4-credit seminar is the introduction to the concentration in philosophy and literature and will pursue interdisciplinary approaches to literary, theoretical, and philosophical texts.

ENGL 40121. The Art and Literature of Metamorphosis

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course begins with a critical study of Ovid's great poem, the "Metamorphosis." The poem itself became a subject of metamorphosis in poetry and art in the hands of such figures as Statius, Dante, Botticelli, Bernini, Rembrandt, Hughes, and Heaney. The course addresses the modeling of transformation within the literary text by examining first Ovid and his sources, and second, adaptations of his poem by writers such as Shakespeare and Kafka. Connections with folklore, magic, and religion are explored. The graphic arts receive equal consideration as the course explores how Ovid's ideas of the transformation of the body, the capacity of the human body for allegory, and the fragility of identity have influenced later artists and authors.

ENGL 40126. Writing From Prison

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An historical exploration of fiction, poetry, and nonfiction written by persons rightly and wrongly incarcerated.

ENGL 40127. Love and the Novel

(3-0-3) Doody

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with The Symposium and ending with selected modernist writings, how Eros has appeared and been expressed in the West.

ENGL 40128. Twentieth-Century International Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of masterpieces of 20th-century international poetry, including, among others, the works of Federico Garcia Lorca, Georg Trakl, Paul Celan, Rainer Maria Rilke, Boris Pasternak, Osip Mandelstam, Gennady Agyi, Gunnar Ekelof, Thomas Transtromer, Paul Eluard, and Dylan Thomas.

ENGL 40129. Literary Texts in Context

(5-0-3) Harris

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will investigate the relationship between literary works and their cultural and historical context, focusing specifically on how the expansion (and, eventually, disintegration) of the British Empire influenced literary production. By looking at how the literary text reflects or transforms the ideas behind it, we will work toward an understanding of how and why literature becomes and remains culturally significant.

ENGL 40132. Novel Graphics and Graphic Novels

(3-0-3) McSweeney

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will explore novel combinations of image and text in various genres and from various periods and parts of the world. The purpose of this wide-ranging analysis will be to fuel creative projects of our own. Potential genres under study will include poster art, collage, photo-essays, performance notation, cartography, hypertext, illumination, artist's books, and, of course, the graphic novel. Course work will include brief homework responses, creative projects exploring the genres and media under study, presentations on works from the University Special Collections and online archives, and a final project requiring you to draw on course examples to develop a hybrid format of your own.

ENGL 40135. Literature of Late-Medieval England

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will survey various kinds of late medieval English writing, from the chivalric romance, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, to the dream vision, Piers Plowman, to the spiritual autobiography of Margery Kempe. We will focus on the language of the period, reading several of these texts in Middle English or in facing-page translations, as well as relevant aspects of medieval culture, its modes of representation, its literary genres, and its social and political conflicts.

ENGL 40141. Psychoanalysis and Literature

(3-0-3) Ellmann

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course examines psychoanalytic approaches to literature with a focus on the Freudian tradition. We will begin by reading selections from Freud's writings on dreams, sexuality, creativity, and art, in connection with literary works, such as Poe's "The Purloined Letter," Henry James's The Turn of the Screw, Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes stories, and Conrad's Heart of Darkness, which have inspired controversial psychoanalytic readings. Drama (e.g., Hamlet) and poetry

(e.g. T.S. Eliot) will also be explored. In addition we will read selections from later psychoanalysts, such as Melanie Klein, Donald Winnicott, Jacques Lacan, and Adam Phillips, and literary theorists such as Slavoj Žižek, who have brought psychoanalysis and literature together in exciting new ways. At the end of the course, we will turn our attention to psychoanalysis and film, focusing on Alfred Hitchcock's movies.

ENGL 40157. Between Religion and Literature: Meaning, Vulnerability, and the Human Existence

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course explores the contribution that the coming together of theological and literary reflection can make to our understanding of the nature of meaning. Focusing on the work of Augustine, Aquinas, Dante, Primo Levi, Dostoevsky and Shakespeare, students will address questions such as “What is it we are doing when speaking, reading, or using language?” “How do the intellect and the imagination work in relation to literary texts?” “How might all this relate to our ways of thinking about God, human nature, and the relationship between them?” Such questions will be addressed, in particular, through reflection on how the texts studied invite us to think about the nature of love, forgiveness, vulnerability, and creativity.

ENGL 40160. Political Poetry

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

What is political poetry, and what has it been? In what ways does political poetry interact with the “real”? What shape has political poetry taken in the past? What shape might it take in the future? This course is designed to provide multiple, competing answers to these questions. Course texts will include plays, manifestos, broadsides, and websites. Coursework will include brief responses, creative and collaborative projects, performances, presentations, and formal papers.

ENGL 40170. History and Theory of Literary Criticism

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The evolution of modern literary criticism.

ENGL 40180. Performance Art: History, Theory, Practice

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Performance art is anti-art. Performance art is art that contradicts tradition, that aims to shock. This class will equip the student with an overview of its offenses. Class content may include Dada's early-20th-century assaults on the audience; Absurdist experimental performance works by Yoko Ono, Lygia Clark, John Cage, and Nam June Paik from the 1960s; performance art addressing racism by Adrian Piper and William Pope L. from the 1980s; and current performance works by Internet artists and others. Discussions will focus on the aesthetics and politics of marginality. In other words, why shock? Why experiment? Is there any market for such work today? We will also look at critical and theoretical texts about performance, modernism, and the avant-garde and consider their relation to the works themselves. These may include manifestos by performers and artists; debates about the autonomy of art; poststructuralist writings on art and aesthetics; and theories of performativity. Finally, students will be expected to create one or more performance art pieces themselves. Students should expect to be asked to participate in other students' pieces as well as in their own.

ENGL 40190. Literacy, Schooling, Society

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of several histories of education, with particular emphasis on English studies, and how these histories have helped to shape culture.

ENGL 40191. Perspectives on Literacy

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

What it means to be “literate” and the conditions that enable literacy to flourish.

ENGL 40192. Introduction to Linguistics

(3-0-3) Brogan

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of both the technical aspects of linguistics (phonetic transcription, morphology, syntax, etc.) as they relate to the development of the English language and the applications of linguistics to the study of literature.

ENGL 40193. Classical Rhetoric in Our Time

(3-0-3) Duffy

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of the history of rhetoric.

ENGL 40194. Writing Center Theory/Practice

(1-0-1)

A 1-credit course for students interested in tutoring in the University Writing Program.

ENGL 40195. The Literature of Disability

(3-0-3) Duffy

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

“This new critical perspective (disability studies) conceptualizes disability as a representational system rather than a medical problem, a discursive construction rather than a personal misfortune or a bodily flaw, and a subject appropriate for wide-ranging cultural analysis within the humanities instead of an applied field within medicine, rehabilitation, or social work. Such an approach focuses its analysis, then, on how disability is imagined, specifically on the figures and narratives that comprise the cultural context in which we know ourselves and one another.”—Rosemarie Garland Thomson, The Beauty and the Freak, p. 181. What is disability? What does it mean to be considered disabled? What is the relationship of disability to what is thought to be “non-disabled” or “normal”? In this course, we will consider writings and films about disability and individuals labeled disabled. Our readings will include fiction and nonfiction works about people with various physical and cognitive disabilities, including blindness, multiple sclerosis, autism, and others. We will explore the ways in which the disabled have been represented in such works, and the rhetorical resources for constructing “disability” in literature, nonfiction, and film. We will consider the ways in which writers considered disabled write about themselves, telling their own stories, and the ways in which these writings may complicate, subvert, or defy conventional representations of the disabled. In exploring these and related issues, we will consider the implications of disability for individuals and society.

ENGL 40196. The Teaching of Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A theory- and practice-based course in the teaching of writing to junior and high school students.

ENGL 40197. Questions of Homosexuality in Film and Literature

(3-0-3) Jerez-Farran

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will introduce students to many of the critical perspectives and theories that enliven contemporary literary and cultural studies on gay and lesbian film and literature. Throughout the semester we will examine a collection of films and literary texts by self-identified gay and lesbian writers and/or by authors who deal with gay and lesbian themes and characters, irrespective of their sexual identity. Through the analysis of the selected texts we will also examine the history, politics, and theoretical arguments both current and historical that deal with homosexuality to see how this human phenomenon and its cultural expression has affected and been affected by heterosexual culture and the conflicts that have arisen between them. We will also explore how sexual and gender norms are constructed historically and culturally; how sexual and gender norms affect gay, lesbian, and heterosexual people's development and self-perception; and how new definitions and theories of human sexuality generated by gay and lesbian individuals and communities present alternatives to dominant heterosexist traditions. One of the main objectives of this interdisciplinary course is to open intellectual dialogue, to broaden students' awareness of the human experience at the same time we acquaint ourselves with some of the most intellectually interesting works that have stemmed from gay inspiration. Films to be studied will include a selection from the following list: Beautiful Thing (Hettie Macdonald); Boys don't Cry (Kimberly Pearce); Brokeback Mountain (Ang Lee); Love's the Devil (John Maybury); Saving Face (Alice Wu); Stage Beauty (Richard Eyre); All About My Mother (Pedro Almodóvar); Another Gay Movie (Todd Stephens); Nico and Dani (Francesc Gay); and The Celluloid Closet (Rob Epstein). Literary texts will include most of the following: Walt Whitman's Calamus poems, Virginia Woolf's Orlando, and others.

ENGL 40201. Chaucer and the City

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the idea of "the city" in Chaucer's work by looking at the cities he does represent (Troy, London) in his work, by examining his relationship to urban forms of cultural expression (mystery cycles, mummings, processions), and by investigating city life in 14th-century London.

ENGL 40202. Arthurian Legends

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of the textual traditions surrounding the once-and-future-king, Arthur, through readings of Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain, Chretien de Troyes' The Story of the Grail, The Quest of the Holy Grail, selected short fictions from the Welsh Mabinogion, Marie de France's Lais, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, and selections from Malory's Morte D'Arthur, Tennyson's Idylls of the King, and T.H. White's The Once and Future King.

ENGL 40205. Shakespeare and the Supernatural

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of the supernatural in Shakespeare.

ENGL 40206. Advanced Topics in Theatre Studies

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ENGL 41206

This course explores the phenomenon of Shakespeare and film, concentrating on the ranges of meaning provoked by the conjunction. We shall be looking at examples of films of Shakespeare plays both early and recent, both in English and in other languages, and both ones that stick close to conventionalized and historicized conceptualizations of Shakespeare and adaptations at varying degrees of distance towards the erasure of Shakespeare from the text. The transposition of different forms of Shakespearean textualities (printed, theatrical, filmic) and the confrontation with the specificities of film produce a cultural phenomenon whose cultural meanings—meaning as Shakespeare and meaning as film—will be the subject of our investigations. There will be regular (though not necessarily weekly) screenings of the films to be studied.

ENGL 40208. British Drama 1660–1775

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of British dramatic literature created between the Restoration of Charles II in 1660 to the production of Sheridan's The Rivals in 1775.

ENGL 40209. Chaucer: Canterbury Tales

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An introductory study of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, this course will cover a range of genres (romance, fabliau, saint's life, mock-epic, legend, dream vision and allegory). We will read Chaucer's texts in the original language and examine the historical, literary, and cultural contexts of his poetry, exploring themes such as popular piety, anticlerical satire, women's issues, courtly love, magic, and social unrest.

ENGL 40211. History of the English Language

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course is designed to introduce students to the historical development of the English language, from its earliest recorded appearance to its current state as a world language.

ENGL 40212. Old English

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Training in reading the Old English language and study of the literature written in Old English.

ENGL 40215. Milton

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course includes close readings of Milton's work, from all stages of his career, and discussions of his highly self-conscious attempt to make himself into England's greatest poet.

ENGL 40217. Tudor-Stuart Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of Tudor-Stuart drama.

ENGL 40218. Renaissance and Romantic Lyric

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the development of lyric poetry from the late 16th century up through the mid-19th century.

ENGL 40219. Chaucer: Canterbury Tales

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Chaucer's masterwork, studied in its original Middle English.

ENGL 40220. Love and Gender in the Renaissance

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Examining works by Sydney, Spenser, Shakespeare, Marvell, Donne, and others, this course discusses how cultural understandings of gender influence the depiction of love.

ENGL 40221. Beowulf: Text and Culture

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Using a glossed text of Beowulf in Old English, an examination of a wide range of critical and cultural issues: What relationship do we expect between "heroic" texts and the society that produced and enjoyed them? What cultural investments of our own lead us to read certain Old English texts and not others? How did Beowulf receive canonical status? What is a translation? And what strategies of reading can we bring to a thousand-year-old poem?

ENGL 40222. Medieval Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the literary, theatrical, and religious imaginations of medieval dramatic texts through readings, critical writing, discussion, and enactments of these texts.

ENGL 40223. Dante II

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical and literary context, with selected readings from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, and De vulgari Eloquentia). Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation.

ENGL 40224. Dante

(3-0-3) Werge

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of The Divine Comedy, in translation with facing Italian text, with special attention to the history of ideas, the nature of mimesis and allegory, and Dante's sacramental vision of life. We will also consider the influence of Augustine's Confessions on Dante's imagination and experience and read selections from the Fioretti, or Little Flowers of St. Francis, and from such later figures as Teresa of Avila as well as modern writers—including T.S. Eliot—for whom Dante constitutes a powerful presence. Readings: Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso, trans. John D. Sinclair (Oxford); St. Augustine, Confessions.

ENGL 40226. Shakespeare I

(3-0-3) Lander

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

First half of a yearlong survey of the works of Shakespeare, beginning with Two Gentlemen of Verona and concluding with Henry V.

ENGL 40227. Shakespeare II

(3-0-3) Lander

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course we will read, in roughly chronological order, the plays from the second half of Shakespeare's career as dramatist. Beginning with Julius Caesar and concluding with Two Noble Kinsmen, we will cover 19 plays over the course of the semester. Though we will read several comedies, the syllabus is dominated by the mature tragedies—Hamlet, Othello, Lear, and Macbeth—and late romances Pericles, Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest. This course is paired with Shakespeare I (fall 2004), which covers the first half of the Shakespeare canon (though Shakespeare I is not a prerequisite for this course). Requirements will include a midterm, a final, several passage analyses, and one 5-7-page paper.

ENGL 40228. Restoration, Early-Eighteenth Century-Literature

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Questions of the developing interest in the concept of "human nature" in late 17th- and early 18th-century literature: What does it mean to be human? Are humans "animals"? Are humans "naturally" selfish or benevolent? Are gender differences natural or cultural? What sort of obligations do humans have to the rest of the creation? What is the relation of the sort of innocence that the pope imagined as "the eternal sunshine of the spotless mind" to mature development?

ENGL 40229. Shakespeare's Religions

(3-0-3) Lander

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A critical analysis of religious influences and iconography in selected Shakespeare plays.

ENGL 40230. Shakespeare's London

(3-0-3) Lander

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An analysis of how Shakespeare's migrations between rural England and metropolitan London affected his writings.

ENGL 40231. Renaissance Woman

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It will treat the subject of the "Renaissance woman" in three ways. First, there will be a brief historical overview of the condition of women of different social classes during this period, focusing on topics such as their education, the role of marriage, and the convent as an alternative to married life. Secondly, it will survey how women were viewed in the literature written by men in various European countries. Here we shall read excerpts from Dante and the courtly love tradition, Petrarch and the Petrarchists, Shakespeare, and Rabelais, among others. We shall also consider the portrayal of women in artistic works of this time, comparing this to their literary representation. Next, we shall study the literature created by women during the Renaissance in Europe. During this part of the course, we shall consider some of the problems generated by women's writing, using Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own as a point of departure for our discussions. At the end of the course, we will resume our study of the image of woman in the Renaissance by reading a modern play set at that time (Peter Whelan's The Herbal Bed on the trial of Shakespeare's daughter) that treats some of the issues facing women at that time. All foreign texts will be read in English translation.

ENGL 40232. Shakespeare Media: Book and Screen

(5-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will cover not only standard film versions of the plays but also adaptations and appropriations in order to examine the way in which Shakespeare circulates in popular and elite culture. Likely films include: Olivier's Hamlet and The Last Action Hero (with Arnold Schwarzenegger); Zeffirelli's Romeo and Juliet, Luhrmann's Romeo + Juliet, and Shakespeare in Love; Polanski's Macbeth and Billy Morrissette's Scotland, PA; Derek Jarman's The Tempest and Peter Greenaway's Prospero's Books. In each case, we will begin with a reading of the play before moving on to film versions and adaptations.

ENGL 40234. The Renaissance Imagination: Thinking with Spenser and Shakespeare

(3-0-3) Monta

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course focuses intensely on two of the Renaissance period's most influential writers—William Shakespeare and Edmund Spenser. Both writers engage deeply with the imaginative work that fiction can do in addressing the deepest desires and fears; both theorize the imagination's powers as well as its distortions and limitations. Through an intensive study of these writers, students will learn to reflect carefully on their own reading and interpretive processes, as well as on the capacities and horizons of imaginative writing itself.

ENGL 40241. Book Under Suspicion: Censorship and Freedom of Expression in Medieval English Literature

(3-0-3) Kerby-Fulton

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Late-medieval writers operated in a world distressed by social injustice, political oppression and church controversy. Although this period saw the rise of modern English literature itself, it was also a time when starving peasants rebelled against their overlords, knights rode off on crusade amidst anti-war critique, English translations of the Bible were suppressed, women mystics struggled to be heard amidst gender prejudice, and the king Chaucer worked for was deposed and murdered. This course will examine how the major writers of late-medieval England negotiated these troubled waters, writing sometimes candidly and sometimes secretly about dangerous or disturbing matters. Authors to be studied will include Geoffrey Chaucer, William Langland, the Wakefield Master playwright, Julian of Norwich, Margery Kempe, and Marguerite Porete (the only medieval woman author to have been burned at the stake for her writings). The aim is to help illuminate how literary writers sought to defend or enlarge their religious or political orthodoxies in response to the challenges of the time.

ENGL 40250. Medieval Visions

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of medieval literature, excluding Chaucer.

ENGL 40251. Everybody's Shakespeare

(3-0-3) Brogan

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course we will read several of Shakespeare's plays (including tragedies, comedies, and romances), as well as a number of contemporary "re-visions" of those works by authors of varying cultural, ethnic, or gender backgrounds. The purpose of this course will consequently be fourfold: first, to gain an in-depth understanding of one of our most important writers, particularly in relation to his own time period; second, to discover what qualities, vision, dilemmas, and/or artistry keep this author very much alive; third, to examine the various ways in which contemporary authors are modifying, if not codifying Shakespeare's work in their own important new works; and last, to develop the critical skills and vocabulary for discussing and writing about these issues and texts. At the end of the course, you should have a firm grasp of several important literary works, from the Renaissance to the 20th century, a sophisticated idea of how literature both reifies and resists seminal literature that has come before it, and finally a sense of how the issues raised in this literary "confluence" are important in the actual world and in our lives.

ENGL 40252. Honors Seminar: Shakespeare

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101*Corequisite:* ENGL 41002

This course aims to teach honors students research methods, project development and advanced writing techniques through an examination of Shakespeare, primarily—though not necessarily exclusively—in relation to performance. Students will research performances past, visit theatre productions/see films present, and imagine performances future. They will read and research extensively in the materials of Shakespeare performance and its critical literature. Students will consider different approaches to Shakespeare performance, including bibliographical, historical, nationalist, generic, feminist, and queer methodologies. Students will also consider the forms of representation of performance in Shakespeare editing and the work of selected actors, directors and designers. The lab will not be used every week but will be available for screenings of Shakespeare films.

ENGL 40260. Swift and the Arts

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of the ways in which Jonathan Swift regarded the non-literary arts in 18th-century Ireland and England—gardening, music, architecture, and painting—and how his views on those art forms are reflected in his poetry and prose.

ENGL 40302. Romanticism and the Public Theatre

(3-0-3) Kucich

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Readings of drama written during the English Romantic period.

ENGL 40306. Irish and British Literature, 1790–1815

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Burke, Paine, Godwin, Wordsworth, Edgeworth, and Scott in the context of the French Revolution and the Irish political situation at the end of the 18th century.

ENGL 40307. European Modernist Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An introduction to modernism as it formed in Europe.

ENGL 40309. Love and the Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with The Symposium and ending with selected modernist writings, how Eros has appeared and been expressed in the West.

ENGL 40310. Visits to Bedlam

(3-0-3) Fox

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Literary, medical, and social views of madness in the 18th century.

ENGL 40312. The Nineteenth-Century Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course is an examination of major Victorian novels.

ENGL 40314. Hopkins and the Jesuits

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close reading of Hopkins's major poems, and a careful attention to their literary and religious contexts.

ENGL 40317. The Victorian National Romance

(3-0-3) Maurer

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

By examining texts from the different nations within the British Isles—Scotland, Ireland, and England—we will explore the complex question of how national boundaries are drawn, how a sense of membership in a nation is created, and what that might have to do with falling in love, getting married, and staying married.

ENGL 40318. Religious Poetry: Herbert and Hopkins

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close examination of the religious origins and underpinnings in, and of, the poetry of Herbert and Hopkins.

ENGL 40319. Virtue, Sex, and the Good Life

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A thematic analysis of "virtue" in selected 18th-century novels: How should I behave? Am I completely independent or should I rely on the advice of others? Am I defined by my birth or do I make myself? If "virtue" is a guide, what exactly is "virtue"? Is virtue really possible in a highly mobile society that values change above stability?

ENGL 40324. Garden to Ecosystem: Nature Poetry, 1650–2008

(3-0-3) Sitter

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the changing role of the natural world in the poetic imagination of English and American writers from Andrew Marvell and James Thomson to Denise Levertov and Gary Snyder. Other writers to be studied may include Charlotte Smith, William Wordsworth, John Clare, Emily Dickinson, G.M. Hopkins, Thomas Hardy, Robert Frost, Robinson Jeffers, Ted Hughes, Maxine Kumin, Seamus Heaney, Mary Oliver, and Pattiann Rogers. Attention to the history of the idea of nature and ecological awareness as well as to poetic representation and expression.

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of "decadence" as both a fin-de-siècle fashion-craze of debauched poets and as a more expansive critique of European modernity itself.

ENGL 40329. Studies in Romanticism

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close examination of the literary movement known as Romanticism.

ENGL 40330. The Victorian City

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

How "the city" was depicted in 19th-century British Literature.

ENGL 40331. Victorian Radicals

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

"Fringe" characters in, and elements of British Victorian literature, with a particular emphasis on a modern world being increasingly defined in economic terms.

ENGL 40332. Reforming Victorian Literature

(3-0-3) Vanden Bossche

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The Victorian critic and poet Matthew Arnold complained about one of his own poems that it depicted a situation in which "suffering finds no vent in action." This complaint expressed a characteristic Victorian belief that literature should imagine possibilities for action—for social change, transformation, or reform. In this course, we will explore how Victorian authors sought to create literary works that would reform the members of their audience and, in turn, the society in which they lived. In addition, we will examine the various ways in which Victorian writers sought to re-form literature, creating new literary forms and forming old ones anew, in order to achieve this aim. We will study works by Matthew Arnold, Robert Browning, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Thomas Carlyle, Charles Dickens, George Eliot, John Henry Newman, Christina Rossetti, John Ruskin, Alfred Tennyson, and others. Prior to the start of the semester, an online syllabus will be posted at nd.edu/~cvandenb.

ENGL 40333. Romanticism and Revolution

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The relationship between the Romantic movement and rebellions against governments around the world.

ENGL 40336. Seducers, Stalkers and Women with Guns: The Romantic Novel in the 1790s

(3-0-3) Joshua

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

When Lionel reflects, in Charlotte Smith's Desmond (1792), "I found that if I would really satisfy myself with a certain view of Geraldine, I must seek some spot, where, from its elevation, I could, by means of a small pocket telescope, have an uninterrupted view of these windows," and the eponymous heroine of Mary Hays's Memoirs of Emma Courtney (1796) observes, "I shall, I suspect, be impelled by an irresistible impulse to seek you. Though you have condemned my affection, my friendship will still follow you," they represent an extreme unrequited devotion that is part of the period's preoccupation with passion. The novel of the 1790s teems with rapists, stalkers, abusive employers, weeping men, and fighting women who confront prison, madness, murder, jealousy, and suicidal melancholy. This course aims to explore the significance of passion for understanding developments in the representation of femininity, masculinity, social virtue, and humanitarian reform at the end of the 18th century.

ENGL 40338. Victorian Places

(3-0-3) Maurer

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The British Victorians witnessed unprecedented urbanization, internal migration, and globalization. This course will survey how Victorians understood their relationship to place, how they changed their understanding of what even counted as place, and how literature mediated those understandings.

ENGL 40341. The Romantic Period 1780–1840

(3-0-3) Joshua

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive, / But to be young was very Heaven!" (William Wordsworth). One of the most exciting things about the Romantic period in Britain is its engagement with ideas and themes that attract the young: human rights, democracy, travel, satire, love, melancholy, and horror. We will sail with Coleridge's ancient mariner, walk the Lake District with William and Dorothy Wordsworth, peer into Percy Shelley's soul and luxuriate with Keats. We will discover what it means to see poetry as "indeed something divine" and poets as "the unacknowledged legislators of the world." We will learn the language of sensibility and understand how Marianne Dashwood's "effusions of sorrow," in Austen's Sense and Sensibility, and fit into a cult of writing on the expressive body. Why is John Clare so interested in birds' nests? Why are mountains "sublime" and ruins "picturesque"? Who is the "Man of Feeling"? Central themes will include Romantic historicism, revolutionary politics, the dissenting tradition, human rights, picturesque and sublime aesthetics, feminism, sensibility, experimentalism, Gothic literature, and travel writing. Key authors will include Jane Austen, William and Dorothy Wordsworth, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, William Blake, Percy and Mary Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft, William Godwin, John Keats, Robert Southey, John Clare, and William Hazlitt.

ENGL 40342. Romantic Ireland

(3-0-3) Campbell

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the Romantic theme in Irish literature from Edgeworth and Moore to the young Yeats and Joyce. This course will include poetry, fiction, drama, and aesthetics.

ENGL 40350. Dickens and Wilde

(3-0-3) Thomas

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This double-author course showcases two very different literary stylists of the Victorian period. Charles Dickens was the Shakespeare of his moment, a prolific creator of memorable characters and incidents, at once comic and tragic. But post-Victorian critics sometimes tend to see him as a prime exponent of Victorian earnestness, sentimentality, and even hypocrisy. And Oscar Wilde was, well, the Wilde of Victorian Britain: He was so dazzling that even those who wished to hate him often had to give up and laugh with him. But his life took a classically tragic form after his public humiliation and imprisonment for homosexual offences. Our goals: (1) to know some key historical differences between the early- and mid-Victorian moment of Dickens and the late-Victorian, fin-de-siècle moment of Wilde; and (2) to learn the various critical uses to which these two authors are put in our time. If we learn enough, we might discover the genuine complexity of Dickens's human vision and the surprising earnestness of Wilde's. Likely texts by Dickens are Oliver Twist, Bleak House, and Our Mutual Friend. Our reading in Wilde will emphasize his society comedies and his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray. Regularly graded coursework includes three papers and regular reading quizzes.

ENGL 40362. Hermeneutics, Deconstruction, and Medieval Thought

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The aims of this course are both methodological and historical. The methodological part will consist of an introduction to hermeneutics (in a broad sense) as theorized and/or practiced in certain areas of modern continental philosophy. After a brief look at the crucial innovations of Husserl, we shall study carefully chosen extracts (in English translation) of Heidegger Being and Time and What is Called Thinking; Gadamer, Truth and Method; and Derrida, Of Grammatology, Writing and Difference and Dissemination in order to illuminate the different (even opposing) ways in which the idea of "hermeneutics" can develop. This general discussion will be combined with specific consideration of the themes of allegory and negativity. The historical part of the course will concentrate on late ancient, patristic, and early medieval readings (Origen, On First Principles; Augustine, On Christian Teaching and Literal Interpretation of Genesis; and Proclus, Commentary on Plato's Timaeus). Here, we shall attempt to advance our comprehension of ancient literature by (1) looking for parallels with modern hermeneutic techniques, and (2) applying the modern techniques in test cases. The course is intended to be relatively open-ended; i.e., students will be expected to think about the way in which these discussions are internally coherent and also relate to their own areas of interest (which may be elsewhere in philosophy, theology, or literature (Latin or vernacular)). Requirement: one final essay of approximately 20 pages.

ENGL 40402. British India

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Depictions of India by British writers in the 19th and 20th centuries.

ENGL 40403. Studies in Modern Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course focuses on four highly important and innovative, though still often underrated, poets: Velimir Khlebnikov, Gertrude Stein, Mina Loy, and Miron Biazoszewski.

ENGL 40404. Early British Modernism

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An analysis of the early stages of British Modernism as the novel shifted (in some cases) away from the predominant forms of Victorian realism and toward the more experimental structures of the early 20th century.

ENGL 40405. Postmodern British Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Study of competing galaxies of late-20th-century British poets, for whom more than art was at stake: agendas of race, gender, region, class, and other cultural materials.

ENGL 40407. The Modern Revolution

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A focus on the first quarter of 20th-century British literature in order to tease out the relationships between revolutions in art and seismic social change.

ENGL 40408. Five Modern Poets

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of three British—David Jones, W.H. Auden, and Geoffrey Hill—and two Irish poets—W.B. Yeats and Seamus Heaney.

ENGL 40409. Readings in the Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101This course introduces students to “modernist” writing by familiarizing them with the period’s infamously groundbreaking texts, such as T.S. Eliot’s “The Waste Land,” Edith Sitwell’s façade, Hugh MacDiarmid’s A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle, and David Jones’s In Parenthesis. Contextual study of revolutions in the other arts—like painting and music—s well as of Britain’s “war culture” between 1914 and 1945 will illuminate the pressures that produce revolutionary art forms from figures as various as D.H. Lawrence, Stevie Smith, W.H. Auden, and Kathleen Raine. Two papers, one presentation and a final exam.ENGL 40410. Existentialism: Philosophy and Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101We will read representative literary and philosophical texts by Sartre (excerpts from Being and Nothingness, Nausea, a few plays), Beauvoir (The Philosophy of Ambiguity, excerpts from The Second Sex, A Very Easy Death, a novel and/or excerpts from A Memoir), and Camus (Myth of Sisyphus, excerpts from The Rebel, The Stranger, The Plague, and/or The Fall).ENGL 40411. Twentieth-Century British Women Writers

(3-0-3) Green

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Modern and postmodern fiction (and some nonfiction prose) by British women. Authors may include Woolf, Butts, Rhys, Cunard, Richardson, Carrington, West, Mansfield, Carter, and Winterson.

ENGL 40412. Twentieth-Century British Novels

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In looking at several British novels, each published at different moment of the 20th century, students will explore how art, in this case literature, engaged, or did not engage, the social world.

ENGL 40413. Twentieth Century British and Irish Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close study of religious imagery and themes in the works of selected 20th-century modern and postmodern poets.

ENGL 40414. The Irish Short Story

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course studies the Irish short story as a literary genre that reflects the changing political and cultural forces at play in Ireland. We begin the course by surveying various critical theories that can be applied to the genre before reading and discussing a wide selection of short stories. The course considers Irish writing in the broader sense—literature written in either Irish or English. Among the authors included are Patrick Pearse, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Séamus Mac Grianna, James Joyce, Liam O’Flaherty, Elizabeth Bowen, Frank O’Connor, Sean O’Faolain, Éilís Ní Dhuibhne, Angeal Bourke, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Eithne Strong, Pádraic Breathnach, Alan Titley, Mary Lavin, William Trevor, Gerry Adams, and Bernard MacLaverty.

ENGL 40415. The Avant-Garde: From Dada to Punk and Beyond

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Considering various genres and mediums (poetry, art, cinema, music, drama, and performance) from a range of geographic locations, an investigation of the avant-garde movement of the late-19th and early-20th centuries.

ENGL 40416. Twentieth-Century Literature in Irish

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will introduce you to the vibrant contemporary literature in Irish (Gaelic) from the Gaelic Revival, which sought to rescue the language from extinction, right up to the present. This course will focus on developing your ability to read, analyze and write about literature with care and precision. You will do a LOT of writing, both graded and ungraded, to become a stronger reader and writer. In the process, we’ll consider the particular excitement and difficulty of writing in (and about!) a minority language that also happens to be the first official language of Ireland, as well as debates about identity, belonging, symbolization, history, Anglicization, assimilation and hybridity, the new prominence of women writers, and ongoing challenges to stereotypes about Irish as tradition-bound (rather than, say, tradition-enabled), puritanical or pre-modern.

ENGL 40417. The Irish Tradition I

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Ireland possesses the oldest vernacular literary tradition in Europe, spanning over 1,500 years to the present day. This course will provide a survey of the origins and development of that literary tradition through more than a millennium from its beginnings until the 17th century, when political circumstances led to the collapse of the highly developed native system of learning, poetry, and patronage. The development of the Irish literary tradition will be traced against this background of political and cultural upheavals from approximately 500 to 1650.

ENGL 40418. Gender and Space(3-0-3) Green Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the spaces of modernity and gender in the novel.

ENGL 40420. Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Scottish Literature

(3-0-3) Smyth

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will survey major authors, genres, and themes of the literature of Scotland from the era of Burns to the present.

ENGL 40422. Modernism and Magazines

(3-0-3) Green

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Attention to the circulation of ideas about literary modernism and modernity in a range of publications: little magazines, “slicks,” feminist periodicals, women’s magazines, and alternative/oppositional journals.

ENGL 40426. Modern and Contemporary British Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of dramatic literatures written by British playwrights over the span of the 20th century, with particular emphasis on the various aesthetic and experimental forms used by the playwrights.

ENGL 40427. War, Economic Depression, and Ideological Contest in British Writing of the 1930s

(3-0-3) Wilkinson

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

British writing of the 1930s was shaped by economic and political crisis, and the resulting ideological and aesthetic struggles begin to look all too contemporary. This course will look at the poetry of the Auden circle and Marxism; at the early sociological work of Mass Observation and the documentaries of Humphrey Jennings; at the scientism of the Cambridge group around William Empson, Jacob Bronowski and J.D. Bernal; at responses to the Spanish Civil War, both left and conservative, including those of George Orwell, Wyndham Lewis, and Roy Campbell; and at the fiction writers Elizabeth Bowen, Christopher Isherwood, Graham Greene, Evelyn Waugh, and Edward Upward, and their different treatments of social and political pressure points. This broad range will be focused through a group of texts selected for their mutual contentiousness. Throughout, the responsibilities and irresponsibilities of writers during perilous times will be in question.

ENGL 40430. Contemporary Women Writers

(3-0-3) Sayers

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

We will read, discuss, and write about a wide range of contemporary writing by women, with a particular concentration on the short story and the writers visiting Notre Dame’s Women Writers Festival. Our readings will include realistic fiction as well as innovative and experimental work, including graphic fiction; some of our readings will focus on women’s experiences and perspectives, but some will “make the leap” to imagine men’s consciousness and reality. We’ll also read critical essays and reflections by the writers themselves to situate the work within the history of women writers; we’ll be especially interested in the publishing and critical realities facing women writers today. Reading journal, midterm and final, brief presentation, and an 8- to 10-page critical paper.

ENGL 40431. Transculturation in Irish Literature

(3-0-3) McKibben

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course considers the vexed topic of cultural change in the context of colonialism by examining key texts originally written in Irish (or a mixture of Irish and English) from a range of time periods, including works of comedy, satire, lament, and protest. We will consider the critical literature on transculturation and examine primary texts and consider how they change over time and what they seem to suggest about how people negotiate competing sociocultural and economic imperatives. Knowledge of Irish is helpful but not necessary; translations will be provided along with original texts. Requirements: enthusiastic participation, several short and one long term paper.

ENGL 40501. Contemporary Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close analysis of the dramatic literature produced by Irish playwrights during the latter half of the 20th century.

ENGL 40502. Ideology, Poetry, and Politics in Jacobite Ireland

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The political poetry of the period 1541–1688 will be discussed and analyzed against the historical background. The primary focus will be the mentalité of the native intelligentsia as it is reflected in the poetry, and as it responded to the momentous changes of the period. The origins and rise of the cult of the Stuarts will be examined and the historiography of the period will be assessed.

ENGL 40503. Anglo-Irish Identities 1600–1800

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the complex and contested cultural, political, and ideological identities of the Anglo-Irish.

ENGL 40504. Gothic Images in Modern Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the ways in which such themes as doubling, haunting, terror, and sexual anxiety, themes that inhere in the Gothic novel, operate in modernist fiction.

ENGL 40505. Studies in Six Irish Writers

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

W.B. Yeats, Elizabeth Brown, Bram Stoker, J.M. Synge, Seamus Heaney, and Medbh McGuckian.

ENGL 40506. Modern Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study both the drama produced by the playwrights of the Irish literary renaissance—W.B. Yeats, J.M. Synge, Lady Gregory, and Sean O’Casey—and the political struggle for Irish independence that was taking place at the same time.

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The Hidden Ireland denotes both a book and a concept. The book was written by Daniel Corkery in 1924 and was an immediate success as it encapsulated a version of Irish history that had not hitherto been available to the general public; it is still considered to be a classic of its kind. The concept promoted the notion that history should emanate from “below” and should not be confined to the elites and governing classes. Both book and concept have had a profound impact on our understanding of Irish identity, Irish history, and Irish literature. This course will examine the book in depth and utilize it to open a window on the hidden Ireland of the 18th century. The cultural, historical, and literary issues raised by the book will be studied in the context of the poetry of the period. Poetry will be read in translation.

ENGL 40508. Heroic Literature in Modern Adaptation

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with a study of the ethos of Irish/Celtic heroic literature in its historic and cultural context, this course examines the ideological, aesthetic, and personal uses to which that material has been put by Irish writers of the past two centuries (19th and 20th centuries) writing in English and Irish. Among the authors to be studied are Seamus Heaney, Flann O’Brien/Myles na Gopaleen, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, and Eugene Watters/Eoghan ÓTuairisc. Particular attention will be paid to shifting concepts of “authenticity” and the degree to which various creative artists have retained, reinterpreted, or reinvented what they perceived to be the essence of their originals. This course will interest English majors, modernists, and medievalists.

ENGL 40509. Modern Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course, we will study both the drama produced by the playwrights of the Irish literary renaissance—Yeats, Synge, Lady Gregory, and O’Casey—and the political struggle for Irish independence that was taking place at the same time.

ENGL 40510. New Writing from Britain and Ireland: Contemporary Fiction

(5-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will introduce students to the contemporary fiction of Ireland, England, Scotland, and Wales, as well as some of the best recent black British fiction. Some of the authors whose work we will read are Pat McCabe, Neil Jordan, John Banville, Zadie Smith, Monica Ali, Andrea Levi, Irvine Welsh, James Kelman, and Pat Barker. These writers will be read in the context of “the Break-up of Britain” and a concomitant sense of the changes in British and Irish identity in the past 20 years or so.

ENGL 40511. Film, Literature, and Irish Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ENGL 41005

This course will examine some of the dominant images of Ireland in film and literature, and will place their development in a wider cultural and historical context. Comparisons between film, literature, and other cultural forms will be featured throughout the course, and key stereotypes relating to gender, class, and nation will be analyzed, particularly as they bear on images of romantic Ireland and modernity, landscape, the city, religion, violence, family, and community. Particular attention will be paid to key figures such as Yeats, Synge, and Joyce, and contemporary writers such as John McGahern, William Trevor, Patrick McCabe, and Roddy Doyle will be discussed in terms of the wider implications of their work for contemporary Irish culture. The resurgence of Irish cinema and new forms of Irish writing in the past two decades will provide the main focus of the second part of the semester, tracing the emergence of new distinctive voices and images in an increasingly globalised and multicultural Ireland.

ENGL 40512. Versions of the Gothic

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of Gothic fiction in England and Ireland from the mid-18th century to the Victorian Age.

ENGL 40513. Culture and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3) Smyth

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Using a broad range of texts—drama, fiction, poetry, film, painting, and documentary material—an examination of the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

ENGL 40514. The West of Ireland—An Imagined Space

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will interrogate and examine representations of the West of Ireland in various 20th-century texts focusing, in particular, on the role of “the West of Ireland” in state formation and legitimization during the early decades of independent Ireland and its role in the construction of an Irish identity. We will look at how images of the West of Ireland were constructed in various utopian or romanticized formulations as well as examining more dystopian versions. This course will take an interdisciplinary approach, drawing on the visual arts and film as well as on literary texts in both Irish and English. (Irish language texts will be read in translation).

ENGL 40515. Contemporary British and Irish Fiction

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will introduce students to the contemporary fiction of Ireland, England, Scotland, and Wales, as well as some of the best recent black British fiction. Some of the authors whose work we will read are Pat McCabe, Neil Jordan, John Banville, Zadie Smith, Monica Ali, Andrea Levi, Irvine Welsh, James Kelman, and Pat Barker. These writers will be read in the context of “the Break-up of Britain” and a concomitant sense of the changes in British and Irish identity in the past 20 years or so. Expect a lot of reading, but also some superb novels. Two 12-page papers and a presentation.

ENGL 40516. The Irish in Their Own Words

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The purpose of this course is to introduce students to the richness and variety of literature produced in the Irish language during the medieval and early modern periods. (We will cover primarily the period between approximately 800 and 1700 A.D.) The emphasis in the first half of the semester will be on studying the mainly prose saga literature of the medieval period in its various literary, cultural, and historical contexts. This will involve both a close reading of the texts themselves in English translation and an examination of the material in the light of recent scholarship in this area. The second half will investigate the literature of the early modern period, in this case largely the poetry. This period is one of cumulative crisis for the Irish and their linguistic and cultural well-being. Students read closely a selection of texts representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them in their own language rather than in the English language of their colonizers. All the translations are accompanied by facing original text so that students gain some working knowledge of the Irish language, which will assist them in evaluating the translations they are reading and in appreciating the sensuous beauty of much of this poetry. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature, and it should also be of interest to students of modern Irish history.

ENGL 40518. Gender and Identity in Contemporary Irish Language

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will interrogate issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish language writers. We will examine the ways in which contemporary writers in Irish writing from a constellation of identities, sexual, cultural, and linguistic question explore these issues as they articulate them in specific cultural forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies and postcolonial studies the course will look at texts that question and analyze essentialist notions of cultural identity. It will explore in particular some of the tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary writing in Irish. We will read, among others, texts from writers such as Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Biddy Jenkinson, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Pearse Hutchinson, Cathal Ó Searcaigh, Seán Mac Mathúna and Micheál Ó Conghaile.

ENGL 40520. Reading Ulysses

(3-0-3) Johnson-Roullier

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close analysis of James Joyce’s Ulysses

ENGL 40521. Late Modernist and Postmodernist Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The distinction between late modernist and postmodernist has an ethical bearing, marked respectively by resistance to corruption and celebration of hybridity, although these strains may be mixed and politically intricate. This course considers the theories, assumptions and practice associated with work either riding or riven by such ethical and political tension, notably by Barbara Guest, John Wieners, Susan Howe, Marjorie Welish, J.H. Prynne, Barry MacSweeney, Denise Riley, and Lisa Robertson.

ENGL 40535. Poetic Modernisms

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of British and American modernist poets, with a particular emphasis on the aesthetic innovations made on poetry as a result of their works.

ENGL 40545. The Modern British and Irish Short Story

(3-0-3) Smyth

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will trace the generic development and changing structures of the short story form—there is more involved here than mere brevity—and will also provide a series of readings from the major British and Irish short story writers from the 20th century. We will read from the short story theories of these individual authors, where such theory exists, and will examine the important connections between the form and the idea of a “national” literature. Writers will include James Joyce, Frank O’Connor, Liam O’Flaherty, Mary Lavin, Kate Roberts, D.H. Lawrence, and Virginia Woolf.

ENGL 40567. National Cinema: Film, Literature, and Irish Culture

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will examine some of the dominant images of Ireland in film and literature from the Celtic Twilight to the Celtic Tiger, and will place the development of a national cinema in a wider cultural and historical context. Comparisons between film, literature, and other cultural forms will feature throughout the course, and key stereotypes relating to gender, class, and nation will be analyzed, particularly as they bear on images of romantic Ireland and modernity, landscape, the city, religion, violence, family, and community. Particular attention will be paid to questions of emigration, the diaspora, and Irish-America, with a view to looking later in the course at issues relating to race and multiculturalism in contemporary Ireland. In terms of film and literature, key figures such as Yeats, Synge, and Joyce, and contemporary writers such as Brian Friel, John McGahern, Maeve Brennan, William Trevor, Patrick McCabe, Seamus Deane, Alice McDermott, and Roddy Doyle will be discussed. The resurgence of Irish cinema and new forms of Irish writing in the past two decades will provide the main focus of the second part of the semester, tracing the emergence of new distinctive voices and images in an increasingly globalized and multicultural Ireland.

ENGL 40568. Women and Magazines

(3-0-3) Green

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will explore women’s print culture by focusing on women as producers and consumers of periodicals. Some of the key figures in what is sometimes called a “female” modernism made their living by publishing literary pieces and journalism in periodicals or through serving as literary editors: Djuna Barnes, Rebecca West, Virginia Woolf, and Jesse Fauser, to name a few, and many of the key texts of literary modernism made their first appearance in periodicals. In addition, the periodical press has been called the medium that best “articulates the unevenness and reciprocities of evolving gender ideologies” and thus is ideal for a study of the role literary culture plays in constructing and diagnosing the contradictions of femininity in modernity. The period between the coincident rise of the New Woman and New Journalism in the 1880s and the dominance of the “woman’s magazine” in the interwar years is extraordinarily rich in examples of diverse approaches to understanding femininity presented in the press. As we consider the connections between women and periodical culture from various angles (reception, circulation, representations of women journalists, the centrality of Little Magazines, “slick” magazines, and women’s magazines as key venues for publishing modernist texts, etc.) we will meet the modern woman journalist and her close relations: female editors, “sob sisters,” “stunt girls,” “agony aunts” to name a few. We will take a good look at a variety of publication venues—modernist “Little Magazines,” feminist periodicals, and so-called “women’s magazines” as well as the daily press. We will be working with periodicals in various formats: microfilm, digitalized texts, edited collections, and bound volumes. One brief essay, two mid-length (8–10 page) essays, and one group presentation.

ENGL 40587. Literatures of the American Hemisphere

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

National borders mark our Americas today, but for the first European explorers the landscapes of their “new world” were uncharted and unbounded. The newly encountered land invited utopian dreams even as it became the arena for genocidal violence. To reconsider these moments of violence and possibility, we will approach early American literature intra-hemispherically, reading not just from the British colonial record, but also from Spanish documents in English translation. We will read comparatively in order to ask key questions about American identity both then and now. For example, what do we learn when we juxtapose Cortés’ invasion of the Mexican empire to King Philip’s War in the New England colonies? To what degree do these legacies of imperialism still shape our modern world? What comparisons arise between the poetry of Anne Bradstreet and Sor Juana Inés de La Cruz; between the captivity adventures of Cabeza de Vaca and Mary Rowlandson? How might these contact points continue to shape our views of “others”? How have native nations across the Americas written or spoken of the loss of worlds? The authors and subjects noted above will serve as key markers, but we will also read primary works by William Bradford, Bernal Díaz, John Smith, William Apess, and others as we reconsider the literatures and histories of the Americas in a cross-national paradigm. Students will be expected to write three short papers, take a final exam, and participate actively in class.

ENGL 40601. Voices of American Renaissance

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A focus on the trope of “voice” as it shaped the literatures of the American renaissance period through an exploration of works by Emerson, Thoreau, Poe, Dickinson, Whitman, Douglass, Melville, Stowe, Hawthorne, and a number of lesser known authors and oral performers.

ENGL 40602. Tragedy: Shakespeare and Melville

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course we will read some of the great tragic works in the English language, indeed, in all of literature. Our syllabus will cover four plays by Shakespeare and Melville’s finest achievement, Moby-Dick. As the course title suggests, we will study these works in the context of their historical moments and in the context of tragedy as a genre. Reading Moby-Dick after Shakespeare will also enable us to witness in detail the nature of literary influence and to compare the tragic visions of Shakespeare and Melville as they explore such themes as good and evil, freedom and fate, and the individual and society. As we study these texts, we will consider the various reasons for their important place in the literary canon. Ultimately, let us make the most of our time together with works of art that are timeless in their beauty and ever timely in their relevance, works that continue to teach and to delight. Assignments include four essays (3–4 pages), a final exam, an oral presentation, and a daily question or close reading on the assigned text.

ENGL 40603. Realism and Naturalism in American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of American literature between the Civil War and World War I in relation to the literary movements known as realism and naturalism.

ENGL 40605. The American Scene

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

“To make much so much money that you won’t, that you don’t mind, don’t mind anything—that is absolutely, I think, the main American formula.” Henry James, The American Scene, 1907. “Greed, for lack of a better word, is good, is right, it works...and it will save that malfunctioning corporation called the USA,” Gordon Gecko, Wall Street, 1987. After a 20-year absence, Henry James returned to America to examine the country of his birth. His tour brought him to the above quoted and dismaying conclusion. This course tries to contextualize and understand James’s remark by placing it within a broader atmosphere of late 19th- and early 20th-century American culture. We’ll look at works that predate, are contemporary with, and follow James’s American tour. We’ll look at works of literature and biography, of politics and philosophy, and of theology and economics. Throughout, we will keep circling around and back to James’s notion of “The Main American Formula” and asking not only what exactly he meant, but also how other major thinkers of the age understood or conceived of an “American Formula,” and how that “formula” could be measured at the level of the individual, the corporation, the country, and, with Conrad’s Nostramo, the world. Readings will include works of the following authors: Joseph Conrad, Theodore Dreissner, Henry Ford, Henry James, Theodore Roosevelt, Thorstein Veblen, and Edith Wharton. In addition, we will view several movies whose focus is directly related to the course’s central questions.

ENGL 40606. Mark Twain

(3-0-3) Werge

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of Twain’s life and writings in light of the history of ideas and the literary, political, philosophical, and religious currents of 19th-century America.

ENGL 40607. Early American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of selected 17th- and 18th-century American literature.

ENGL 40610. Studies in American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Special topics in the history of American literature.

ENGL 40612. Literature and Democracy in the Nineteenth-Century United States

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of 19th Century American literature, emphasizing the efforts of American writers to identify and define “democracy” and the “democratic citizen.”

ENGL 40616. American Literature in the World

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course we will consider the place of American literature in global society. Our readings will span from the Puritans through the present, and we will focus our interpretations around the theme of conversation.

ENGL 40650. Twentieth-Century American Feminist Fiction

(3-0-3) Brogan

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course we will read a number of works, by both women and men, which may be described as feminist fiction. In so doing, we will raise issues about the relation of aesthetics to politics, about the process of canonization, and about aesthetic integrity. Ultimately, we will also be examining the place of women within American culture during the 20th century—how it has changed, how it has remained the same. At the end of the course, students should feel that they have discovered a new body of exciting literature, as well as new ways of reading some of our best-known literature. Texts: Kate Chopin, The Awakening; Edith Wharton, The Age of Innocence; Zora Neale Hurston, Their Eyes Were Watching God; William Faulkner, The Sound and the Fury; F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Great Gatsby; Alice Walker, The Color Purple and The Temple of My Familiar; Toni Morrison,

Sula and Song of Solomon; and possibly Elizabeth Dewberry Vaughn, Many Things Have Happened Since He Died. Requirements: Two papers, a midterm, and a final examination (25 percent each).

ENGL 40651. Atmospherics: Twentieth-Century Fiction

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

What do we mean when we say that something is “in the air”? Are we referring to messages transmitted over a broadcast network, the foment of revolution, the shifting winds of fashion, or a powerful critical trend? In this course, we will take up the atmospheric quality of each of these forms of cultural transmission as they appear in American fiction. In doing so, we will ask how they provide models of reading, receiving messages, and decoding information. Surveying a broad range of 20th-century fiction through to contemporary digital narratives, we will discuss both technologies and techniques for “tuning in” to broadcast media, mass movements, and ideologies. What happens to the persons populating fictional narratives when they participate in, or are even constituted by, their relations to these communication networks? This course will survey a series of prose works from the American 20th century, beginning with turn-of-the-century spiritualism and broadcast aesthetics (DuBois, Adams, Hopkins), moving to the realm of fashion, contagion, and the zeitgeist (West, Porter, Cather), taking up the spirit of revolution in the ‘60s (Didion, Pynchon, rock), and then discussing the idea of the “turn” in academic study through re-readings of James’s The Turn of the Screw, and finishing with the future of the broadcast in what is sometimes referred to as “liquid modernity” (Markson, Baker). Short readings from media and cultural theory will accompany each topic. Students will be asked to put pressure on their conceptions of how the interaction styles that accompany media in the 20th century and beyond might influence, derive from, or appear in the particular medium of literature across multiple flashpoints in the histories of technology and literary innovation.

ENGL 40701. The American Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A consideration of the forms and preoccupations of selected 19th- and 20th-century American novels, with special attention to their major ideas and moral concerns.

ENGL 40702. American Film

(3-0-3) Krier

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Presentations and discussions of the several genres of film produced in America since the early 1900s.

ENGL 40703. Poetry and Pragmatism

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the complex relationships between poetry, philosophy, and science at the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century through American poets as evinced in the works of Emily Dickinson, Robert Frost, and Wallace Stevens.

ENGL 40705. Kerouac and the Beats

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This seminar will re-examine Kerouac and his prose in relation to Beat subculture and the larger context of post-World War II American society. Although the work of other Beat writers, such as William S. Burroughs, Allen Ginsberg, and Gary Snyder will be considered, the primary focus will be on Kerouac. Moreover, the seminar will question the cultural codification of Kerouac as “King of the Beats” and advance the notion that he was a prose artist on a spiritual quest. Or, as Ginsberg aptly put it—an “American lonely Prose Trumpeter of drunken Buddha Sacred Heart.”

ENGL 40706. Lost Generation

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course studies the writings of authors, mostly Americans, who achieved prominence in the 1920s: Hemingway, Fitzgerald, H.D., Stein, Cummings, Hughes, and others.

ENGL 40707. Experimental Writing by Contemporary Women Poets

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of selected contemporary “experimental” women poets.

ENGL 40708. Poetry and Performance

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An investigation of the meeting-ground of poetry, conceptual art, new music, and performance art.

ENGL 40709. The American Novel Between the Two World Wars

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course pays particular attention to the different social contexts from which narratives emerged in order to see how novels participated in the contemporary cultural and political debates. Each of these works probes some defining notion of American identity, asking who or what constitutes “America.” We will also attend to that question by discussing each narrative’s formal characteristics and how they meet the author’s aims.

ENGL 40710. Some Strains in Twentieth-Century American Fiction

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course studies the interconnections among six of our best fiction writers of the last century, tracing the dynamic aesthetic and moral development of American fiction from Fitzgerald through Hemingway, Faulkner, Hurston, and Walker to Morrison.

ENGL 40711. Women’s Autobiography

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close analysis of women’s life narratives and poetry, based on the following questions: How do women’s narratives affirm or challenge cultural norms? How do concepts such as “high” and “low” art impact the reading of women’s autobiographical literature? And can lines be drawn between fiction and nonfiction when studying autobiography?

ENGL 40712. American Fiction

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A close examination of major mid-20th-century American novelists.

ENGL 40714. City in American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the connections between literary representations of the city and social identity in a variety of American literary texts from the 1890s to the present.

ENGL 40715. American Religious Imagination

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with Ralph Waldo Emerson and ending with Harold Bloom, how Christianity has been refigured in America.

ENGL 40716. Crossing Color Lines

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the conflicted and contradictory ways in which racial and ethnic identities have been constructed and mediated in American culture.

ENGL 40717. American War Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with Mary Rowlandson’s captivity narrative and ending with Tim O’Brien’s The Things They Carried, an exploration of the aesthetic, historical, and theoretical functions and values of war writing in the United States.

ENGL 40718. Historical Novels of the Black Diaspora

(5-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course provides an introduction to contemporary literature of the black diaspora through the genre of the historical novel. We will evaluate strategies of narration, the significance of differing representations of single events, and the relationship between literature and history. Literary analysis will be supplemented by an examination of the historical and political issues central to the novels.

ENGL 40719. Hemingway and Walker: A Comparative Study

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A comparative study of the fiction of Ernest Hemingway and Alice Walker, with particular emphasis on gender, class, and historical issues explored in each author’s works.

ENGL 40720. Poetry and Painting in Manhattan 1950–65

(3-0-3) Wilkinson

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course approaches the poetry and painting of Manhattan during its rise to international pre-eminence as an artistic center through the work and friendships of Frank O’Hara (1926–66), poet and curator at the Museum of Modern Art. It introduces the New York School of poetry, referring to visual art from de Kooning to Warhol and with side-glances at film, photography, music, and dance. The course will develop primarily through reading poems, although students will be directed to the critical and historical context. Readings will draw on The Collected Poems of Frank O’Hara (ed. Donald Allen); John Ashbery, The Mooring of Starting Out; Ted Berrigan, The Sonnets; and a course pack. Course requirements are written analyses of poems (every two weeks), a final exam, and a 5- to 7-page paper.

ENGL 40721. Some Strains in Twentieth-Century American Fiction

(3-0-3) Brogan

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Beginning with F. Scott Fitzgerald’s Jazz Age and ending with Toni Morrison’s Jazz, a study of thematic commonalities and dissonances in selected 20th-century American novels.

ENGL 40722. Latino/a Literature and Visual Culture

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In this course, students will study traditional, folkloric, biographic, and religious texts alongside contemporary Latino/a visual and literary texts that offer new versions of old tales. In thinking about how texts exist in relation to other texts, students will consider the “newness” and “Latino/a-ness” of Latino/a literature as well as its emergence amidst the social, cultural, artistic, and political shifts in the latter half of the 20th century.

ENGL 40724. American Visions

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of literatures written by English- and Spanish-speaking peoples from the late-16th century to the mid-19th century.

ENGL 40725. Class, Labor, and Narrative

(3-0-3) Sayers

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course explores the works of selected American writers addressing class and labor.

ENGL 40726. American Literature and Visual Culture

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

From early national fiction and portraiture to American modernist poetry and painting, an exploration of the relationships between American literature and the visual arts.

ENGL 40727. The American Novel, 1929–Present

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This seminar will explore representative works of U.S. fiction ranging from modernist classics through post-WWII works and contemporary novels emphasizing issues of multiculturalism. The course will be reading-intensive, and will emphasize close reading skills, cultural analysis, and historical contexts for each novel.

Students will write three papers that are expected to perform literary analysis and integrate historical readings and/or literary theory from library reserves. As always, drafts are welcome and encouraged.

ENGL 40729. American Literature: Narratives of Love and Desire

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

How the themes of “love” and “desire” are explored in selected American novels, and movie adaptations of those novels, written in the 20th century.

ENGL 40731. American Novel

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of selected 19th- and 20th-century American novels.

ENGL 40734. Post 9/11 American Fiction and Culture

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

In speaking of the after-effects of the first World War, the American novelist Henry James said: “The war has used up words; they have weakened, they have deteriorated like motor car tires; they have, like millions of other things, been more overstrained and knocked about and voided of the happy semblance during the last six months than in all the long ages before, and we are now confronted with a depreciation of all our terms, or, otherwise speaking, with a loss of expression through increase of limpness, that may well make us wonder what ghosts will be left to walk.” Writers such as Don DeLillo, Cormac McCarthy, and Phillip Roth, the authors of the 9/11 Commission Report, filmmakers, politicians, and intellectuals have all portrayed the post-9/11 world in language similar to James’s post-apocalyptic vision. This course looks at contemporary American culture and society and asks whether or not there is a definable post-9/11 narrative and aesthetic. We’ll address the ways in which the world has changed since 9/11 and how those changes have impacted daily life, local communities, the national consciousness, and global affairs. Discussion of these changes will be situated in our examination of major, post-9/11 novels, works of art, film and other media, formal governmental publications and policies, and religious writings. This course will have some short writing assignments, class presentation, and a final research paper.

ENGL 40736. Harlem’s Americas

(3-0-3) Johnson-Roullier

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

What was the Harlem Renaissance? While traditional notions of this time in literary history have conceived of it as a brief but luminous flowering of the arts in African American culture, not so much attention has been given to the many different voices that contributed to the movement, and that shaped its representations of race in the early 20th century. In this course, we will examine the meaning and significance of the Harlem Renaissance as conventionally understood, then move on to an exploration of Harlem’s Americas, or the many cultural locations from which race and racial representation were being considered both inside and outside the movement’s accepted parameters. Thus, rather than studying the Harlem Renaissance solely as an African American phenomenon, we’ll also explore the interrelationships between a number of its core works, along with several others from the same period not generally studied in this context. In seeking to understand the writing of Harlem’s Americas, we’ll investigate how all of the texts we examine are engaged in a larger dialogue on the meaning of race in the early 20th century, both in the United States and beyond. In so doing, we’ll try to gain a deeper understanding of the complexity of the Harlem Renaissance, while considering what this may have to tell us about race and racial representation not only in the early 20th century, but on into the 21st. Course Texts: Booker T. Washington, Up From Slavery; W.E.B. DuBois, The Souls of Black Folk; Jessie Fauset, Plum Bun; Nella Larsen, Quicksand and Passing; Sherwood Anderson, Dark Laughter; Jean Toomer, Cane; Carl van Vechten, Nigger Heaven; Claude McKay, Home to Harlem; Anna Julia Cooper, A Voice from the South Course Requirements: Three 5-page essays, in-class writing, and 20-minute group presentation, and other.

ENGL 40737. The Rhyming Apparatus: African American Poetry and Poetics

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of poetry and poetics by black Americans from the beginnings to the present.

ENGL 40739. American Fiction Since 1945

(3-0-3) Krier

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Many contemporary writers began long and productive careers during the decades after the second world war. In this course we will study some of them, using representative texts to try to work out an aesthetics of the time. We will need to look at questions of personal identity, as they embrace spiritual, sexual, social, and racial dimensions. And we will also give close attention to the elasticity of the novel form itself. A very tentative reading list: Ralph Ellison, The Invisible Man; Richard Brautigan, Trout Fishing in America; Kurt Vonnegut, Slaughterhouse-Five; Saul Bellow, Herzog; John Barth, Lost in the Funhouse; John Updike, Rabbit Run; Anne Tyler, Dinner at the Homesick Restaurant; Walker Percy, The Second Coming. There will be a midterm and final as well as an independent paper on a novel selected by each student.

ENGL 40741. The Sacred and the Divine in Latino/a Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of faith, religion, the sacred, and the divine in selected Latino/a writings.

ENGL 40743. Literature of the 1990s

(3-0-3) Benedict

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of selected novels written during the 1990s.

ENGL 40744. Southern Fiction

(3-0-3) Sayers

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Readings in 20th-century southern fiction from 1900 to 1960, including Kate Chopin, Jean Toomer, William Faulkner, Richard Wright, Zora Neale Hurston, Ralph Ellison, Flannery O’Connor, and Eudora Welty. We will examine both the recurring subjects of the Jim Crow era—“sin, sex, and segregation,” in the old Southern phrase—and the stylistic innovations of the writers. We’ll pay special attention to contemporary criticism that explores the period from historical, political, and cultural perspectives.

ENGL 40747. Contemporary American Women Poets

(3-0-3) Brogan

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Although the range and productivity of American women writers over the last two centuries has been enormous, the proliferation of extremely accomplished and important women writers has virtually mushroomed in the last few decades, embracing leading poets (such as Elizabeth Bishop and Adrienne Rich), leading novelists (such as Alice Walker, Joyce Carol Oates, and Toni Morrison) and altogether new voices such as the Chicana poet Lorna Dee Cervantes, the Asian American novelist Amy Tan, and the Native American Susan Power (to name only a few). To narrow the range of this explosive development in American literature, we will primarily focus on the work of women written in this country after WW II, with special interest on the last two decades. In addition to a small sampling of a number of different writers to be found in our class reader, we will ultimately focus on seven writers: Elizabeth Bishop (poetry), Adrienne Rich (poetry and essays), June Jordan (poetry and essays), Amy Tan (fiction), Lorna Dee Cervantes (poetry), Susan Power (fiction), and Sandra Gilbert (poetry and essays).

ENGL 40751. Literatures of Immigration: The Latino/a Transnational Experience

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close reading of recent literature that explores the immigration between Mexico, Latin America, and the United States.

ENGL 40755. California Culture at Mid-Century

(3-0-3) Fredman

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course explores how poetry took a leading role among the arts in California at mid-century, creating a California culture that through the Beats and the Hippies became a national and international phenomenon. We begin by looking at collage, the dominant form of the arts in California, and then consider how collage meets up with four main elements of the California aesthetic: surrealism, mysticism, jazz, and anarchism. The primary poets we read and hear are Robert Duncan, Gary Snyder, Allen Ginsberg, Bob Kaufman, and D.J. Waldie. Alongside these poets, we will look at Jack Kerouac's novel The Dharma Bums, artists such as Jess, Wallace Berman, Bruce Conner, Joan Brown, and Jay DeFeo, and filmmakers such as Kenneth Anger and Stan Brakhage. Students will gain the ability to do interdisciplinary work in the arts, to read complex contemporary poetry, and to relate art movements to the culture that surrounds them. Requirements include essays and a final exam.

ENGL 40756. American Women Writers

(3-0-3) Irving

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A survey of American women writers from Chopin to present.

ENGL 40770. American Modernism

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Discussions of the late-19th-, early-20th-century literary and cultural movement of modernism often center on those qualities of the movement described in the work of early modernist literary critics, such as Harry Levin or Edmund Wilson. Such examinations emphasize the modern movement's experiments in form, structure, linguistic representation, characterization, etc., while paying much less attention to the role of the modernist movement in the larger context of a given culture. In this course, we will explore the significance of the modern movement from the perspective of American culture, as well as the manner and meaning of American literary participation in the movement. To that end, we will consider not only the work of authors generally accepted as modernists, such as F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, and Gertrude Stein; we will also consider the role of authors such as Sherwood Anderson and Waldo Frank, of the early Chicago Renaissance (1910–25), and a number of authors from the Harlem Renaissance. We will examine the work of these authors not only in the context of modernism, but also as it relates to many issues of the day, including progressivism, primitivism, race and ethnicity, immigration, cosmopolitanism vs. regionalism, and the importance of the vernacular, in addition to the question of "American-ness" and its importance to an understanding of American literature during this time. Considering these different vantage points in American literary modernism, we will try to imagine the contours of "American modernisms" and draw some conclusions about their significance within the larger modernist context. In so doing, we'll seek to arrive at a more comprehensive, more nuanced perspective on the meaning of the modern in American literature and culture. Course Texts: Edith Wharton, Age of Innocence; Willa Cather, O Pioneers!; Sherwood Anderson, Dark Laughter; Waldo Frank, Holiday; and others.

ENGL 40771. American Modernisms

(3-0-3) Johnson-Roullier

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of American literature of the modern period.

ENGL 40780. Literature of the Fin-de-Siècle

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

For Victorians, the end of the 19th century was a time of instability, anxiety, as well as possibility. This period, known as fin-de-siècle, witnessed an explosion in sexual and gender transgression, as embodied by dandies and decadents. This time period was also one where there were great political and economic conflicts in the form of growing labor and socialist movement. The fin-de-siècle also observed the birth of the New Woman who lobbied for sexual, economic, and social equality. And this period also saw the emergence of new aesthetic movement, with its radical philosophy of "art for art's sake." This course will consider a range of literary texts that are representative of the political, cultural and aesthetic innovations that define the fin-de-siècle. These texts will be organized according to the following four thematic sections: (1) socialism and labor politics, (2) the aesthetic movement, (3) decadents and dandies, and (4) the new woman. We will begin with William Morris's News From Nowhere and then, by section two, move on to poetry by Michael Field and Amy Levy. Our discussions of Oscar Wilde's prose and novel The Picture of Dorian Gray will carry us into section three, where we will also consider prose by Max Beerbohm and Arthur Symons. The course will conclude with Ella Hepworth Dixon's novel, The Story of a Modern Woman, as well as stories by Victoria Cross and Olive Schreiner. Scholarly criticism and selections from Victorian writings will help us to read these texts in response to one another and as situated within their respective historical and cultural contexts.

ENGL 40802. African American Women Writers

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the works of several African American women writers, including Alice Walker, Toni Morrison, Audre Lorde, and June Jordan, specifically the relation these writers have to the larger American culture and what they have to say about our collective vision and future.

ENGL 40803. Women of Color

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A critical examination of the literature and scholarly writings about literature from "women of color" across disparate cultural backgrounds.

ENGL 40805. Identity and Gender in Modern Irish Women's Poetry

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course interrogates issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish women poets. We examine the ways in which contemporary poets write from a constellation of identities—sexual, cultural, and linguistic—and will focus in particular on the ways how question as they articulate versions of identity in specific cultural and literary forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies, feminist theory, and postcolonial studies, among others, this course examines texts that question and problematize essentialist notions of cultural and gender identity. We will also explore tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary Irish-language writing. We read, among others, poets such as Eavan Boland, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Maedhbh McGuckian, Paula Meehan, and Eiléan Ní Chuilleanáin.

ENGL 40807. African American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A historical and thematic account of the rise and achievement of African American authors over several centuries.

ENGL 40808. Latino/a Poetry

(3-0-3) Menes

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of prominent contemporary Latino/a poets whose work has enriched and diversified the canon of American poetry in the last 20 years.

ENGL 40809. Latino/a Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course will focus on several prominent contemporary Latino/a poets and fiction writers whose work has enriched and diversified American literature in the last 20 years. Among them are such established and acclaimed authors as Gary Soto, Lorna Dee Cervantes, Pat Mora, Martín Espada, Victor Hernández Cruz, Helena Viramontes, and Cristina García. Because Latinos are not homogenous, emphasis will be given to these writers' diverse ethnic and cultural origins. Readings will be assigned in individual poetry collections, novels, and in one anthology of poetry. Assignments: group presentations, response papers, three 4- to 5-page papers, a final examination, and regular attendance.

ENGL 40810. Caribbean Voices

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An introduction to the literature of Anglophone Caribbean.

ENGL 40811. Native American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course serves as an introductory exploration of the literatures written by Native American authors—oral literatures, transitional literatures (a combination of oral and written expression), and contemporary poetry and prose.

ENGL 40812. African American Poetry and Poetics

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An examination of poetry and poetics by black Americans from the beginnings to the present.

ENGL 40813. New African American Poetry

(3-0-3) Eady

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course is designed as an exploration and showcase of African American poetry and poetics, as seen through the poetry and essays of the post Civil Rights/ Black Arts Movement generation of poets. Although this course will also examine the historical elements of the African American voice, the main focus of our reading and discussions will concentrate on the different and various facets of present day African American poetry. While some of the writers we encounter during the semester may be known to many—Elizabeth Alexander, Terrance Hayes, Harryette Mullen—many more will prove to be poets with only first or second books under their belts. Though their pages, we will attempt to trace the path their poetry leads; what is their sense of voice? What obligations (if any) do they feel with the writing that's come before them? What new territories do they claim? It is hoped that the student will come away with a deeper understanding of what elements and issues define the 21st-century African American poetic voice.

ENGL 40815. African American Poetry

(3-0-3) Eady

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Close readings of selected contemporary African American poets.

ENGL 40820. Writing Harlem: Race, Renaissance, and the Modern

(5-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A study of the historical, cultural, and political circumstances that led to the flowering of African American literature in Harlem in the 1920s and 1930s.

ENGL 40825. Latino Literature and Visual Culture

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Understanding U.S. Latino/a literature, art, and film through its many allusions to and representations of traditional icons and historic figures as well as legends, myths, popular figures, and action heroes/heroines of the Americas (including those with origins in Native American, Latino/a, African, Asian, and European cultures).

ENGL 40850. Advanced Fiction Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

Our chief business in this demanding course will be to give attention to the prose manuscripts of the writers in the class. Writers in any creative prose genre are welcome (fiction, creative nonfiction, graphic novel, hypertext fiction, prose-poetry, and so on). Beyond workshop, we will read and view contemporary texts in various genres and will consider theoretical and practical questions of interest to contemporary writers, including the relationships of writers to the language(s) in which they work; the implications of form, genre, and new and traditional media on the creation and exchange of texts; the relationship of writers to local, regional, national and global communities, and more. Our reading and viewing list will be extensive, and course members will be expected to present and write on assigned texts in addition to submitting their own creative work and weekly written critiques of peer work.

ENGL 40851. Advanced Poetry Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced poetry writing workshop.

ENGL 40853. Advanced Fiction Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced workshop for students who have already completed several works of fiction and would like to spend a semester working intensively on new pieces. Though most students will be concentrating on stories, novelists and would-be novelists are most welcome. We will criticize contemporary fiction, including our own, and attend on-campus readings. This class is open to students who have successfully completed a fiction writing course (ENGL 20013, 20018, etc). All others should submit a manuscript of 12–20 pages or so to Prof. Valerie Sayers, 356 O'Shaughnessy. Please include an email address for notification. Course requirements: in addition to assigned readings, three complete stories or novel chapters.

ENGL 40858. Introduction to African American Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

A broad introduction to the major writings of African Americans.

ENGL 40870. Advanced Poetry Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced poetry writing workshop.

ENGL 40871. Advanced Poetry Writing

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An advanced poetry writing workshop.

ENGL 40901. Feminist Theory

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An exploration of the main literary and artistic movements of the historical European avant-garde: Cubism, Vorticism, Italian and Russian Futurism, Dada, and Surrealism.

ENGL 40903. Deconstruction and Exegesis

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

The aim of this course will be to compare and contrast what one might loosely term ancient (medieval, early modern) and post-modern approaches to the reading of texts, following the twin approaches of theoretical exposition and practical application neither of which can be sustained without the intervention of the other. It will be necessary to rely on concrete examples of the ancient and contemporary methods. The examples in the first half of the semester will be Augustine's On Christian Teaching and Literal Interpretation of Genesis and Derrida's Of Grammatology, Writing and Difference and Dissemination. This double reading will put us in a position to take as our examples Augustine's Confessions and Derrida's Circonfession in the second half of the semester. Certain questions—which can sometimes but not always be answered in the conventional sense—will persist during our readings. These will include: What is philosophy? What is literature? What is the relation between philosophy and exegesis? What is the relation between literature and exegesis? What is the relation between philosophy and literature? Language requirement: Latin and/or French desirable but not necessary. Written requirement: one final essay (20 pages) either (1) on one of the texts or authors studied in the course, or (2) applying the methodologies discussed to another philosophical or literary text of your choice.

ENGL 40906. Gender and Culture

(3-0-3) Ellmann

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

An introduction to literary theories of gender and culture in film, literature, and other media.

ENGL 40920. Hermeneutics and Literary Theory

(3-0-3) Dutt

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

What makes an interpretation of a literary text valid? The reconstruction of what the author meant by his text, intentionalists say. But does one understand enough if one just goes back to what the author had in mind, does one anti-intentionalists ask. Both intentionalists and anti-intentionalists claim to derive their respective hermeneutic norms from insights into the nature of textual meaning in general and literary semantics in particular. This seminar will focus on the relationship between the theory and methodology of interpretation and literary theory. We will analyze major contributions by, among others, Hans-Georg Gadamer, E.D. Hirsch, Paul Ric'ur, Frank Kermode, Umberto Eco, and Richard Rorty. Note: Readings in English and German; discussions in English.

ENGL 40923. The Poetics of Black Popular Culture

(3-0-3) Irving

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This interdisciplinary course focuses on “cultural studies” as a critique of larger systems of domination and will introduce you to major voices of African American critical theory. Paul Gilroy suggests that, “popular culture always has its base in the experiences, the pleasures, the memories, the traditions of the people.” Black cultural studies is interested in the wider sphere of critical practice, national politics and how popular culture can both resist and perpetuate the idea of America. While visual and literary studies have been seen as historically separate disciplines, we will use theories from each to study those forms of self-representation that defy disciplinary boundaries. With an eye on the way black popular culture is mythologized through commodification and rife with contradictions, we will examine the conflicted ways in which “racial” identities and differences have been constructed throughout U.S. culture. We will consider how new debates about the history of race have changed American literary, historical, and cultural studies. We will put theoretical tracks in conversation with literature, music, visual art, the body, film, and food and use these cultural texts as a method of engaging sustained social and political critique.

ENGL 40947. Love, Death, and Exile in Arabic Literature

(3-0-3)

Pre/Corequisite: ENGL 30101

This course explores literary and artistic presentation of the themes of “love, death, and exile” in Arabic literature and popular culture from pre-Islamic era to the present day. Through close readings of Arabic poetry, essays, short stories, and novels (in English translation), and analyzing a number of Arabic movies (with English subtitles), we discuss the following issues: themes and genres of classical Arabic love poetry; gender, eroticism, and sexuality in Arabic literary discourse; and alienation, fatalism, and the motif of Al-Havin Ila Al-Watan (nostalgia for one's homeland) in modern Arabic poetry and fiction.

ENGL 41001. Film Melodrama Lab

(3-3-0)

During the lab times, certain films will be viewed for further discussion in class.

ENGL 41002. Honors Shakespeare Lab

Corequisite: ENGL 40252

The lab will not be used every week but will be available for screenings of Shakespeare films.

ENGL 41005. Lab: National Cinema: Film, Literature, and Irish Culture

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: ENGL 40511

This is the lab component to be taken in conjunction with ENGL 40511, “National Cinema: Film, Literature, and Irish Culture.”

ENGL 41011. Television as a Storytelling Medium Lab

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: ENGL 40011

Certain screenings will be viewed for further discussion in class.

ENGL 41206. Shakespeare and Film Lab

Corequisite: ENGL 40206

Certain films will be viewed for further discussion in class.

ENGL 41527. Transnational Immigration in European Cinema Lab

Corequisite: ENGL 40527

Certain films will be viewed for further discussion in class.

ENGL 43102. Seminar: Religion and Literature

(3-0-3)

A consideration of the forms, ideas, and preoccupations of the religious imagination in literature and of the historical relationships between religious faith and traditions and particular literary works. The conflicts and tensions between modern gnosticism, in literature and ideology, and the sacramental imagination will constitute a recurring point of focus. We will also lend special attention to the vision and imagery of the journey and wayfarer and the conflicts and affinities between private and communal expressions of faith.

ENGL 43103. Seminar: Imperialism and Its Interlocutors

(3-0-3)

By canvassing the Age of Empire, this seminar examines articulations of imperialism in the late Victorian and early modernist British imagination and contemporaneous or subsequent responses of resistance to it. “Imperial” writers may include Cary, Conrad, Forster, Rider Haggard, and Kipling; “interlocutors” may include Achebe, Naipaul, Kincaid, and Rhys.

ENGL 43105. Seminar: The Devotional Lyric

(3-0-3) Monta

Following the Reformation-era’s massive upheavals came the greatest flowering of devotional poetry in the English language. This body of literature offers its readers the opportunity to explore questions pertaining broadly to the study of religion and literature and to the study of lyric. Early modern devotional poetry oscillates between Eros and agape, private and communal modes of expression, guilt and pride, doubt and faith, evanescence and transcendence, mutability and permanence, femininity and masculinity, success and failure, and agency and helplessness. We’ll follow devotional poets through their many oscillations and turns by combining careful close reading of the poetry with the study of relevant historical, aesthetic, and theological contexts. Students will learn to read lyric poetry skillfully and sensitively, to think carefully about relationships between lyric and religion, and to write incisively and persuasively about lyric. Our authors will likely include William Alabaster, Richard Crashaw, John Donne, George Herbert, Robert Herrick, Anne Locke, Andrew Marvell, Mary Sidney, Robert Southwell, Thomas Traherne, and Henry Vaughan; we may also read some work from earlier and later periods. There will be three major course requirements: (1) regular short written responses to assigned readings (these will be revised and submitted at the end of the course in lieu of a final exam); (2) a poet project (for these projects, each student will be assigned a writer on whom to prepare a brief biography, bibliographic information on the poetry’s publication, and/or circulation history, and an annotated bibliography of major scholarship. These projects will be made available to every student enrolled in the course. We’ll leave the course with a wealth of information about the authors we study); and (3) an 8- to 10-page focused interpretive essay on a topic of the student’s choosing.

ENGL 43201. Seminar: The Pearl Poet

(3-0-3)

Close readings of the Arthurian romance of Gawain, Patience (the whimsical, pre-Pinnocchio-and-Gepetto paraphrase of the story of Jonah and the whale), Cleanliness (a series of homiletic reflections of great power, beauty, grim wit, and compassionate insight centered on varying conceptions of “purity”), and Pearl (the elegiac dream-vision that begins with the mourning father who has lost a young daughter, then moves with amazing grace from the garden where he grieves into a richly envisioned earthly paradise where he is astonished to re-encounter his lost “Pearl,” who then leads him to the vision of a New Jerusalem whose post-apocalyptic landscape is populated exclusively by throngs of beautiful maidens).

ENGL 43202. Seminar: Milton and His Contemporaries

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of differing, and divergent, ways of seeing and representing reality in 17th-century Dutch painting and English poetry.

ENGL 43203. Seminar: Shakespeare and His Contemporaries

(3-0-3)

This seminar places Shakespeare’s plays within the vibrant world of Tudor-Stuart drama.

ENGL 43204. Seminar: Medieval Romance

(3-0-3)

An intensive analysis of medieval romance literature both in England and on the continent, beginning with the work of Chretien de Troyes and including

Chaucer’s Troilus and Criseyde and Malory’s Arthurian legends, focusing on the role of women in romance narratives, the relationship of the romance to history, modifications of and developments in the Arthurian tradition over time, and the place of the other (the foreign, the monstrous, the magical) in the romance.

ENGL 43205. Seminar: American Women Writers

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the work of women writers after World War II and up to the end of this past century, with the idea of gaining an understanding of the range of women writers in this country during this period.

ENGL 43206. Seminar: Medieval Dream Before Freud

(3-0-3)

Close readings of selected works from the medieval textual tradition in English where dreams hold a central place in the inscription of meaning.

ENGL 43207. Seminar: Everybody’s Shakespeare

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of Shakespeare’s plays (including tragedies, comedies, and romances), as well as a number of contemporary “re-visions” of those works by authors of varying cultural, ethnic, or gender backgrounds.

ENGL 43208. Seminar: Enlightenment Drama

(3-0-3)

A close study of drama, tragic, and comic, after Shakespeare.

ENGL 43209. Seminar: The Canterbury Tales

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will read The Canterbury Tales from start to finish, focusing on questions of genre, poetic voice and authority, the relationship of history to literature, the development of character, and the emergence of vernacular poetry in English.

ENGL 43210. Seminar: Shakespeare’s Religions

(3-0-3) Lander

A critical analysis of religious influences and iconography in selected Shakespeare plays.

ENGL 43211. Seminar: Ideas of Justice

(3-0-3)

An examination of various ideas of justice in early modern culture, from the trials of Socrates and Jesus to Shakespeare and Milton.

ENGL 43212. Seminar: Mystic Voices

(3-0-3)

The divine “vision” was a special form of religious experience in medieval Europe. In this class, we will read both primary texts and some modern critical theory to consider texts reporting visionary experience as problems of representation. How could experiences of such intensity be represented in writing? How were they to be interpreted? Who had the authority to do so? Why were visions so much more common to women than men?

ENGL 43220. Seminar: The Medieval Saint

(3-0-3) Hall

A close reading of the prose and poetry of selected medieval saints, with particular emphases on expressions of faith and the literary forms used to express that faith.

ENGL 43222. Seminar: Old English and Middle English

(3-0-3)

Close readings of selected Old English and Middle English prose.

ENGL 43223. Seminar: Shakespeare’s Major Tragedies

(3-0-3) Lander

A close reading of William Shakespeare’s major tragedies, including historical and biographical aspects of the works.

ENGL 43301. Seminar: Virtue, Sex, and the Good Life: Eighteenth-Century Novels

(3-0-3) Doody

The 18th-century novel deals with the questions of social, political, sexual, and economic identities and choices in a time of great change, and this course examines several novels representative of the time period.

ENGL 43302. Seminar: Jane Austen and Her World

(3-0-3) Doody

Research in the novels of Jane Austen.

ENGL 43303. Seminar: Victorian Fiction

(3-0-3)

A close reading of five late-Victorian novels—Trollope's The Eustace Diamonds, James's Portrait of a Lady, Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles, Eliot's Daniel Deronda, and Collins's Armada—that organize themselves around the thoughts and deeds of “bad girls.”

ENGL 43305. Seminar: Victorian Radicals

(3-0-3) Maurer

“Fringe” characters in, and elements of, British Victorian literature, with a particular emphasis on a modern world being increasingly defined in economic terms.

ENGL 43306. Seminar: Romanticism and Human Rights

(3-0-3)

How the Romantic movement in literature presaged and influenced civic rights on the micro and macro scales.

ENGL 43310. Seminar: Nature Poetry

(3-0-3) Sitter

A seminar focusing on the great body of poetry in English of the last two centuries in which “nature” takes center stage, rather than functioning as scenery, with a particular emphasis on the relationship between humankind, nature, and ecology.

ENGL 43315. Seminar: Poetry and Knowledge

(3-0-3) Sitter

Readings in poetry and poetics, with a particular emphasis on cognitive, educational, and truth claims for poetry from the Renaissance to the present.

ENGL 43325. Seminar: Literature of British India

(3-0-3) Thomas

This course explores the literature of British India from the 1870s through the 1930s, a period that sees the British Empire coming into its peak and also entering into its decline. In many respects, the course functions as a survey, taking in canonical figures in the British tradition (such as Kipling, Forster, and Orwell) and some writers remembered generally for their skill as portraitists of British India. We will emphasize, however, those literary works that posterity has highlighted as having the greatest literary merit. The instructor anticipates a special focus on Rudyard Kipling, including his stories, his Jungle Book, the novel Kim, and a recent biography of Kipling. The assignments include a short early paper and a longer research paper, supported by exercises in topic selection, source location, bibliographic annotation, and workshoping.

ENGL 43378. Seminar: Identifying with Characters in Nineteenth-Century Fiction

(3-0-3) Maurer

Readers of the novel report taking pleasure in identifying with characters, assuming their points of view, and feeling their emotions along with them. This course is designed to explore the strange process through which readers come to feel they share traits with entirely imaginary beings. We will base our investigation on both the philosophy of identification (David Hume and Adam Smith), the psychology of identification (Sigmund Freud), novels featuring beloved literary characters (Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre, and Charles Dickens's Great Expectations), and novels that respond to or even recapitulate those same characters (Bharati Mukherjee's Jasmine and Lloyd Jones's Mister Pip). Through a series of short response papers, students will form a research question touching on this topic, which they will then develop into a seminar-length paper through research, rough drafts, and revision.

ENGL 43401. Seminar: Modernism and Modernity

(3-0-3)

By engaging a wide variety of modern writers ranging from D.H. Lawrence, T.S. Eliot, Larsen, Fauset, Barnes, Rhys, Woolf, Langston Hughes, and West, to Lewis, Joyce, and Beckett, the changing contours of literary modernism in the larger context of the philosophical, social, and political cultures of modernity.

ENGL 43402. Seminar: “God” in Postmodern British Poetry

(3-0-3) Huk

A multifaceted analysis of modes of “belief” in postmodern British poetry, with a particular emphasis on how the operations of ancient Hebraic and Christian texts come back into practice for these writers, and why those earlier frameworks for conceptualizing language and “saying God,” or failing to say it, seem newly hospitable in the face of deconstructive postmodern theories about “the word.”

ENGL 43403. Seminar: Gender and Modernism

(3-0-3)

An intensive study of “feminine” or “women’s” modernism: modernist aesthetics read in relation to questions of race and gender; the formation of literary modernism’s often tense relation to mass culture; the development of political and literary avant-garde cultures (with specific emphasis on those marked by gender and race such as the suffrage movement and the Harlem Renaissance); the development of modern discourses of sexuality; the intimate and complex relationship between modernism and race; and the special attention given to women’s experiences of modernity, especially in relation to those aspects of culture typically excluded from definitions of the modern (shopping, maternity, consuming popular, sentimental fictions, etc.).

ENGL 43404. Seminar: Modernism, Modernity, and Modernization

(3-0-3)

A study of questions relating to modernism as a literary period and historical concept.

ENGL 43409. Seminar: Woolf and Bloomsbury

(3-0-3) Green

An analysis of the novels, essays, art, and political writings of some of the members of the Bloomsbury Group—including Woolf, E.M. Forster, Roger Fry, and Leonard Woolf—in order to explore the complex moments of cross-fertilization, critique, and revision that define their encounters, along with notions of a “feminine” or “women’s” modernism.

ENGL 43410. Seminar: Feminism, Print, and Spectacle in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3) Green

How feminist cultures of the 20th century have engaged print culture and visual culture in imaginative ways to carve a space for discussions of women’s issues.

ENGL 43411. Seminar: Twentieth-Century British Women Writers

(3-0-3) Green

Modern and postmodern fiction (and some nonfiction prose) by British women. Authors may include Woolf, Butts, Rhys, Cunard, Richardson, Carrington, West, Mansfield, Carter, and Winterson.

ENGL 43501. Seminar: James Joyce

(3-0-3)

Close readings and discussion of Joyce's Dubliners, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, and Ulysses.

ENGL 43502. Seminar: Contemporary Irish Literature

(3-0-3) Harris

Irish drama, fiction, and poetry of the second half of the 20th century.

ENGL 43503. Seminar: Anglo-Irish Identities 1600–1800

(3-0-3)

Focusing on the 200-year historical period that was crucial in the formation of “Ireland,” this course explores the complex and contested cultural, political, and ideological identities of a group we have come to call the Anglo-Irish, including Swift, Berkeley, Edgeworth, and Goldsmith.

ENGL 43504. Seminar: Modern Irish Fiction

(3-0-3) Smyth

A close examination of the works of major Irish writers of fiction after the Second World War—Flann O’Brien, Frank O’Connor, Mary Lavin, Patrick Kavanagh, Edna O’Brien, Michael MacLaverty, Sam Hanna Bell, and Brian Moore.

ENGL 43505. Seminar: Gender Troubles: Contemporary Irish Fiction

(3-0-3) Harris

In this course we will be looking at the relationship between gender politics and national politics as it plays out in the development of Irish fiction after the era of James Joyce. Focusing on Irish novels and short stories that were groundbreaking and/or controversial in terms of their exploration of gender and sexuality, the course will also investigate the historical contexts in which they were produced and the controversies they produced. Our investigation will focus on the question of how the “trouble” generated around these controversial explorations of gender and sexuality relates to other kinds of trouble that have shaped the history of 20th-century Ireland. We will begin with the reaction against government censorship in the Irish Free State during the 1930s and 1940s, follow the emergence of Irish women writers and Irish feminism from the 1950s to the 1980s, and conclude with the rise of gay and lesbian Irish writers in the 1990s and early-21st century. Students will be responsible for several short response papers, at least one in-class presentation, and a 20- to 25-page seminar paper.

ENGL 43521. Seminar: Love, Sex, and Marriage in Middle English Literature

(3-0-3) Ziemann

The idea of “love at first sight,” lyrics on the pain of unrequited love, the genre of “romance”—all of these are arguably inventions of the Middle Ages. This course will examine the complex and elaborate discourse of “love” that dominated literary and even spiritual writings of the late-medieval period. In particular, we will be looking at the literature of late medieval England, and, more specifically, how writers placed this highly romanticized conception of love in dialogue with the more pragmatic and earth-bound topics of sex and marriage. Reading texts as varied as Chaucer’s infamous “Wife of Bath,” with her five successive husbands, Margery Kempe’s description of her mystical marriage to the Godhead, and romantic entrapment of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, we will ask what made these topics so compelling to medieval writers and what relation, if any, their stories bore to actual contemporary practices of marriage and courtship. The research component of the course will survey different kinds of research frameworks to help enrich our understanding of the texts from both historical and theoretical perspectives, allowing students to create research projects tailored to their own interests and talents, leading up to writing of a 20-page research paper.

ENGL 43601. Seminar: Landscape in American Literature

(3-0-3)

A thematic reading of “landscape” in American literature from the Puritans to Toni Morrison.

ENGL 43603. Seminar: The American Renaissance

(3-0-3) Gustafson

The human voice manifested tremendous cultural, spiritual, and political power for antebellum Americans. Vox populi, vox dei (“The voice of the people is the voice of God”) proclaimed the political slogan, while Transcendentalist writers such as Ralph Waldo Emerson considered the living voice to be superior to the dead letter. Vernacular literatures, Native American and African American oral traditions, and sacred and political oratory all contributed distinctive models of voice to the antebellum babel. In this course, we will focus on the trope of voice as it shaped the literatures of the American Renaissance period (roughly 1835–65). We will explore the cluster of meanings that antebellum Americans attached to voice and examine the social and literary issues that these conceptions of voice prefigured. Our readings will include works by Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, Emily Dickinson, Walt Whitman, Frederick Douglass, Herman Melville, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Edgar Allan Poe. The major requirement for the course is a research paper of approximately 20 pages, produced in stages.

ENGL 43616. Seminar: American Literature in the World

(3-0-3) Gustafson

How does the world influence America? What is the place of America in the world? In this course we will read poetry, plays, manifestos, and works of fiction that suggest many answers to these questions. Conversation will provide an organizing theme as we venture around the globe and range across time from Shakespeare to the present. Our readings will be grouped into units that focus on different modes of literary relationship and are likely to include The Tempest, The Scarlet Letter, and The Last of the Mohicans; poetry by Anne Bradstreet, Walt Whitman, and Langston Hughes; fiction by Honoré de Balzac, Joseph Conrad, Chinua Achebe, Maryse Condé, Jhumpa Lahiri, and Toni Morrison; Thoreau’s Civil Disobedience and works it influenced by Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr., and Nelson Mandela; and plays by Arthur Miller and Melinda Lopez. Course requirements include regular participation and in-class assignments; several short papers; one 5-page paper; and a 10-page paper.

ENGL 43701. Seminar: Southern Fiction

(3-0-3) Sayers

Close readings of Southern fiction from 1900 to 1960, including Chopin, Glasgow, Toomer, Faulkner, Wright, Ellison, Hurston, Warren, Welty, and O’Connor.

ENGL 43702. Seminar: Suffragettes and Literature

(3-0-3)

A close study devoted to tracing and defining the feminist literary cultures of the 20th century through, first, reading the writings created during the “First Wave” of feminist activism that defined women’s militant and nonmilitant struggle for the vote at the beginning of the last century, followed by exploration of the feminist writing and thought that followed the suffrage movement and paved the way for discussions of Women’s Liberation in the “Second Wave.”

ENGL 43705. Seminar: Realism and Naturalism

(3-0-3)

A close examination of American literature written between 1800 and 1900.

ENGL 43721. Twentieth-Century American Fiction

(3-0-3)

Beginning with F. Scott Fitzgerald’s Jazz Age and ending with Toni Morrison’s Jazz, a study of thematic commonalities and dissonances in selected 20th-century American novels.

ENGL 43730. Seminar: American Film

(3-0-3) Krier

Presentations and discussions of the several genres of film produced in America since the early 1900s.

ENGL 43801. Seminar: Women of Color

(3-0-3)

An examination of the literatures of “women of color,” encompassing the linguistic, national, ethnic, and cultural experiences and connections among women of color in cultural diasporas around the world, and how these women use their work to (re)map the “margin,” recreating it as a place of connection and conversation, rather than exclusion and otherness.

ENGL 43802. Seminar: Black Cultural Studies

(3-0-3)

This interdisciplinary course considers the conflicted ways in which “racial” identities and differences have been constructed throughout U.S. culture.

ENGL 43804. Seminar: Memory in Latino/a Literature

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on several prominent contemporary Latino and Latina poets—among them, Gary Soto, Lorna Dee Cervantes, Victor Hernandez Cruz, and Martin Espada—whose work has enriched and diversified the canon of American poetry.

ENGL 43805. Seminar: Twentieth-Century Black Women Writers

(3-0-3)

A close examination of major 20th-century African American women writers.

ENGL 43806. Seminar: Caribbean Voices

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the literature of the Anglophone Caribbean.

ENGL 43809. Seminar: Literatures of Early American Contact

(3-0-3)

Literatures of Early American Contact explores the history, narrative, and poetry emanating from the early centuries of European exploration and conquest in the Americas. Beginning with texts attributed to Columbus, working through accounts of Spanish conquests, and ending with New England history and literature, we ask questions about the role of violence, empire, religion, and Native American resistance in the shaping and development of culture and identity in Latin America as well as in the United States.

ENGL 43810. Seminar: Latino Literature

(3-0-3)

A close examination of the historic, cultural, and artistic foundations of selected Latino writers.

ENGL 43920. Seminar: Contemporary Women Writers

(3-0-3)

Although the range and productivity of American women writers over the last two centuries has been enormous, the proliferation of extremely accomplished and important women writers has virtually mushroomed in the last few decades, embracing leading poets (such as Elizabeth Bishop and Adrienne Rich), leading novelists (such as Toni Morrison and Alice Walker), and altogether new voices, such as the Chicana poet Lorna Dee Cervantes, the Asian American novelist Amy Tan, and the native American fiction writer Susan Power (to name only a few). As a consequence, we will focus on the work of women writers after World War II and up to the end of this past century, with the idea of gaining an understanding of the range of women writers in this country during this period, but then with a tight focus on four of the best (two poets and two fiction writers). Since this is a seminar, students will be expected to participate in genuine class discussion, to develop a rationale for how to interpret these works (i.e., the most suitable critical perspective for given works or authors), and to do some external readings by and on one author of their choice for the final project. Written assignments will range from occasional 1-page responses to the longer final project, with one short- and one medium-length paper in between. At the end of the course, we will hope that students, male and female, will have been inspired by one of these writers to produce creative work of their own. And if this is true, students' own work (if of high quality) can be substituted for one of the assignments.

ENGL 47999. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Independent study under the direction of a faculty member.

ENGL 50202. Early Chaucer

(3-0-3) Frese

If Chaucer had never written The Canterbury Tales, his claim upon our attention as one of the greatest poets ever writing in the English language would be secure based on the earlier works that will occupy us as readers/ writers/ discussants during this term: Book of the Duchess, House of Fame, Parliament of Fowls and the magnificent Troilus and Criseyde. Additionally we will certainly read some—or all—of the short poems that—along with Canterbury Tales (which we will not read)—comprise the Chaucer canon. No prior experience with Middle English is required. Requirements: a midterm, a final, and a term paper. Text: Larry Benson's The Riverside Chaucer or any scholarly edition of the early poems named above.

ENGL 50415. The Art and Practice of Screenwriting

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41415

Filmmaking is always, at first, thinking and writing. This is a workshop for current and would-be screenwriters, to develop original ideas for the screen and to practice those techniques whereby those ideas can be translated into cinema on the page. Coursework will involve many short writing exercises and finally a script for a 20-minute film. There will also be a required lab screening.

ENGL 52998. Honors Thesis

(3-0-3)

Arranged by department honors advisor. Credits for research and writing honors thesis.

ENGL 52999. Honors Thesis

(3-0-3)

Arranged by department honors program advisor. Credits for research and writing honors thesis.

University Writing Program

FYC 11050. First-Year Composition Summer Studio

(0-6-0)

Corequisite: FYC 13150

Students in the First-Year Composition Summer Program also enroll in the Summer Studio, FYC 11050, which meets in a computer lab on campus. In the studio, students practice academic writing conventions, draft and revise assignments, and meet with a writing specialist. This course is a corequisite of FYC 13150. (Zero credits)

FYC 12100. First-Year Writing Tutorial

(0-1-1)

Students enrolled in the First-Year Writing Tutorial either will have completed or will be concurrently enrolled in First-Year Composition. The tutorial will provide supplemental one-on-one writing instruction, with a focus on developing the fundamental skills needed to think critically and write clearly. This course will require intensive practice discovering topics, drafting ideas into essay form, evaluating drafts, and revising writing. Students will learn strategies to clarify their ideas, organize their writing, and successfully use academic writing conventions. These skills will be practiced within the context of writing assignments students are working on in First-Year Composition and other first-year classes.

FYC 13090. Introduction to Academic Writing and Research

(3-0-3)

The aim of First-Year Composition 13090 is to give students a thorough overview of the conventions of academic writing and research. During the course of the term, students will write three kinds of papers: (1) a “framed” argument that integrates an interpretation of different readings; (2) a “researched” argument based on both assigned readings and library sources; and (3) rhetorical analyses that entail focusing on how writers use language to fulfill their goals. These papers help students come to terms with the conventions of academic writing and argument, preparing them for the kind of writing assignments they will encounter in FYC 13100 and other writing-intensive courses. Unlike in FYC 13100, however, students in FYC 13090 write papers that are relatively brief, allowing extra time and opportunity to practice and cultivate their revision skills.

FYC 13100. First-Year Composition

(3-0-3)

First-Year Composition is designed to help students learn how to identify an issue amid conflicting points of view and craft an argument based on various sources of information. The course stresses the identification and analysis of potential counter-arguments and aims to develop skills for writing a research proposal, for conducting original research, and for using print and electronic resources from the library.

FYC 13150. First-Year Composition Summer Seminar

(3-0-3) Clauss

Identical in its aims as First-Year Composition courses offered during the traditional school year, students in FYC 13150 learn how to identify an issue amid conflicting points of view. The course stresses argument and aims to develop skills for writing researched essays that incorporate academic and popular sources. (Three credits)

FYC 13200. Community-Based First-Year Composition

(3-1-3)

In cooperation with the Center for Social Concerns, these sections of composition place students in learning situations in the wider community where they are in contact with people who are dealing with the specific content issue of their section. Because the necessary time commitment for these sections is greater, students are awarded an extra credit-hour for their enrollment (four instead of three). We welcome students with commitment to social justice and community service to enroll.

FYC 13300. Multimedia First-Year Composition

(3-0-3)

Because researching and composing arguments is increasingly linked to technological tools, multimedia sections of First-Year Composition teach students how to make the most of a wide array of resources. From standard tools such as Microsoft Word, to more powerful websites and software, students in multimedia sections use composition technology to its fullest while exploring the unique opportunities and challenges of composing in the 21st century. While students do not need any prior technological skills, they should be ready to learn many of these skills over the course of the semester. Students will be required to bring a wireless laptop to class and to keep their laptops functioning properly throughout the semester.

FYC 13400. Advanced First-Year Composition

(3-0-3)

Advanced First-Year Composition is a writing workshop designed as an elective for students who have advanced placement credit for First-Year Composition but who seek opportunities to enhance their academic writing skills. Space is limited.

FYC 13500. Advanced First-Year Multimedia Composition

(3-0-3)

Advanced First-Year Multimedia Composition is a writing workshop designed as elective for students who have advanced placement credit for First-Year Composition but who seek opportunities to enhance their academic writing skills and the related technological skills outlined in the course description for FYC 13200. Space is limited.

Film, Television, and Theatre

FTT 10101. Basics of Film and Television

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the study of film and television, with particular emphasis on narrative. Students will learn to analyze audio-visual form, including editing, framing, mise-en-scène, and sound. Students will consider topics in film and television studies such as authorship, genre, stardom, and feminism. Focusing on classical Hollywood and American TV, the course will also introduce students to international and/or alternative cinemas and television styles. Evening screenings are required. Serves as prerequisite to most upper-level courses in film and television.

FTT 20260. La telenovela: History-Culture-Production

(3-0-3)

In this course, you will explore the genre of the telenovela (a major social, cultural, political, and economic force in Latin America and, more recently, in the United States) by reading about the genre (in Spanish) and watching two condensed telenovelas (also in Spanish). You will demonstrate your understanding of the telenovela and its importance in Hispanic culture through writing and discussion and through application of these ideas as you write, produce, direct, act in, record and edit a mini-telenovela as a class. During this process you will learn and apply basic production (videography) and post-production (computer-based video and audio editing) techniques. Course taught in Spanish.

FTT 20280. Culture, Media, and Entertainment in China Today

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to provide students with an introduction to aspects of contemporary Chinese culture, media, and entertainment. The class focuses on the development of China's media and entertainment industries, including the online industry, the music industry, advertising, television, and the film industry. Students will learn to critically analyze authentic cultural products, study their cultural and literary dimensions, and discuss how culture affects the political and economic aspects of these industries. This class aims to be interdisciplinary and is designed to accommodate students from a large range of academic interests, including business, marketing, political science, economics, communication, media studies, music, sociology, literature, film, cultural studies, and Asian studies. No prior knowledge of China or the Chinese language is required. Fulfills international requirement.

FTT 20701. Introduction to Theatre

(3-0-3)

A study of theatre viewed from three perspectives: historical, literary, and contemporary production practices. Through lectures, readings, and discussion, students will study this art form and understand its relevance to their own life as well as to other art forms. ### FTT 20702. Stage Management

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the duties and functions of the stage manager in both the preproduction and the production phases of the mounting of a show. Students will learn how to produce a promptbook and to track and block a show. they will also learn performance etiquette and documentation of a production.

FTT 20703. Theatrical Production

(3-0-3)

A practical introduction to techniques, processes, and material. The student will explore traditional and modern theatrical production methods: carpentry, rigging, scenic painting, lighting, basic technical drafting, equipment use, safety, material handling, and costume construction sewing techniques. Students will gain practical experience participating on realized projects and productions.

FTT 20704. Theatre, History, and Society

(3-0-3)

This course treats theatre as a culture industry and employs the case-study approach to examine deeply selected periods and sites in theatre history to understand the theatrical event and how it was marketed and to whom, and what cultural attitudes prevailed. Each case study will emphasize theatre as a site of cultural debate and political and social change, while considering the larger question of the role of representation in human society through time. Must be enrolled in FTT. Interested non-majors, by permission of instructor. Theatre, History, and Society is one of the four core course requirements for the theatre concentration and, ideally, should be taken by the end of the student's sophomore year.

FTT 20705. Performance Analysis

(3-0-3)

Performance Analysis moves beyond analysis of scripts to teach a student how to "read" a performance. How do we understand an artist's choices in a given performance? Can we determine who is responsible for every choice in a production? Attention will be given to the role of each individual theatre artist and how the collaborative process evolves. This course will introduce theories of representation and interpretation and will involve analysis of both performances and text. This is part of the new theatre core concentration curriculum.

FTT 20801. Introduction to Acting: Acting for the Non-Major

(3-0-3)

This course will introduce the non-theatre major to the craft of acting. Using improvisation, text analysis and scene study it will explore the techniques and practices of acting. This participatory course will involve short student presentations as well as written components.

FTT 21001. Acting: Process

(3-0-3)

Acting: Process introduces the beginning actor to the basic philosophies and techniques of stage acting. This course engages both the creative and analytical processes that lead to truthful and believable behavior on stage. Exercises geared toward heightening awareness of your physical self and your environment will lead to text analysis and culminate in basic scene studies. Students will prepare and rehearse scenes outside of class with a partner for in-class performance and evaluation. Written textual analysis including, detailed character study, is required for all scene work. This course is appropriate for all students interested in performing themselves and/or guiding the performance of others.

FTT 21007. Writing for Screen and Stage 1

(3-0-3)

This class focuses on the basics of dramatic writing: story, dialogue, character, and style. Students will develop three short scenes as stage plays or as screenplays. The last section will be devoted to developing one of these for public reading.

FTT 21008. Playwriting Toward Production: New Strategies, New Voices

(3-0-3)

This playwriting workshop course introduces the student to new playwriting strategies and current shifts in writing techniques for performance, with the objective of the actual production of his/her own original dramatic text at the end of the course. The student applies strategies and techniques learned in class to exercises in writing and to the creation of a dramatic text, as he conceives of his text in both dramatic and theatrical terms. Through the progressive workshop and critique of his work in class, the student understands the strengths and weaknesses of the text in terms of the actor's total instrument, the aspirations and obstacle of character, narrative strategies, approaches to form, metaphor and image, design and movement, language and meaning, and, most importantly, his/her vision as playwright. As the student embarks on this process, he/she visualizes, hears, imagines, and eventually executes the transfer of his/her work from the original concept to a performance that will convey his urgent message and ask our world new questions.

FTT 21101. Basics/Film and Television Lab

Corequisite: FTT 12101; FTT 20101

These films and filmmakers will be considered in terms of the social, economic, technological, and aesthetic forces that have shaped them.

FTT 30102. History of Film II

Prerequisite: (FTT 30101 OR FTT 30461)Corequisite: FTT 31102

This course traces the major developments in world cinema from the post-WWII era to the present. The course will examine the shifting social, economic, technological, and aesthetic conditions of this period, especially the demise of the Hollywood studio system, the rise of new technologies and auxiliary marketing outlets, and the globalization of cinema. The course will not be limited to Hollywood filmmaking, but will also look at various international movements, including Italian neorealism, the French new wave, and recent Asian cinemas.

FTT 30103. Teen Culture

Prerequisites: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)Corequisite: FTT 31103

Adolescence has long been recognized as a period of life marked by physical and psychological changes, but it was only in the 20th century that people experiencing these changes became known as “teenagers.” This class examines the history and significance of teens’ culture and the films and television programs that have represented teens’ experiences.

FTT 30230. Australian Cinema

Corequisite: FTT 31230

This course presents a survey of Australian cinema from the silent era to the present with special attention to the new Australian cinema of the 1970s. Students will examine these films in their social and political context. Throughout, we will consider how Australian films fashion an Australian identity. We will discuss Australia’s complex relationship to European and American culture, representations of Aboriginal culture, women in the Australian cinema, the representation of the outbreak vs. the city, tourism and the film industry, the role of film festivals, and more.

FTT 30231. Comedy, Italian Style!

Corequisite: FTT 31231

An exploration of comic traditions in Italy; the popular film genre known as “comedy Italian style” is analyzed in its historical development in the 1950s and ‘60s, together with Italian film comedies from the silent period through the present. Requirements include attendance at mandatory film screenings, participation in class discussions, a number of short papers, and midterm and final exams. The class will be conducted in English.

FTT 30232. National Cinema: Irish Cinema/Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 31232

Every industrialized country, and many non-industrialized ones, have developed distinctive national cinemas. Often these productions are a dynamic mix of Hollywood influences, assertive local cultures, and government control. This course examines the films of one or more countries to reveal their distinctive styles, stories, and visual and narrative techniques. (The nationality varies each year.) The idea of “nation” as a critical concept is also addressed. May be repeated. Fulfills the film international area requirement.

FTT 30233. New Iranian Cinema

Corequisite: FTT 31233

This seminar course will take up a selection of the best of the new wave of Iranian cinema and debate its sources and its paradoxical arrival on the international film scene. We will consider the role of censorship, limited budgets, Islamic proscriptions, national history and aspirations, issues of gender and, in particular, the persistent influence of a 2,500-year old, popular Persian poetic tradition in the inspiration and refinement of this unexpected and celebrated cultural phenomenon.

FTT 30235. Italian National Cinema

Corequisite: LLRO 41545

Conducted in English, this course examines the concept and reality of “national cinema” in the Italian case. A history of one of the world’s most renowned national cinemas focusing on the construction of national identity in film.

FTT 30236. Introduction to Japanese Popular Culture

(3-0-3) Shamoon

Corequisite: FTT 31236

This course will examine postwar Japanese popular culture using the theories and methods of cultural studies, media studies and gender studies. We will explore some of the primary sites of postwar popular culture across media, as well as emphasize the theoretical distinctions between those media. Rather than following a chronological order, the course will be grouped into sections by media, including novels, film, television, manga, and anime. As we discuss issues specific to each of these media and across genres, however, our discussion will be framed by some key questions: What was the role of popular culture in defining a national identity in the postwar? What role did foreign influences, most importantly, American pop culture play? How have popular culture texts spoken to and defined specific audiences (for instance, teenagers, women, non-Japanese)? This course is taught in English, and no knowledge of the Japanese language is required.

FTT 30241. New Chinese Cinema

This class explores “underground” films produced in Mainland China since the 1980s. Many films that were produced illegally or banned in China have garnered awards in prestigious international film festivals—Cannes, Berlin, Venice, Toronto, Tribeca (and the list runs on). How and in what ways were the films subversive? What is the role of China as a nation and state in the production of film today and in the past? How do these films play to the international film festival circuit and international market? Is commercialization realizing less government control of film and other media in China? The class will view both feature films and documentaries, including those unavailable in the United States (but all with English subtitles). No prior knowledge of Chinese language, culture, or history is required.

FTT 30244. Cruel Stories of Youth: Children and Teens in Japanese Film

(3-0-3)

From the wide-eyed children of anime to the crazy street fashions of Harajuku, images of kids and teens in Japanese popular culture are now distributed and consumed around the world. How then are those young audiences depicted and addressed within Japanese popular culture? What aspects of childhood or teen identity are repeated across generations? In order to answer these questions, we will look at Japanese films, including animation, from across the 20th century, that represent children and teens from a variety of perspectives, from the celebration of innocence to the threat of juvenile delinquency. In addition to analyzing representations of children and teens, students will also gain familiarity with Japanese film history and genres, and develop the critical vocabulary of film analysis. All films will be subtitled. There will also be secondary readings in cultural studies and film studies, relating to the films we watch in class. Assignments will include an oral presentation, several short writing assignments, a film viewing journal, and a longer paper.

FTT 30245. On Stage and Screen: French Theater and Film from 1900 to 1967

This course will examine the parallel and related evolutions of theater and film from the beginning of the 20th century to the eve of May 1968. We will study the principal playwrights and film makers, works, and movements as well as the manner in which these works both expressed and influenced the dominant ideological trends and aesthetic movements of the first two-thirds of the century. Texts by Anouilh, Artaud, Beckett, Camus, Claudel, Cocteau, Giraudoux, Ionesco, and Sartre. Films (or excerpts of films) by Carne, Cocteau, Godard, Marker, Resnais, and Renoir. Requirements: one oral presentation, two papers, final examination.

FTT 30246. Post-Soviet Russian Cinema

(3-0-3)

Freed from the constraints of Soviet-era censorship, in the period 1990–2005, Russian filmmakers exploited the unique qualities of the film medium in order to create compelling portraits of a society in transition. The films we will watch cover a broad spectrum: reassessing Russia's rich pre-Revolutionary cultural heritage as well as traumatic periods in Soviet history (World War II, the Stalinist era); grappling with formerly taboo social issues (gender roles, anti-Semitism, alcoholism); taking an unflinching look at new social problems resulting from the breakdown of the Soviet system (the rise of neo-fascism, the war in Chechnya, organized crime); and meditating on Russia's current political and cultural dilemmas (the place of non-Russian ethnicities within Russia, Russians' love-hate relationship with the West). From this complex cinematic patchwork emerges a picture of a new, raw Russia, as yet confused and turbulent, but full of vitality and promise for the future.

FTT 30248. Black Arts

(3-0-3)

This course offers a survey of black diasporic artistry. At the same time, it is an ongoing analysis of how these artists asked, "what constitutes the African Diaspora in divergent and convergent ways. The main goal of the course is not simply to label certain artists as part of this diasporic formation, but to understand how artists reflected upon their participation in it (and, in some ways, outside of it). We will focus primarily on this conversation's development from the interwar period of the 20th century to the turn of the 21st century through poetry, prose fiction and nonfiction, film, television, and dance. From the United States, we will look at how creative intellectuals such as the poet Langston Hughes, dancer and anthropologist Katherine Dunham, novelist and anthropologist Zora Neale Hurston, fiction writer and essayist Richard Wright, and journalist Alex Haley used art to understand their relationship to black peoples in the Caribbean, Europe, and Africa, along with key events impacting those different geographies. But the course will also consider how black creative intellectuals outside the United States reflected on their relationship to the diaspora. These will include Algerian philosopher Frantz Fanon, Cuban poet Nicolás Guillén, Nigerian musician Fela Kuti, and Pulitzer-Prize winning poet Derek Walcott. In exploring different conceptions of diaspora, we will encounter other themes including the idea of overlapping diasporas, black nationalism, the body, and the significance of translation to cultural solidarity and difference.

FTT 30249. Masters of Contemporary Chinese Cinema

(3-0-3) Lin

Corequisite: FTT 31249

This introductory film course showcases master directors and major films from China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Students will learn to appreciate Chinese cinema both for its content and techniques, while familiarizing themselves with social and political changes under which these films were produced in Greater China. We will examine cinematic accomplishments by master directors and analyze how they recreate for the audience different Chinese societies on the screen. This course is taught in English. No prior knowledge of Chinese is required.

FTT 30406. The Art and Practice of Screenwriting

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)Corequisite: FTT 31406

Filmmaking is always, at first, thinking and writing. This is a workshop for current and would-be screenwriters, to develop original ideas for the screen and to practice those techniques whereby those ideas can be translated into cinema on the page. Coursework will involve many short writing exercises and finally a script for a 20-minute film. There will also be a required lab screening.

FTT 30409. The Art and Science of Filmmaking

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101

This course is a behind-the-scenes look at the artists and craft people that work together to create both theatrical films and television programs. We will explore the many roles people play as well as the techniques and equipment used to make movies, specifically the director, producer, and cinematographer's relationship on a production. This study will combine history, technology and the politics of both big budget shows and independent cinema. We will also follow a case study about the making of Heaven's Gate. This is a course about film production without the hands-on experience, which will provide a basis for those thinking about doing production as well as expand the expertise for those who have taken production courses. There will be screenings, a midterm, and final paper (10 pages) regarding a chosen researched topic about filmmaking.

FTT 30410. Introduction to Film and Television Production

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101 OR FTT 20102)Corequisite: FTT 31410

An introductory course in the fundamentals of shooting, editing, and writing for film and video productions. This is a hands-on production course emphasizing aesthetics, creativity, and technical expertise. The course requires significant amounts of shooting and editing outside class. Students produce short video projects using digital video and Super 8mm film cameras and edit digitally on computer workstations. The principles of three-camera studio production are also covered.

FTT 30411. Art and Science of Filmmaking

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

This course is a behind-the-scenes look at the artists and craft people who work together to create both theatrical films and television programs. We will explore the many roles people play and the techniques used to make movies specifically the director, producer, and cinematographer's relationship on a set. This study will combine history, technology, and the politics of both big budget shows and independent cinema. This is a course about film production without all of the hands-on experience, which will provide a basis for those thinking about doing production as well as expand the expertise for those who have taken production courses. We will, however, conduct various in-class film tests. There will be screenings, a midterm, and final paper (10 pages) regarding a chosen researched topic about filmmaking. Materials fee required.

FTT 30412. Digital 3-D

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to Alias Wavefront software, a powerful conceptual tool for modeling and animating complex objects. In this digital exploration, computer technology will be used to generate, modify, and present design ideas.

FTT 30413. Interactive Media Motion Graphics

(3-0-3)

This advanced multimedia course will give the studio, design, FTT, or CAPP major an introduction to the design of motion graphics. Students will develop short information movies, movie trailers, or movie opening sequences. The course will use Apple's Motion software and cover basic DVD and Quicktime movie development. Skill with various graphics software useful, with expertise in Adobe Photoshop very important.

FTT 30414. JavaScript: Making the Web Behave

(3-0-3) Nunemaker

JavaScript is a forgiving and wonderfully simple, yet powerful programming language. It was designed to be easy for non-programmers to use and is now an essential part of the web, powering rich interactions in sites such as Facebook, Gmail, and Mobile Me.

FTT 30430. History of Documentary Film

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 31430

This course will track the history of nonfiction film and television, examining various structures and formats including expository, narrative, experimental, formalist, docudrama, and “reality TV.” It will also examine the uses of “actuality” footage in films that make no pretense to objectivity. At the center of the course will be a deconstruction of the notion of “film truth.” Students will develop skills in the critical analysis of documentary and examine the standards by which we evaluate them.

FTT 30436. Topics: Film and Popular Music

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 31436

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of prerecorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and pop biopics. We'll see films using popular music of all kinds: Tin Pan Alley, '50s rock 'n roll, jazz, disco, country, French pop, and more. We'll consider the role of the star—ranging from Astaire to Travolta, Dylan to Madonna—and films by directors such as Scorsese and Welles. Looking at films from the 1930s to the present, we'll consider the narrative function and meaning of music, industrial practices, changing social values, how songs get Academy Awards, how soundtracks circulate, and how film relates to various other musical media, such as radio and MTV. Throughout, we will pay special attention to how pop music affects film's ideologies of gender, race, and sexuality. Students do not need a background in music.

FTT 30437. Topics: Film and Popular Music

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 31437

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of prerecorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and pop biopics. We'll see films using popular music of all kinds: Tin Pan Alley, '50s rock 'n roll, jazz, disco, country, French pop, and more. #### FTT 30450. Television Criticism and Aesthetics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101 OR FTT 20102)

Corequisite: FTT 31450

This course builds upon the concepts that students are introduced to in Basics of Film and Television and offers more advanced study of television criticism and aesthetics. We will seek, first of all, to understand television as a unique meaning-producing medium, dissecting television's narrative and non-narrative structures and its distinctive visual and aural aesthetic. Second, we will confront the critical methodologies that have been applied to the medium under the rubric of academic television studies: semiotics, genre study, ideological analysis, cultural studies, and so on. Thus, our goals will be to understand how television makes meaning and to explore how media scholars approach television in meaningful ways. The course will be a combination of lecture and discussion, and the assignments will include a midterm and final, as well as a handful of short papers and reading responses.

FTT 30461. History of Television

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 31461

Television has been widely available in the United States for only half a century, yet already it has become a key means through which we understand our culture. Our course examines this vital medium from three perspectives. First, we will look at the industrial, economic and technological forces that have shaped U.S. television since its inception. These factors help explain how U.S. television adopted the format of advertiser-supported broadcast networks and why this format is changing today. Second, we will explore television's role in American social and political life: how TV has represented cultural changes in the areas of gender, class, race, and ethnicity. Third, we will discuss specific narrative and visual strategies that characterize program formats. Throughout the semester we will demonstrate how television and U.S. culture mutually influence one another, as television both constructs our view of the world and is affected by social and cultural forces within the United States.

FTT 30462. Broadcast Journalism

(3-0-3)

Four major topics are covered: (1) writing for broadcast with emphasis on developing the student's understanding of grammar and style in the construction of effective news stories; (2) newsroom structure: understanding who does what in today's broadcast newsroom and how economics affects the flow of information; (3) journalism ethics: analysis of personal values, ethical principles, and journalistic duties that influence newsroom decisions; and (4) legal considerations in news gathering with special attention paid to libel laws and invasion of privacy.

FTT 30463. Broadcasting and Cable

(3-0-3)

This course examines the history and current practices of the broadcast and cable television industry and looks at its effect on American culture and society. Topics of discussion include important issues in the industry, government regulation, news, sports, and entertainment programming strategies and practices, ratings, and advertising. The course also offers an introduction to basic television production through eight production sessions at WNDU-TV.

FTT 30465. Sports and Television

(3-0-3)

Sports have played an integral role in the television industry since the medium's early days. This course will highlight the history of sports on television and focus on the nuts and bolts of how television sports programming works today. The course will also examine the impact of televised sports on our culture as well as the ethical issues raised by the media's coverage of sports.

FTT 30466. Film and Digital Culture

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 31466

This class examines the many and varied ways in which new digital technologies are changing traditional methods of film production, distribution, exhibition, and reception. Some of the topics we will explore include: the impact of digital cameras and editing on film production; new narrative structures that result from the temporal and spatial manipulations of digital technology; new media in animation; the legal issues raised by digital technologies and the industry's efforts to combat piracy; new forms of audience engagement through fan websites; the implications of DVD extras; and the future of digital video in the home.

FTT 30491. Debate

(V-0-V)

This course will focus on research of current events and the efficacy of proposed resolutions toward the alleviation or reduction of societal harms. It will also involve discussion of debate theory and technique. Permission required.

FTT 30500. Questions of Homosexuality in Film and Literature

(3-0-3) Jerez-Farran

This course will introduce students to many of the critical perspectives and theories that enliven contemporary literary and cultural studies on gay and lesbian film and literature. Throughout the semester, we will examine a collection of films and literary texts by self-identified gay and lesbian writers and/or by authors who deal with gay and lesbian themes and characters, irrespective of their sexual identity. Through the analysis of the selected texts, we will also examine the history, politics, and theoretical arguments, both current and historical, that deal with homosexuality to see how this human phenomenon and its cultural expression has affected and been affected by heterosexual culture and the conflicts that have arisen between them. We will also explore how sexual and gender norms are constructed historically and culturally; how sexual and gender norms affect gay, lesbian and heterosexual people's development and self-perception; how new definitions and theories of human sexuality generated by gay and lesbian individuals and communities present alternatives to dominant heterosexist traditions. One of the main objectives of this interdisciplinary course is to open intellectual dialogue, to broaden students' awareness of the human experience at the same time we acquaint ourselves with some of the most intellectually interesting works that have stemmed from gay inspiration. Films to be studied will include a selection from the following list: Beautiful Thing (Hettie Macdonald); Boys don't Cry (Kimberly Peirce); Brokeback Mountain (Ang Lee); Love's the Devil (John Maybury); Saving Face (Alice Wu); Stage Beauty (Richard Eyre); All About My Mother (Pedro Almodóvar); Another Gay Movie (Todd Stephens); Nico and Dani (Francesc Gay), and The Celluloid Closet (Rob Epstein). There will also be literary texts used in this class.

FTT 30800. Scenic Painting

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the tools and techniques used in painted and textured scenery for the stage and screen. Students will learn and apply the variety of methods used in creating a wide range of painted effects; from the basic wood treatments to the advanced marbling and faux finishes. Outside of class painting time will be required.

FTT 30801. Scene Design and Techniques for the Stage

(3-0-3)

This is a beginner's course in basic scenic design techniques and hand drafting for the stage. This course will take the student through the process of design from how to read a script, research, presentation, rendering, basic drafting, and if time allows, model building. No previous experience necessary. Materials fee TBA.

FTT 30802. Lighting Design and Methodology

(3-0-3)

This course serves as an introduction to the theories and practice of lighting design for the stage. Students will explore the design process as well as study the practical considerations of the execution of a design. Specific topics covered will include electricity, light, theatrical equipment and its development, communication of the design, and the role of the designer within the artistic infrastructure.

FTT 30803. Costume Design and Methodology

(3-0-3)

This course teaches the principles of costume design for the stage and the techniques of constructing costumes. The course will explore the use of costumes to express character traits by analyzing play scripts. The course will include an introduction of the basic skills needed to construct costumes.

FTT 30804. Draping and Flat Patternmaking

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 20703*Corequisite:* FTT 31804

Students will learn how to develop sewing patterns for theatre costumes through the two standard methods used in the profession: draping and flat patternmaking. Students will learn the basics of creating various patterns needed to construct contemporary and period costumes for stage and film.

FTT 30900. Advanced Dramaturgy

Prerequisite: FTT 20900

This course will give students the opportunity to create their own full length dramaturgical projects, such as adaptations, translations, preparing texts for the stage, and/or creating program and study guides for particular plays. Independent, individual projects will be central. Students will be expected to present their work (as staged readings, presentations, etc.) for the public.

FTT 30901. The Hyphenated American

(3-0-3)

This course will engage theatrical works for, by, and about hyphenated Americans (African Americans, Asian Americans, etc.) Students will see live theatre, theatre on video, and interviews with dramatists and performers. Reading and understanding plays and various theoretical materials on race, culture and immigration will also be vital components of the course. The course will require a large research project based on a topic of the students' choosing.

FTT 30902. Beyond Beans and Rice: Theatre from Latin America

(3-0-3) Prizant

What does popular theatre look like beyond our borders? What can we learn from artistic choices in Mexico, Argentina, or Cuba? This course will serve as an introduction to contemporary plays, playwrights, and performances from Latin America. Models from South America, Central America, North America, and the Caribbean will be included (in English) to give students an overview from a sampling of the Spanish-speaking world. Students will be expected to read plays and articles, analyze scripts and performances, give creative and/or historical presentations about contexts in Latin American countries, participate in discussions about theatrical methods and materials, and research areas of particular interest to them. No previous Spanish language or acting experience is necessary.

FTT 31001. Acting: Character

Prerequisite: FTT 21001

The second course in the acting progression, this course expands on basic methodology and incorporates physical techniques for building a character. Students explore psychological gestures, Laban effort shapes, and improvisation as they develop a personal approach to creating a role.

FTT 31002. Voice and Movement

Prerequisite: FTT 21001

A course designed to help the advanced acting student focus on kinesthetic awareness. The actor will identify and work to remove physical and vocal tensions that cause habituated movement and impede natural sound production. Through movement and vocal exercises created for actors, students will experience what "prepared readiness" for the stage consists of, and how to meet the demands of a live performance.

FTT 31003. Acting: Role—Contemporary

(3-0-3)

Advanced exploration of technique and methodology, focusing on problem solving in approaching roles from the literature of the contemporary theatre.

FTT 31005. Theatre Production Workshop

(V-0-V)

Prerequisite: FTT 21001

A workshop course in the process of theatre production in which students assume a major nonperformance production responsibility including, but not limited to stage manager, assistant stage manager, prop master, costumer, technical director, or assistant director. This course can be repeated for up to four hours credit. Requires instructor's permission.

FTT 31006. Directing: Process

Prerequisite: FTT 21001

Directing: Process introduces students to the basic philosophies and techniques of stage directing. This course is appropriate for any student interested in learning how to tell compelling stories through the use of textual analysis, dramatic action, and persuasive visuals. Students will learn how to analyze text, select a script for production, strategize for production meetings and rehearsals, and represent ideas visually. This course will also include an introduction to an exciting new directing technique known as viewpoints. Students will have the opportunity to prepare, cast, and rehearse scenes outside of class that will culminate in an end-of-semester showcase performance. Script analyses will be acquired in relation to scripts read throughout the semester, while both script analyses and prompt books will be required in relation to your final scene showing at the end of the semester.

FTT 31007. Writing for Screen and Stage II

(3-0-3)

Advanced class for students interested in completing a major writing project for reading/staging at the end of the semester. Writing for Screen and Stage I is not a prerequisite, but Writing for Screen and Stage II is by application only.

FTT 31012. Approaches to Acting for Stage and Screen

(3-0-3)

An active and participatory overview of several techniques that actors and directors can employ for the best results in any given situation whether it be on the stage or in front of the camera. Discover what process will work for you and/or your actors! Methods explored in the course will include Stanislavski, Grotowski, Meisner, viewpoints, and Suzuki.

FTT 31013. Performance, Culture, and Creativity

(3-0-3)

Performance, Culture, and Creativity seeks to integrate cultural experiences with the intellectual practice of examination and discovery. The focal point of the course requires students to identify the cultural and universal semiotics in stage plays and then to create performances based on their research. Theatre becomes the framework you will use to make sense of disparate realities. We will look at theatre as both an artistic endeavor, and more specifically, as subjective experiences that occur for each individual in drastically different ways—dependent upon that person's cultural background and current environment. This course is intended for the student who has recently returned from studying abroad, but all students are welcome.

FTT 31016. Shakespeare on the Page and on the Stage

(3-0-3)

Meet—or reacquaint yourself with—Shakespeare in a class that will examine his works from both literary and performative perspectives. Close textual readings of the plays will find realization in class performances of scenes and soliloquies. Co-taught by a former chair of Princeton's English Department and a professional actor trained in London and the United States.

FTT 31410. Introduction to Film and Television Production Lab

(3-3-3)

Corequisite: FTT 30410

A lab course in the fundamentals of writing, shooting, editing, and lighting for narrative film and video productions. This is a hands-on production course emphasizing aesthetics, creativity, and technical expertise. Expect significant amounts of shooting and editing outside of class, as well as helping classmates on their shoots. Materials fee required.

FTT 35501. Media Internship

(V-V-V)

Film, television, and theatre students who successfully complete at least two of the following courses, FTT 30462, FTT 30410 or FTT 30463, may be eligible for an internship at a television station or network, a radio station, video production company, film production company, or similar media outlet. Interns must work 10–15 hours per week and compile 150 work hours by the end of the semester. Interns will complete a project, midsemester progress report, and a final evaluation paper. Students can only apply 3 credits in internships toward their major. Permission of instructor by application. Application can be obtained from website, nd.edu/-ftt/, or in FTT office.

FTT 40000. CAD for the Stage

(3-0-3)

The study of the use of the computer to design scenery and lighting for the stage. The course will begin at a rudimentary level of understanding of computer-aided design and progress to 2-D and then 3-D design techniques. A basic understanding of computer systems is necessary, and significant computer work is required outside class.

FTT 40002. Directing: Process

Prerequisite: FTT 31006

Advanced independent projects in directing. Students considering this course should consult with the instructor for departmental guidelines.

FTT 40003. Advanced Technical Production

Prerequisite: FTT 20703

Advanced coursework in the tools, materials, and processes used in the creation of theatrical scenery. Topics may include (but not limited to) scenic welding, advanced rigging techniques, electronic controls, pneumatics, hydraulics, structural design for the stage, CAD, and other state-of-the-art technologies.

FTT 40008. Dramatic Text, Production, and Social Concerns From the 1900s to the Present

(3-0-3)

This course will explore dramatic text and production as an artistic expression and social comment on social problems and issues affecting a cultural condition from the 1900s to the present. It will study the use of modern tragedy, farce, burlesque, satire, symbolic drama, religious drama, social realism, street theatre forms, chameleon plays, and performance art as expressions and agents of social change.

FTT 40009. Creating Original Performance

(3-0-3)

Veering away from the concept of transferring existing dramatic text onstage, this course focuses on devising theatre. The participants embark on a participatory and process of writing and creating a new performance text based on collective planning and sharing, experimentation and improvisation, investigation and research, and interdisciplinary material.

FTT 40011. Italian Theatre Workshop

(2-0-2)

A full-immersion language experience for the study, practice, production, and performance of authentic Italian texts. Includes analytical and writing components.

FTT 40012. The Theatre of Tom Stoppard

(3-0-3)

This course will provide students with insights into the theatre of Tom Stoppard and his plays between 1973 and 2001. We will read the plays Travesties, Arcadia, and the trilogy Coast of Utopia. Students will discuss the historical, philosophical, and scientific background for these plays and develop their own ideas for contemporary productions.

FTT 40014. Anglo-Irish Theatre: 1700–1990

(3-0-3)

Students of English theatre and drama often ignore both the overt and covert contributions made by Ireland, its people, and its culture. Many of the greatest English playwrights since the restoration have in fact been Irish, Anglo-Irish, or heavily influenced by Ireland, and this discussion-oriented course will examine and explore this important symbiosis in terms of theatre, history, and society. Both in terms of internal aspects and external relations, the course will examine a dozen significant Anglo-Irish playwrights writing in English including Congreve, Goldsmith Sheridan, O’Keeffe, Boucicault, Yeats, Lady Gregory, Synge, O’Casey, Shaw, Wilde, Beckett, Behan, and Friel. We will relate a play (the drama) to the production history of that play (the theatre) while exploring both the larger societal issues of the times, internally to Ireland and externally to England, France, and the United States while also looking at the important world drama component (as seen with Yeats and Japanese Noh).

FTT 40101. Film and Television Theory

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101

Corequisite: FTT 41101

This course offers an introduction to the philosophical, aesthetic, cultural, and historical issues that inform current scholarship and production in film and television. The focus of the course may vary from semester to semester.

FTT 40231. Italian Cinema: Realities of History

(3-0-3)

This course explores the construction and development of the Italian cinematic realist tradition from the silent era to the early 1970s, although its primary focus is on the period 1934–66, which stretches from the appearance of Blasetti’s openly fascist “historical” reconstruction, La Vecchia Guardia, to Pasolini’s “eccentric” exercise in left-wing commitment, Uccellacci E Uccellini, with its mix of expressionist and hyper-realist techniques. At the center of this period are found some of Italy’s most highly regarded films made by directors, such as Vittorio De Sica, Roberto Rossellini, and Luchino Visconti, who belonged to the neorealist movement (1945–53). These filmmakers rejected escapist cinema and tried to make films that examined the contemporary experiences of ordinary Italians. As well as analyzing the films in themselves, the course examines the formal and ideological continuities and differences between neorealist films and their silent and fascist predecessors. In a similar way, it analyses neorealism’s impact on later filmmakers, such as Federico Fellini, Pietro Germi, Pier Paolo Pasolini, illo Pontecorvo, Dino Risi, and Francesco Rosi, who attempted to develop new versions of cinematic realism. Finally, the course aims to locate the films in their historical and cultural contexts and to address theoretical issues arising from the concept of “realism.” Taught in English. Fulfills FTT international requirements.

FTT 40233. Italian National Cinema

Corequisite: FTT 41233

Examining the interaction of history and film history, this course frames the question of “national cinema” in the Italian case. Providing an overview of one of the most renowned and beloved “national” cinemas, topics to be treated include (1) “making Italians” and the beginnings of Italian cinema; (2) the golden age of Italian silent film; (3) the transition to sound; (4) Hollywood and the Italian film industry under fascism; (5) neo-realism and the post-WWII period; (6) politics and popular film genres of the 1950s and ‘60s; (7) comedy, Italian style, and changing gender roles; (8) Fellini, Pasolini, Visconti, Antonioni: auteurs and the international success of Italian film in the ‘60s and ‘70s; (9) women directors of the ‘80s and ‘90s; and (10) representations of recent Italian history in contemporary cinema: terrorism and the “years of lead.” Attention will also be given to the history of governmental film policies and attempts to produce a putatively “Italian national cinema,” the construction of national identity in film, the interaction of writers and cinema, and an examination of the ways in which images of the “nation: are understood and received by audiences both at home and abroad. Requirements include attendance at mandatory film screenings, preparation of readings and participation in class discussions, two short interpretive papers, an oral presentation, a midterm, and a final exam. The class will be conducted in English.

FTT 40238. Film, Literature, and Irish Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41238

This course will examine some of the dominant images of Ireland in film and literature, and will place their development in a wider cultural and historical context. Comparisons between film, literature, and other cultural forms will be featured throughout the course, and key stereotypes relating to gender, class, and nation will be analyzed, particularly as they bear on images of romantic Ireland and modernity, landscape, the city, religion, violence, family, and community. Particular attention will be paid to key figures such as Yeats, Synge, and Joyce, and contemporary writers such as John McGahern, William Trevor, Patrick McCabe, and Roddy Doyle will be discussed in terms of the wider implications of their work for contemporary Irish culture. The resurgence of Irish cinema and new forms of Irish writing in the past two decades will provide the main focus of the second part of the semester, tracing the emergence of new distinctive voices and images in an increasingly globalized and multicultural Ireland.

FTT 40239. Brazilian Cinema and Popular Music

(3-0-3)

This course offers social, cultural, and historical perspectives on Brazil through film and popular music. Topics include the reception of Cinema Novo and post-Cinema Novo films, bossa nova, samba and Tropicalia (a movement with key manifestations in literature, cinema and popular music) and the circumstances surrounding its creation, the repressive military regime that governed Brazil from 1964 to 1985.

FTT 40241. Hong Kong Action Cinema in a Global Context

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41241

This course addresses the global significance of the gong fu vague [kung fu new wave] that hit world cinema in the early 1970s and its ripple effects up to the present. As the signature genre of the Hong Kong film industry, it does not stand in global isolation but is rather a product of careful market research in developing a distinctive genre that could have global popularity outside of its traditional regionalized domestic market (HK and Southeast Asia) and its overseas ethnic Chinese enclaves in numerous Chinatowns across the world. Some of the key issues that we will cover include: How does a small non-national population sustain a commercially viable film industry? How can a film industry create a version of action cinema that supersedes Hollywood’s dominance in the genre? Is this purely a “Chinese” phenomenon or one that is inherently dependent on non-Chinese participation? Do these films have ideological, aesthetic and economic significance within a larger framework or must they be critically dismissed outright? What does it mean that “everybody was kung fu fighting” and continuing to do so? Taught in English. No knowledge of Mandarin or Cantonese is required. Whenever possible, we will view the films in their original language with English subtitles. A few films will be dubbed in English. Fulfills FTT international requirements.

FTT 40242. Contemporary Korean Cinema

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 30102

Corequisite: FTT 41242

This course provides a historical, cultural, and aesthetic appraisal of South Korean cinema as it evolved from a Korean-centric film industry to a globally engaged film industry as evidenced by the current hallyu (Korea fever) phenomenon. Aspects of cultural continuity as well as cultural transformations and the forces that are involved in this dynamic cultural arena will be addressed. Some of the films under analysis will include Obaltan: Aimless Bullet, Sopyonje, Peppermint Candy, Shiri,

Bungee Jumping of Their Own, My Sassy Girl, and JSA. No knowledge of Korean is required. Fulfills FTT international film requirement

FTT 40244. Films of Pedro Almodovar

(3-0-3)

An introduction to contemporary Spanish culture and society through a selection of Pedro Almodovar's most representative cinematic output. Discussions focus on important features such as postmodernist aesthetics, questions of national identity, pop culture, the controversial representation of gender roles and sexuality in general, and the celebration of heterodox desires vis-à-vis repressive social conventions. Taught in Spanish.

(3-0-3)

This course examines how various forms of popular culture from Latin America and the Caribbean migrate to the United States and are reappropriated by Latina/o cultural producers. Focusing particularly on theories of melodrama as a feminine discursive space, we will analyze several works of Latina/o literature that underscore women's active interpretation of music, film, and television. While this is a literature-based course, students will also examine how hybrid cultural products such as contemporary boleros, films, and telenovelas produce a transnational imaginary that connects Latinas/os in the United States with Latin America and the Caribbean. We will read novels such as Loving Pedro Infante by Denise Chavez, The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love by Oscar Hijuelos, and Tomorrow They Will Kiss by Eduardo Santiago.

FTT 40246. Transnational Immigration in European Cinema

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101

Corequisite: FTT 41246

This seminar will examine fundamental aspects of immigration in the European Union and the way this is represented in contemporary film.

FTT 40248. Contemporary European Cinema: From Cinema Paradiso to The Edge of Heaven

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41248

This course traces the major developments in contemporary European cinema since 1989. 1989 is the symbolic onset of a renewed Europeanism—marked by fall of the Berlin Wall, the reunification of Germany, and the dissolution of the Soviet Union that is also reflected in cinema. As a result, instead of studying individual national cinemas, we will examine how film is used as a political metaphor that reflects the geopolitical, socioeconomic, and cultural changes that have been occurring in Europe during the last two decades. In addition, we will also examine the state of the European film industry as well. The class lectures will deal with specific issues that cut across national cinemas and genres and will be framed by some key questions: How is European cinema constantly negotiating its relationship to Hollywood? How have filmmakers responded to important political events like the fall of the Berlin Wall and the dissolution of the Soviet Union? How is the constantly expanding European Union redefining considerations of national and supranational identity? We will also consider how the EU further promotes this Europeanism with financial initiatives and coproduction deals.

FTT 40410. Narrative Cinematography

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 30410

Corequisite: FTT 41410

This is both a 16mm film and HD Video production course, which will focus on the short narrative film using both 16mm color film stock and DVCPROHD Video. We will explore both the technical and aesthetic aspects of cinematography of both formats using Arri SR cameras and the Panasonic HVX200 P2 card system. Students will also learn to use a variety of grip and lighting equipment. We will look at the collaborative roles of the director and cinematographer along with various crew positions. Students will first shoot in class lighting and composition tests and then produce a 3- to 4-minuted color, silent film in teams of two by the semester break. In the second half of the semester, those teams will then learn the HVX camera system, shooting the same film narrative on HD video. We will compare and analyze the techniques and results of both formats. All projects will be edited digitally on Final Cut Pro. All students will also be crew members working on the other films in the class. This is a very hands-on class with emphasis on a practical set experience. Attendance and participation are mandatory. Written midterm and final exams. Materials Fee required. Course DVD to be provided. Book: Cinematography: The Classic Guide to Filmmaking, 3rd edition.

FTT 40411. Documentary Video Production

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 30405 OR FTT 30410

Corequisite: FTT 41411

A hands-on creative course for the advanced production student interested in both the storytelling techniques of the documentarian and the technology of the professional video production world. Students will write, shoot, and edit two nonfiction-based video projects, while learning advanced nonlinear editing techniques using Avid Media Composer software, and post production audio sweetening with DigiDesign Pro tools. Materials fee required.

FTT 40412. Advanced Filmmaking

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 40410

Corequisite: FTT 41412

This is a film/video production workshop for advanced students, focusing on the scripting and development of sync sound, 16mm short color films in the fiction mode. It stresses writing skills with an emphasis on innovations that expand the existing traditions of and boundaries between fiction and nonfiction practices. Students will work in teams of two to produce and prepare films for shooting.

FTT 40414. High Definition Production

Prerequisite: FTT 40410

Through both practical application and critical analysis, this class will explore the use of high definition formats in both film and video. Starting with tests in 16mm color film and the new Panasonic HVX200 camera and P2 card system, you will explore the differences in color and light rendition and then go on to create short, narrative productions in groups each month. We will utilize the P2 digital workflow and incorporate compositing and color effects techniques.

FTT 40415. The Art and Practice of Screenwriting

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41415

Filmmaking is always, at first, thinking and writing. This is a workshop for current and would-be screenwriters, to develop original ideas for the screen and to practice those techniques whereby those ideas can be translated into cinema on the page. Coursework will involve many short writing exercises and finally a script for a 20-minute film. There will also be a required lab screening.

FTT 40430. Postmodern Narrative

In this course we will begin by focusing on the emergence of post-modernism and then trace its evolution through the present. Initially, our primary concern will be the conflicted conceptualization of the term; i.e. just what did post-modern mean in terms of a narrative practice and in terms of a "cultural condition"? Once we have established some operating definitions, and become familiar with some of the narratives that were first called post-modern (Pynchon's Crying of Lot 49, Scott's Blade Runner, etc.), we will begin to discuss the novels and films which became synonymous with post-modern textuality (Rushdie's Midnight's Children, Winterson's Sexing the Cherry, DeLillo's Libra, Barne's Flaubert's Parrot). In the last third of the course, we will focus on the increasing interdependency of literary, film, and television cultures through the analysis of specific narratives (Ondaatje's The English Patient, Cunningham's The Hours) and specific phenomena (superstore bookshops, Miramax adaptations and television book clubs) in order to gain a better understanding of what constitutes “literary culture” at the turn of the 21st century. In addition to these titles, there will be a substantial course packet that will include relevant theoretical material. Course requires permission of professor.

FTT 40431. Sex and Gender in Cinema

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41431

This course analyzes representations of and theories about sex and gender in cinema. Students will read major texts in feminist theory, queer theory, and masculinity studies, in order to become familiar with important concepts and debates within the field. Topics covered will include “the male gaze,” spectatorship, performance and stardom, camp, “reading against the grain,” consumption, gender and genre, race and gender, masquerade, authorship, and masculinity “in crisis.” Class requirements include a weekly screening, online journals, and essays.

FTT 40433. Cinema Ideologies

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 41433

Cinema, both in fiction and nonfiction forms, is one of the major contributing forces to the construction of ourselves and our perception of “others” in terms of class, gender, and race and sexual preference. This course will dissect these constructions in films like Hoop Dreams, Schindler’s List, Philadelphia, The Killing Fields, and Dancing With Wolves through a close-reading practice.

FTT 40437. Media Culture

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 30101 OR FTT 30461)

Corequisite: FTT 41437

An advanced investigation of selected topics concerning media or cultural studies.

FTT 40439. Cultures of Fear/Horror Film

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the construction and application of central themes in the scope of international horror cinema and how they reveal salient aspects of cultural similarities and differences including: gender, sexuality, violence and socio-political climates.

FTT 40442. The Horror Film: Theories and Histories

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 41442

This seminar examines one of the most enduring and popular movie genres: the horror film. We will consider the genre from a historical perspective, tracking how it has evolved over time and across movements (examples: silent-era German expressionism, Hollywood’s classic monster movies of the 1930s, the nuclear anxiety pictures of the ‘50s, the slasher films of the ‘80s, contemporary Japanese horror cinema). In addition to the social, political, and industrial factors that have influenced horror’s development, we will also examine several influential (and competing) theories that attempt to explain horror’s seemingly paradoxical appeal.

FTT 40443. Walt Disney in Film and Culture

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101) AND (FTT 30101 OR FTT 30102 OR FTT 30461)

Corequisite: FTT 41443

The name “Disney” has achieved nearly mythic status in the United States and international film and culture. For many, the name evokes treasured childhood memories of watching the The Lion King or The Little Mermaid or of discovering Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck for the first time. Among film scholars, Disney cartoons stand as some of the finest examples of carefully crafted, naturalistic, character-centered animation. For business majors and professionals, the Walt Disney Company has come to symbolize a modern, competitive corporation that seeks to leverage its stories and characters across a variety of media platforms in a global marketplace. While many love Disney films, and see Walt Disney as an American icon, his popularity and “American-ness” have sparked controversy in other countries and in various historical periods. This class examines Walt Disney, Disney films, and the Disney Company from a variety of perspectives that will help us understand both Disney’s enduring popularity and the kinds of suspicions its worked has raised. Our readings will draw from biographies of Walt Disney; histories of the Disney studio and of the animation industry in general; critical analyses of the films; and cultural studies of Disney merchandising, theme parks and theatrical productions. Screenings will include the classic films of the studio era.

FTT 40490. Media Ethics

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the ethical challenges that newsroom managers face as well as the issues that reporters in the field must tackle on a daily basis. Much of the course will deal with case studies of actual ethical dilemmas at major news organizations. Also, students will be asked to seek out and bring to class issues dealing with the full range of media from network news to Internet blogs. The course endeavors to teach both the aspiring professional journalist and the non-professional news consumer how to evaluate what they see and read. Taught by the former editor-in-chief of The Boston Globe.

FTT 40492. Media Stardom and Celebrity Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41492

Much of America’s contemporary popular culture, movies, TV, music, even sports revolves around stars, and yet few of us understand the implications of, or even the reasons for, our society’s fascination with fame and celebrity. This course interrogates the cultural phenomenon of stardom from a variety of historical and theoretical perspectives. Across the semester, we will explore how stardom developed as a concept across the 20th century, learn how to “read” star images, look at the development of the Hollywood star system, consider what the popularity of certain film stars might tell us about the issues of social identity, examine stardom as a global phenomenon, and question why celebrity is such an obsession today. Overall, our goal will be to develop tools for investigating the cultural significance of stardom and to use those tools to uncover what stardom and celebrity reveal about both our society and ourselves.

FTT 40493. Media Industries: History, Structure, Current Issues

(3-0-3)

Prerequisites: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101) AND (FTT 30102 OR FTT 30461)

Corequisite: FTT 41493

This class is designed for students planning to seek jobs in film and television companies and for those wanting a better understanding of how the media industry has taken the shape it has today. We will explore the histories of particular companies and broader changes in the structure of the media industry as a whole in the last century. Some of the topics to be considered include the impact on projects and performers of multimedia conglomerates such as GE/NBC/Universal and Disney/ABC/ESPN; the effects of recent mergers between Disney and Pixar and the WB and UPN; the increasing globalization of media companies, such as News Corp/Fox; and the trend toward media convergence, as evidenced by AOL Time Warner and Sony. Readings and discussions will familiarize students with concepts from historiography and political economy.

FTT 40494. Cinema, Gender, and Space

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: FTT 41494

This course will explore various configurations of cinema, gender, and space in American film. We will consider the space of the cinema screen and its gendering through framing and mise-en-scène. We will also consider the space of the cinema itself, as a site of amusement, and its shifting gendering. We will examine how various spaces (the city, the department store, the office, the home, the apartment, the West) are represented in film and how those spaces are gendered.

FTT 40495. Television as a Storytelling Medium

(3-0-3) Becker

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101*Corequisite:* FTT 41495

In a communications world dominated by visual culture, television has become society's primary storyteller. Stories are packaged and presented for our consumption in scripted dramas and sitcoms, unscripted reality shows and docudramas, news broadcasts and sporting events, and even commercials and promos. Through exploring the structures, methods, meanings, and impacts of television's various narrative forms, this course will consider how the medium of television enables creators and viewers to tap into the fundamental cultural practice of storytelling. Across the semester, students will read theories of narratology and assessments of television's narrative techniques, screen a variety of narrative examples (chiefly from American television, though some non-American television might be screened), and write their own critical analyses of television's storytelling practices. The class meetings will be primarily driven by discussions, supplemented by lectures, and the assignments will include periodic writing assignments, a final exam, and a term paper on a topic of the student's choosing.

FTT 40496. Contemporary Television Genres

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101*Corequisite:* FTT 41496

The concept of genre has been fundamentally important to television throughout the medium's history, but it has grown into an even more complex object of study today. Genres allow producers and networks to more efficiently produce, schedule, and market television shows, while viewers often define their viewing by genre, seeking out shows within specific genres. Given the vast growth in programming and channel options today, genre has become ever more central and expansive, while individual genres themselves have grown increasingly heterogeneous. This course will examine the industrial, aesthetic, and cultural functions and effects of genre classification in contemporary television, covering a range of contemporary genres and theoretical approaches to understanding the role of genre on television today.

FTT 40501. Media and the Presidency

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)Corequisite: FTT 41501

As the brouhaha over Howard Dean's "yell" illustrates, media have come to play a key role in the coverage of presidential elections. This course examines how print and broadcast media have functioned in U.S. elections since the way we choose a president was first established. After a brief overview of changing relationships between journalists and presidential candidates in the 19th century, we will focus on elections since the 1920s, when radio first broadcast election updates. We will analyze how candidates have used radio, television, and the Internet to construct images of themselves and their platforms, and how journalists have become an active force in representing the political process. Rather than see electronic media as neutral or "objective," we will assess the narrative strategies and visual and verbal codes by which media present politics to us, the voters.

FTT 40600. Shakespeare and Film

(3-0-3) Holland

Corequisite: FTT 41600

This course explores the phenomenon of Shakespeare and film, concentrating on the meanings provoked by the "and" in the course-title. We shall be looking at examples of films of Shakespeare plays both early and recent, both in English and in other languages, and both ones that stick close to conventional concepts of how to film Shakespeare and adaptations at varying degrees of distance from his language, time, and plot, reaching a limit in versions that erase Shakespeare from the film. The transposition of different forms of Shakespearean texts (printed, theatrical, filmic) and the confrontation with the specificities of film production have produced and continue to produce a cultural phenomenon whose cultural meanings will be the subject of our investigations. There will be screenings of the films to be studied in the lab.

FTT 40702. Audition Seminar

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41702

Preparation for acting professionally and/or the advanced study of acting, directing and performance. A course of study is developed between the student and the faculty advisor(s) at the beginning of the semester. Students who are interested in taking this course but are not FTT majors should consult the instructor. Senior acting majors only. Offered fall only.

FTT 40800. Advanced Scenic Painting

(3-0-3)

An in-depth look and discussion of problem solving techniques of the scenic artist. The class will examine master work of both fine and scenic artists, through small group discussion and project critique. We will also discuss modern three dimensional construction materials of today's scenic artist and the profession itself.

FTT 40906. Contemporary Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of the dramatic literature produced by Irish playwrights during the later half of the 20th century.

FTT 41000. French Theatre Production

(2-0-2)

Students transform into actors of the Illustre Theatre de l'Universite de Notre Dame du Lac in a creative collaboration that has come to be known as the French play. We rehearse during the fall semester, and perform the play in late January. Students from all levels are encouraged to audition; theatrical experience is not expected.

FTT 41001. Advanced Scene Study

Prerequisite: FTT 21001

This course will be an in-depth look at the acting process through a workshop study of monologues and scenes from the masters of modern theatre. The course begins with the plays of Chekhov and works through the 20th century to contemporary times.

FTT 41002. Advanced Acting Techniques

Prerequisite: FTT 21001 OR FTT 31001

A course intended for the serious acting student, this advanced course uses method techniques in scene study and monologue work to hone the skills acquired in Character and Advanced Scene Study. Students will be responsible for finding, rehearsing, and performing texts from several genres. Class work will focus on impulse and response, creating realistic characters, and partner work. Rehearsals outside of class are mandatory.

FTT 41004. Advanced Theatre Production Workshop

(3-0-3)

A workshop course in the process of theatre production, in which students learn to do a dramaturgical analysis of a play for production as well as assume a major production responsibility including, but not limited to, that of performer, stage manager, assistant stage manager, prop master, costumer, technical director, and assistant director.

FTT 41005. Acting Shakespeare

Prerequisites: FTT 21001 AND (FTT 31001 OR FTT 31002)

Acting Shakespeare is an active and participatory exploration of the works of the world's greatest playwright from the perspective of the actor. You will be acquainted with basic analytical, physical, and vocal techniques for unlocking the meaning and emotional content of Shakespeare's texts. The structure of this course allows you the opportunity to create and present multiple roles through performance of both scenes and monologues.

FTT 41410. Intermediate Film Production Lab

(0-3-3)

Corequisite: FTT 40410

This film production course will focus on 16mm black and white silent narrative filmmaking. We will explore the technical use and aesthetic application of the film camera and related equipment as well as the development of the short film narrative script. Students will shoot a short film lighting and composition exercise, an in-class film test, and ultimately produce, shoot, and edit one 4- to 6-minute, 16mm B/W film in teams of two. The projects will be edited entirely on film. The filmmaking process requires a lot of field work on locations and transporting heavy equipment. In addition to the projects there will be a midterm and a few papers required.

FTT 41411. Documentary Video Production Lab

(0-3-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 30410 OR FTT 30405 OR FTT 30405

Corequisite: FTT 40411

A continuation of the course for the advanced production student interested in the techniques and technology of the video post production world and the digital manipulation of the moving image. Students will produce short projects using the DVCam tape format, while learning advanced nonlinear editing techniques with the Avid Xpress DV software, incorporating Adobe PhotoShop, Illustrator, and After Effects programs, and digital multi-track audio sweetening with DigiDesign Pro tools.

FTT 41412. Advanced Filmmaking Lab

(0-3-3)

Corequisite: FTT 40412

The lab focuses on the production and editing of 16mm short films developed in FTT 40412. Students will work in teams of two and utilize 16 mm film editing processes and Final Cut Pro digital technologies to produce a finished work—titled, mixed, and color-corrected—for the Student Film Festival and further distribution.

FTT 43602. Honors Seminar: Hitchcock

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41602

This course aims to teach honors students research methods, project development and advanced writing techniques through an examination of the films of Alfred Hitchcock. Students will see numerous Hitchcock films and TV shows, and read and research extensively in the literature on Hitchcock. Students will consider different approaches to Hitchcock, including auteurism, genre studies, feminist and psychoanalytic theories, reception studies, and industrial histories. Films we will screen include Rear Window, Psycho, North by Northwest, Blackmail, The 39 Steps, Rope, and Rebecca. For FTT Honors students and students eligible for honors, by permission of instructor and application to department.

FTT 43603. Honors Seminar: Shakespeare

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41603

This course aims to teach honors students research methods, project development, and advanced writing techniques through an examination of Shakespeare, primarily—though not necessarily exclusively—in relation to performance. Students will research performances past, visit theatre productions/see films present, imagine performances future. They will read and research extensively in the materials of Shakespeare performance and its critical literature. Students will consider different approaches to Shakespeare performance, including bibliographical, historical, nationalist, generic, feminist, and queer methodologies. Students will also consider the forms of representation of performance in Shakespeare editing and the work of selected actors, directors and designers. The lab will not be used every week but will be available for screenings of Shakespeare films.

FTT 43604. Honors Seminar: English Drama Before Shakespeare

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on research methods, project development, and advanced writing techniques through an examination of early English theatre and drama, primarily in relation to performance. Students will research English theatre and drama from the beginnings to Marlowe in the 1590s, with special attention to the English cyclic drama and such plays as The Castle of Perseverance. Students will consider different historiographical approaches and the value of primary records research. They will take advantage of the unique opportunities afforded them by the “Faust at Notre Dame” project, which includes the department’s production of Doctor Faustus. Screenings of relevant films will be available at the library.

FTT 43605. Honors Seminar: Theatre in the Age of Lincoln 1850–70

(3-0-3)

This course emphasizes research using sources as close to events as is humanly possible and thus relies heavily on the period’s newspapers. Topics include the play, Our American Cousin: Lincoln’s (and the nation’s) obsession with celebrity actress Laura Keane, her popular theatre in New York City, her appearance at Ford’s Theatre in spring 1865, and the ultimate assassination of Lincoln at the hands of an actor from America’s most prominent theatre family. This seminar also encourages work on the advances in technology as related to the development of theatre in the period. Students will become “expert” in a narrow area and that expertise will result in a “long” paper of 25+ pages, which will be presented to and examined by other students in the class.

FTT 45001. Theatre Internship

(V-0-V)

Placement of advanced students with professional or community theatre organizations. Students can take no more than two 45001 internships for a total of no more than six credit hours.

FTT 45501. Media Internship

(V-0-V)

Students who successfully complete at least two of the following courses, FTT 30410, FTT 30462, or FTT 30463, may be eligible for an internship at a television station or network, radio station, video production company, film production company or similar media outlet. Interns must work 10–15 hours per week and compile 150 work hours by the end of the semester (120 hours for the summer session) to obtain three credits. Interns will complete a project, midsemester progress report, and a final evaluation paper. NOTE: This course does not count as an upper-level course toward the FTT major.

FTT 46600. Thesis/Undergraduate Research

(V-0-V)

Research for the advanced student. Taken S/U only.

FTT 47001. Practicum

(V-0-V)

Individual practical projects for the advanced student. May be repeated up to six hours of credit. Taken S/U only.

FTT 47600. Special Studies: Film Society

(V-0-V)

The Film Society is a film screening-and-discussion group that meets once a week in the Browning Cinema to watch an independent, foreign, or classic film. Students can take the course for either zero credit or one credit. Those taking it for one credit will have a minimum attendance and writing requirement. The meeting times and requirements may vary from semester to semester. Contact the sponsoring professor for more information. NOTE: This course does not count as an upper-level course toward the FTT major.

FTT 47601. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

This course gives students an opportunity to conduct research and is intended for advanced students. Application and permission of the individual instructor is required. Application may be obtained from the departmental website at fit.nd.edu/ or by visiting the FTT departmental office.

FTT 47603. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Research for the advanced student. This is a summer course. By permission of the sponsoring professor.

FTT 53601. Issues in Film and Media

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 51601

The purpose of this capstone course is to provide students concentrating in film and media with a senior seminar in which they may participate in some of the current critical debates in advanced film, television, and new media studies, through class discussion and in individual projects. The topics vary each semester, but might include the role of government control of and social influence on the media, the effects of new global markets, concerns about representing race and gender, and new critical and aesthetic approaches. The course will be formatted as the kind of seminar that one might encounter in a graduate program, with students sitting around a table giving oral presentations based on readings and screenings. The class will meet in one 150-minute session, with a short midsession break. There will be guest faculty visiting the class. Each student will write a 15- to 20-page term paper that will be developed over the semester in close consultation with the instructor. This course is for the graduate student.

FTT 56602. Thesis Direction

(V-0-V)

Permission required.

FTT 57601. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Art Dept. MFA takes hours with this professor for independent study.

Department of Gender Studies

GSC 10001. Introduction to Gender Studies

(3-0-3) Palko

This course is intended to give students a familiarity with the development, context, and major issues of gender studies. Our sex has been described as the first and most formative aspect of our identity—from the moment we are born, we are categorized as either a girl or a boy. But while sex is determined (not always clearly) by our biological characteristics, the lived experience “gender” is influenced by many more factors. The complexity of what “gender” is and how it affects us is what we will study in class. What does it mean to be a “girl” or a “boy”? How does one experience differ from the other? What about individuals who do not feel comfortable in their sex category? Gender is a complex and contested aspect of human life at which cultural norms, individual experience, nature, nurture, biology, desire, and power all intersect. In class, we will identify and analyze our own assumptions about what gender means while moving toward a thorough knowledge of how “gender” has been understood, performed, and deployed in history. We will be examining literature, political theory, film, visual art, critical theory, and history to understand why “Gender Studies” is a useful field of knowledge, and what gender means to ourselves and to those around us.

GSC 10002. Introduction to Feminist and Gender Theory

(2.5-0-3) Weeks

Intended as a broad survey of feminist and gender theory, this course is designed not only for gender studies concentrators, but also for anyone who is interested in exploring the ways in which the categories of gender and sex influence and shape nearly every facet of human existence. Theorizing about gender lends itself naturally to practical application in everyday life and to an interdisciplinary approach that both employs and calls into question methods, perspectives, and critical tools from a variety of fields in the humanities, social sciences, and natural sciences. In this course, you will examine topics ranging from Buffy the Vampire Slayer to feminist epistemology, from gender’s intersections with race and sexuality to gender’s intersections with religion and politics, and from the “Mommy Wars” and “lifestyle feminism” to pivotal debates about essentialism and constructivism. By the end of the class, you should have assembled a methodological “toolkit” that will enable you to apply a critical, “gendered” perspective in venues both inside and outside academic life.

GSC 10600. The Social Construction of Difference and Inequality

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction accenting the organization and expression of arguments suggested by readings in sociology. Each of the seminars treats a particular sociological topic, such as family life, social problems, the urban crisis, poverty, etc.

GSC 20001. Introduction to Gender Studies

GSC 20100. Gendering Christianity

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is an introduction to feminist approaches to spiritual and philosophical traditions in the Christian West. Beginning from the pastoral and practical issues raised by gender assignments in the context of religious experience, it addresses major topics of theological thinking (such as sin, salvation, images of God, and Christology) relating historical development and contemporary feminist re-readings. The approach is both critical (i.e., analytical) and constructive; the primary focus is on Christian and post-Christian theological and literary texts, but some attention is given to other religious perspectives.

GSC 20102. Theories of Sexual Difference

(3-0-3) Kourany

Corequisite: GSC 27999

An examination of the following questions: What kind of differences separate men and women? Are these differences natural, or are they socially produced; and are these differences beneficial to us or are they limiting? What does equality mean for people characterized by such differences?

GSC 20103. Twentieth-Century American Feminist Fiction

(3-0-3)

Close readings of major 20th-century novels, written by both men and women, which may be accurately described as “feminist.”

GSC 20104. Gender and Nineteenth-Century British Novel

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

How gender and gender relations in 19th-century Britain are explored and revealed in selected novels of the period.

GSC 20106. Gender, Sexuality in Pop Media

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course focuses on predetermined gendered roles and sexuality in our culture as represented in popular media. Special emphasis will be placed on film as we look at, among other things, issues of sexuality and homosexuality on the silver screen. We will also look closely at music, the emergence of a female presence, music videos and hip-hop culture.

GSC 20175. Some Other Mess: The Role of Black Outsiders in the African Diaspora

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

They go by many names: bohos, artists, radicals, intellectuals, TRAs, mixies, and punks. They are members of the African Diaspora who defy the stereotypical construction of Black people that the media and a history of marginalization by the “mainstream” culture have created. People who look like them and with whom they share the same politicized racial identity often ostracize them. Are these individuals dangerous outsiders, who by eschewing the communal traditions that led to the securing of civil rights for a united African American population are imperiling black identity with a quest for individual freedom? Or, are they renegades whose explorations outside of accepted constructions of black identity challenge entrenched ideas of race, class, sexuality and gender, not only for African Americans, but for everyone living in a postmodern multicultural world? Are they part of a long and illustrious history of identity exploration by African Americans who helped to shape and change American culture? These are some of the questions we will explore in this course. It is an investigation into the lives, work, and legacies of members of the African Diaspora who are clearly into “some other mess”; that is, those who insist on doing their own thing in world that still takes issue with individual freedom of expression for some marginalized peoples. The assertion of the right to individual expression raises questions that are at the heart of the American ideal of integration and the African American construct of community.

GSC 20176. Gender, Race, Class, Sexuality

(3-0-3)

Owing to its reputation as the most “transcendent” and “autonomous” of all the arts, music has long been deemed “exempt” from the kinds of ideological critique applied to other modes of cultural production. In recent years, however, critics have begun to challenge the notion of autonomy in music and have attempted to demonstrate the inevitably ideological nature of all music, whether texted or not. This course adopts a cultural studies approach, focused on issues of gender, race, class, and sexuality, to the study of a wide range of both classical and popular musics, from pastourelles of the Middle Ages to music videos of Madonna, with special attention to Mozart’s Don Giovanni and Bizet’s Carmen. Students will learn how to listen and recognize common signifying practices adopted by composers and musicians—e.g., specific uses of melody, rhythm, meter, tempi, harmonic scales and chord progressions, dynamics, and instrumentation—and to explore critical modes of interpreting those particular musical choices within specific ideological frameworks. Intended for non-majors; no formal prerequisites. Recommended University elective.

GSC 20177. American Men, American Women

(3-0-3) Ardizzone

Corequisite: GSC 27999

What does it mean to be male or female in America? Where did our ideas about gender come from and how do they influence our lives, institutions, values, and cultures? In this course we will begin by reviewing colonial and Victorian gender systems in the United States. Our focus, however, is the 20th century, and the development of modern (early 20th c.) and contemporary (post-1970s) gender roles and ideas. How much have they changed over time, and what aspects have been retained? We will explore the ways that cultural images, political changes, and economic needs have shaped the definition of acceptable behavior and life choices based on sex and gender. We will also pay close attention to the roles that race, class, culture, sexuality, marital status, and other key factors play in determining male and female roles and influencing images of femininity and masculinity.

GSC 20178. Women in Islamic Societies

(3-0-3) Afsaruddin

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is a broad survey of women’s and gender issues in various Islamic societies, with a focus on the Arab Middle East. The first half of the semester will concentrate on the historical position of women in Islamic societies, defined by the normative values of Islam and by cultural traditions and norms. We will discuss how the interpretations of these values in diverse circumstances and who gets to do the interpreting have had an important impact on women’s societal roles. The second half of the course will privilege women’s voices and agency in articulating their gendered identities and roles in a number of pre-modern and modern Islamic societies. Our sources for discovering these voices are women's memoirs, fiction, magazine articles, and public speeches. We will also focus on how historical phenomena such as Western colonialism, nationalist liberation movements, and civil and other forms of war have given rise to women's organized movements and a feminist socio-political consciousness in many cases.

GSC 20179. Tropical Heat Waves: Contemporary Latino/a and Caribbean Literature

(3-0-3)

A review of selected contemporary Latino/a and Caribbean novels.

GSC 20221. Gender Roles and Violence in Society

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This sociology course will examine gender roles and violence in society.

GSC 20222. Social Theory and New Feminism

(3-0-3)

The course will be devoted to analyzing and juxtaposing some early European social thinkers with the writings and postulates of the so called new Catholic feminism. We will examine some chosen texts of Ferdinand Toennies, Georg Simmel, and Edith Stein, where they analyzed the questions of the particular role of women in society and culture, and we will delve into the roots of the Catholic new feminism inspired by John Paul II. (Provided such is the choice of the students, we can also look into this writings from times before he became a Pope to analyze his ideas about the relations of the sexes). Moreover, some contemporary Polish new feminist figures and their thought (e.g., Elzbieta Adamiak), together with the writings of Janne H. Matlary from Norway will be introduced and examined. Finally, the American new feminists' texts will be introduced. The course will create an opportunity to analyze the European thought in the context of the American experience, which students bring to the class.

GSC 20254. Gender by the Gaslight: The Detective in Film and Fiction

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

From sensational Victorian stories to contemporary police procedurals, from Sherlock Holmes to Nancy Drew—the detective remains a cultural icon. This course investigates the gender dynamics at the heart of crime puzzles and the masterminds who solve them. Students will write two short essays and one term paper.

GSC 20260. American Catholic Experience

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 22612

A survey of the history of Roman Catholicism in the United States from colonial times to the present, with emphasis on the 20th-century experience. The first half of the course covers the Catholic missions and settlements in the New World, Republican-era Catholicism's experiment with democracy, and the immigrant church from 1820 to 1950. The second half of the course focuses on the preparations for, and impact of, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Assigned reading includes a packet of articles and primary sources about the liturgical renewal, Catholic action, social justice movements, and other preconciliar developments.

GSC 20262. Empire and “The Woman Question”

(3-0-3)

A review of 19th-century British women's literature, with an emphasis on the growth of women's travel writing and other ways that empire and issues of women's rights intersect.

GSC 20425. Islamic Societies of the Middle East and North Africa: Religion, History, and Culture

(3-0-3)

This course is an introductory survey of the Islamic societies of the Middle East and North Africa from their origins to the present day. It will deal with the history and expansion of Islam, both as a world religion and civilization, from its birth in the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century to its subsequent spread to other parts of Western Asia and North Africa. Issues of religious and social ethics, political governance, gender, social relations, and cultural practices will be explored in relation to a number of Muslim societies in the region, such as in Egypt, Morocco, and Iran. The course foregrounds the diversity and complexities present in a critical area of what we call the Islamic world today.

GSC 20426. Introduction to Cultural Studies

(3-0-3)

An introduction to cultural studies using a variety of media: literature, film, and music.

GSC 20427. Moral Problems

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will critically evaluate alternative solutions to a number of contemporary moral problems. We will begin with the problems of the distribution of income and wealth and our obligations to distant peoples and future generations. We will then turn to the problem of sexual equality and to a particular challenge to feminism, which maintains that men themselves suffer from a “second sexism” that benefits women. Finally, we will take up the problem of affirmative action and examine the legal and moral issues raised by affirmative action as it again makes its way to a decision before the U.S. Supreme Court.

GSC 20449. Women in the Americas

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This introductory course focuses on texts by women of color in the Americas whose writing and filmmaking calls attention to the intersections among gender, race, nation, class, and sexuality. We will read fiction, poetry, oral histories, and personal essays and view films that address situations of intercultural contact, exchange, exploitation, and transformation, as well as the legacies of conquest, colonialism, and slavery. We will look at both what these women have to say about feminisms, religion and spirituality, gender roles, globalization, leadership, cultural change, and how they say it. A number of our readings are by or about women either involved in movements for social change or caught in a historic moment of change. In this course, students will explore the traditions and innovations of each of the many genres we explore. Our reading will include work by Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz, Patricia Preciado Martin, Rosa Parks, Rigoberta Menchu, Hisaye Yamamoto, Rita Dove, Demetria Martinez, Jamaica Kincaid, and Maxine Hong Kingston. Requirements include three short papers, work on a collaborative group project, participation in class discussion and debate, and one exam.

GSC 20466. Marriage and the Family

(3-0-3) Sobolewski

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Changing family patterns, sex roles, sexuality, premarital relationships, marriage and divorce, parenthood, childhood, and family interaction are some of the topics. Singles, dual-career families, alternative marriage forms, and the future of marriage and family are also taken up.

GSC 20500. Work and Desire in the Victorian Novel

(3-0-3) Cameron

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will look at different representations of work and desire in a wide range of Victorian novels. Gender and sexuality studies will play a central role in our discussions of these novels and their representations of work and desire. We will, for example, consider the interconnections among constructions of masculinity and working men's collectives. And we will ask how heterosexuality and models of femininity inform representations of the division of labor and gendered separate spheres. Readings include novels by Elizabeth Gaskell (North and South), George Eliot (Felix Holt the Radical), William Morris (News From Nowhere), Oscar Wilde (The Picture of Dorian Gray), Isabella Ford (On The Threshold) and H.G. Wells (Ann Veronica). Course requirements include 2 papers (one 6- to 8-page paper and one 10- to 12-page research paper) and four short (2-page) response papers.

GSC 20501. Mary in the Catholic Tradition

(2.5-0-3) Roy

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A study of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, as her figure and role in the history of salvation emerge in scripture and the tradition of the Church. An examination of the Church's understanding of Mary as expressed in sacred and historical text, theological reflection, liturgical expression, iconographic representation, magisterial pronouncement, and the life of devotion. The course will also consider the relationship of Mariology to other branches of theology, such as protology, Christology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology, as well as the impact of the cultus of the Virgin Mary on Western art, music, and literature.

GSC 20502. Fr. Bernard to Bernadette

(2.5-0-3) Astell

Corequisite: GSC 27999

On Feb. 11, 2008, the Church observed the 150th anniversary of the apparition of our Lady in Lourdes, France. To Saint Bernadette, the "beautiful lady" declared, "I am the Immaculate Conception," thus confirming the dogma promulgated shortly before by Pope Pius IX in 1854. This Marian dogma deserves serious study from multiple perspectives: its historical development as a contested belief, its relation to other dogmas (Original Sin, the Virgin Birth, Redemption, the Assumption), its liturgical expressions, its crucial link to the understanding of Christian marriage as a sacrament, its representations in visual art and poetry, its special significance for women, and its general importance to Christian anthropology, as well as its particular connection to Lourdes. The syllabus will include readings from all these perspectives, film sessions, and a class trip to the Lourdes grotto on Notre Dame's campus.

GSC 20549. Reinventing the Fairytale

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A historical survey of popular Christian fairytales, their origins, and modern adaptations.

GSC 20550. The Literature of Sport

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Sports and athletics have held prominent roles in human societies since the beginnings of civilization. Across centuries, nation-states have used athletic competition for a variety of purposes, from paying homage to distant gods to demonstrating superiority over neighboring tribes/cultures. And the individuals, the "warriors," who excel on those "fields of battle" are venerated as heroes, champions, "gods." In this course, we'll look at a variety of literature (fiction, nonfiction, poetry, film, broadcasts of athletic events, etc.) related to sports and athletics. From depictions of wrestlers on temple walls in Ancient Egypt to Grantland Rice's New York Herald Tribune "Four Horsemen" article to podcasts of ESPN's SportsCenter, our investigation of the literature of sport will cover a range of topics—race, gender, class, globalization, and the purposes and functions of athletic competition, to name a few—including the rise of the "super star" athlete as a "god." Required work: quizzes, two essays, midterm, final examination.

GSC 20551. Women and War

(3-0-3) Cameron

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course looks at the wide range of women's literary responses to World Wars I and II. Our readings and class conversations will be structured around central themes such as women's military service, women's pacifism, women and national boundaries, women and empire, shell-shock, and nursing national wounds. Students will look at an international range of authors, including the French author Marguerite Duras; British authors Virginia Woolf, Radclyffe Hall, and Rebecca West; British Jamaican author Andrea Levy; New Zealand writer Katherine Mansfield; American authors H.D. and Edith Wharton; and Canadian author J.G. Sime and Japanese Canadian author Joy Kogawa. We will cover a range of genres, including prose, the novel, autobiography, and the short story.

GSC 20600. Sociology of Sexual Behavior

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In 1948, Alfred Kinsey conducted the first sex study in the United States and brought the discussion of sexual behavior to the forefront with the unveiling of his findings. This course is designed to be an in-depth sociological study of the sexual behavior in America through a theoretical and historical analysis. The course will concentrate on the analyzing sexual behavior in America through the findings of major sex studies, the social construction of sexuality, the social control of sex, sex and the law, and current issues dealing with sexual behavior.

GSC 20601. Globalization and Social Movements

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Globalization has impacted many dimensions of social life, and it is linked to new types of conflicts and inequality that have affected social and political movements. This course examines the ways changes in the global economic and political system affect politics within countries. We will briefly review the broader research literature on the sociology of social movements within nations as a first step in our consideration of the relationships between "globalization" and social movements. Readings will cover a range of different social movements, such as those working to protect the environment, advocating for economic justice, addressing social problems such as extreme poverty and public health, and fighting for the rights of women and working people.

GSC 20602. Pirates, Planters, and Peasants: Caribbean Experiences in the Past

(2.5-0-3) Hauser

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The Caribbean is often depicted as a sea inhabited by pirates, filled with exotic islands, picturesque beaches, and bucolic landscapes. What is often overlooked is the culture and history of the people who actually lived there. Who were the pirates of the Caribbean? Why were the islands so important to European powers? And what were the effects of slavery? Focusing on Jamaica, Belize, and Barbados, this course charts the emergence of a multi-ethnic, Anglophone Caribbean through an examination of plantation colonies and the aftermath of slavery. Specifically, it will focus on cultural encounters between Native Americans, Africans, and Europeans through a combination of ethnography, gender, history, and archaeology.

GSC 27999. Gender Studies Gateway Course

(0-0-0)

This course is used as a corequisite for administrative purposes so that students in the gender studies program will be able to Web-register for other GSC courses.

GSC 30113. Gender and American Catholicism

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is a survey of the history of American Catholic women from the colonial period to the present. Through a combination of lectures, reading and discussion, we will explore the following themes and topics: the role of religious belief and practice in shaping Catholics' understanding of gender differences; the experience of women in religious communities and in family life; women's involvement in education and social reform; ethnic and racial diversity among Catholic women; devotional life; the development of feminist theology; and the emergence of the "new feminism" as articulated by Pope John Paul II. We will seek to understand how Catholic women, both lay and religious, contributed to the development of Church and nation, and examine how encounters with the broader American society have shaped Catholic women's relationship to the institutional church over the last three centuries.

GSC 30118. Nineteenth-Century European Painting

(3-0-3)

This survey of 19th-century painting treats the major figures of the period within the context of the social, political, and intellectual ferment that shaped the culture—primarily, the numerous political revolutions and the rise of industrial capitalism and the middle class in France, England, and Germany. Among the artistic movements discussed are neoclassicism, romanticism, realism, pre-Raphaelitism, impressionism, and symbolism. Some of the major themes addressed are the relationships between tradition and innovation, between the artist and public, and between gender and representation, as well as the multiple meanings of “modern” and “modernism.” The class will visit the Smithe Museum of Art on occasion to discuss special exhibitions related to topics in the course.

GSC 30183. Men, Women, and Work in American History

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Why do Wal-Mart's current advertising campaigns idealize the “stay-at-home mom”? Conversely, why does Congress require that mothers on welfare be sent out to work? This course will introduce students to a broad view of American social history that foregrounds the gendered aspects of work and asks students to examine the meaning of work in American history from the colonial period to the 21st century. This broad historical perspective is especially crucial to the examination of the construction of current beliefs about work in the United States since changing gender ideologies dictated the work experiences of large race- and class-defined segments of the population. On one level, this approach allows for the recovery of women and girls' contributions to the formal and informal economies, including their work activities within the household. Male work practices will be similarly illuminated through a gender studies approach. Hence, an overarching purpose of the course will be to explore the fluidity and instability of those conceptions of work that were applied alternately to masculine as opposed to feminine occupations, just as they were alternately applied to white versus non-white, free versus enslaved, and public versus domestic activities.

GSC 30201. The Anthropology of Gender

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the main issues and debates characterizing the anthropology of gender and explores how anthropologists have attempted to understand changing roles, sexual asymmetry, and stratification.

GSC 30222. Anthropology of Human Sexuality

(3-0-3) Fuentes

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Sexuality is a complex and multifaceted suite of biological and cultural/behavioral components. It is an important part of the human existence, especially in modern day North American society. This course seeks to examine human sexuality in an anthropological context. We will review sexuality in an evolutionary perspective via a comparison of nonhuman primate sexual behavior and the theoretical constructs surrounding adaptive explanations for human sexuality. The physiology of sex and the development of the reproductive tract will also be covered. The remainder of the course will consist of the evaluation of data sets regarding aspects of human sexual practice, sexual preference, mate choice, gendered sexuality, and related issues of human sexuality.

GSC 30224. Today's Gender Roles

(3-0-3) Aldous

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Current changes in male and female roles and the reasons for these changes are examined. Existing gender differences, various explanations for them, and proposals for change are discussed and evaluated.

GSC 30227. Feminist Political Thought

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: POLS 32668

This course will examine different ideas, approaches, and issues within feminist political thought. The first part of the course will compare different theoretical perspectives, from liberalism to Marxism, that have been employed by contemporary feminists. The course will pay particular attention to the meanings ascribed to “woman” and her roles in society. The second part of the course will examine how women have been represented throughout Western political thought, and the values ascribed to them by political theorists. Finally, in the last part of the course, we will turn to an examination of several contemporary political issues particularly relevant to feminist thought.

GSC 30228. Women in Social Theory

(3-0-3)

This learning community pedagogy course is designed to look at the offerings women have made—though marginalized—in the related fields of social theory, philosophy, and theology. Each theorist is very different, reinforcing the point that I made above—that there is no essentialized “women's” view of the social world. Each has come from a different culture and historic context. We will be reading the work of Harriet Martineau (1802–76), Hannah Arendt, (1906–75), Simone Weil (1909–43), Simone de Beauvoir, (1908–86), and Gillian Rose (1947–95), among others. In a quick observation of the lives of these women, one is to find an interesting correspondence between them. Many of these women were not only social thinkers, but also activists. A philosophy of praxis (or action) is what binds sociology to itself: “the philosophy of praxis,” Gramsci once proclaimed, “is precisely the concrete historicization of philosophy and its identification with history.” Given that living the vocation of a sociologist is not only developing theoretical expertise, but it is also tied to giving voice, advocacy, and concern about and work in the world as it is given, I have required a social service component part of the classroom experience. I require you to invest at least 10 working hours (with at least three visitations) at a local volunteer organization. I would like you to reflect upon your experiences in light of the readings, taking ethnographic notes in a journal of the experience. We will be sharing these experiences with the rest of the class. I will then ask you to write some reflections on doing ethnography while reading these theorists. One must always blend theory with praxis. Remember as Marx said in the theses against Feuerbach: “The task of philosophy is not to interpret the world but to change it!”

GSC 30255. Men and Women in Modern Japanese Literature

(3-0-3) Shamoon

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In 20th-century Japan, as old roles such as samurai and geisha waned, both men and women had to redefine the characteristics and meaning of masculinity and femininity. This course will look at constructions of gender in modern Japanese literature by both female and male authors. As we discuss both normative and deviant depictions of male and female roles, some topics we will address include men and women at work and at war, marriage and family life, homosociality, and homosexuality. Students will also gain familiarity with some of the major authors, genres, and literary movements of modern Japanese literature.

GSC 30269. Labor Economics (Men and Women in Labor)

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A survey course covering the economics of employment and unemployment; wages and income distribution; poverty, education, and discrimination; unions and labor and industrial relations systems; and comparative labor systems.

GSC 30270. Sex and Gender in Greco-Roman Antiquity

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines the differing roles and stereotypes, forms of behavior, and values associated with women and men in Greco-Roman antiquity. Special attention is given to the preoccupations of the Greeks and Romans with the categories of “female” and “male” and to the dynamics of relations and relationships between women and men. The course both deepens knowledge of Greco-Roman society and provides an informed background for contemporary gender debates.

GSC 30278. British Art

(3-0-3)

This course is a general survey of the development of British painting from 1560 to 1900. In this context, the relationship between English 17th-century and early 18th-century and American colonial painting are considered, alongside a discussion of uniquely British traditions.

GSC 30289. Jacksonian United States: Politics/Sociology/Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course explores the early 19th-century history of the United States, from the close of the War of 1812 to the coming of the Civil War (1815–50). Although the era and course take their name from President Andrew Jackson, we will cover much more than national politics and affairs of state. We will explore the birth of mass political parties, conflicts between nationalism and sectionalism, early industrialization and the rise of class conflict, the development of slavery and antislavery, changing gender roles and the rise of feminism, evangelical religion and reform, and Native American resistance and removal. The course will emphasize active participation by students through regular discussion and frequent writing assignments.

GSC 30293. U.S. Labor History

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the history of paid and unpaid labor in the United States from colonial times to the near present. We will seek to understand how working people both shaped—and were shaped by—the American Revolution, the debates over slavery and free labor culminating in the Civil War and Reconstruction, the rise of big business, the creation of a national welfare state, the Cold War-era repression of the left, and continuing debates over the meanings of work, citizenship, and democracy. Throughout the course, we will devote considerable time to the organizations workers created to advance their own interests, namely the labor movement. We will also pay special attention to the complicated yet crucial connections between work and racial and gender identities. Specific topics may include slavery, farm labor, women’s domestic work, trade unions, questions of industrial democracy, the role of radicalism, and the challenges confronting workers in the current era of corporate globalization and anti-sweatshop activism.

GSC 30305. Colonial America

(3-0-3)

This course considers the history of New World exploration and settlement by Europeans from the 15th century to the 18th century. It examines the process of colonization in a wide variety of cultural and geographic settings. It explores the perspectives of Indians, Europeans, and slaves with a particular emphasis on the consequences of interracial contacts. We will discuss the goals and perceptions of different groups and individuals as keys to understanding the violent conflict that became a central part of the American experience. Lectures, class discussions, readings, and films will address gender, racial, class, and geographic variables in the peopling (and de-peopling) of English North America.

GSC 30306. Morality and Social Change in U.S. History

(3-0-3)

How do we explain sweeping moral changes in society? Why did so many people support legal slavery for so long, and what motivated others to turn against it? What is the relationship between social change and moral theory? The purpose of this class is to examine the moral frameworks that Americans have used to understand—and to change—their society. We will focus on hotly debated issues in American history, looking at the way that Americans thought about issues such as slavery, animal cruelty, sex, family roles, labor, economics, war, and citizenship and civil rights. We will look at both sides of debates to understand the values and beliefs that shaped traditions of social change and resistance to that change.

GSC 30307. Sport in American History

(3-0-3)

Sport, a major part of American entertainment and culture today, has roots that extend back to the colonial period. This course will provide an introduction to the development of American sport, from the horseracing and games of chance in the colonial period through to the rise of contemporary sport as a highly commercialized entertainment spectacle. Using a variety of primary and secondary sources, we will explore the ways that American sport has influenced and been influenced by economics, politics, popular culture, and society, including issues of race, gender and class. Given Notre Dame’s tradition in athletics, we will explore the university’s involvement in this historical process.

GSC 30308. The Holocaust

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32408

In this lecture/discussion class, we will study the Nazi German program of mass killings that has come to be known as the Holocaust. We will explore the ideas, decisions, and actions that culminated in the murder of an estimated hundred thousand people deemed handicapped, half a million Roma (Gypsies), and six million European Jews. The role of historical prejudices, the impact of National Socialist ideology and leadership, and the crucial factor of the war itself will all be considered. We will address the experiences of those targeted for annihilation, as well as the actions of perpetrators and the role of others: bystanders, witnesses, and rescuers. At the same time we will examine how attacks on other groups—for example, homosexuals, Polish intellectuals, Soviet prisoners of war, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and Afro-Germans—fit into the overall Nazi scheme for a “new world order.” The legacy of the Holocaust after 1945 will be discussed, as well. Course requirements include short papers in response to weekly readings, a comparative book review, and a cumulative final exam.

GSC 30309. Labor and America Since 1945

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course explores the relationship between workers and the labor movement to American politics and culture since 1945. The United States emerged from World War II as the strongest global power, and its citizens subsequently enjoyed a long postwar economic boom that created what we might call the first truly middle-class society in world history. At the heart of that new society was the American labor movement, those unions like the United Auto Workers and the United Steel Workers who ensured that at least some of the postwar profits made it into the wallets of workers and their families. Today, however, unions represent only 8 percent of workers in the private sector. What accounts for the decline of organized labor since the 1950s? What has the decline of the labor movement meant for workers specifically, and the American economy and politics more broadly? How and why have popular perceptions of unions changed over time? What has been the relationship of organized labor to the civil rights movement, feminism, and modern conservatism? What is “globalization,” and what has been its impact upon American workers and their unions? Through an exploration of historical scholarship, memoirs, polemical writings, and Hollywood films, this course will try to answer these questions. Students interested in politics, economic development, international relations, social justice, human rights, peace studies, or mass culture are particularly welcome.

GSC 30425. Love, Death, and Exile in Arabic Literature

(3-0-3) Guo

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course explores the literary and artistic presentation of the themes of love, death, and exile in medieval and modern Arabic literature and popular culture. Through close readings of Arabic poetry, essays, short stories, and novels (with English subtitles), we discuss the following issues: topics and genres of love and poetry; gender, eroticism, and sexuality in literary discourse; and the traditional motif of al-hanin Ilal al-watan (“yearning for the homeland”) in modern poetry and fiction.

GSC 30426. Japan's Imperial House

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Japan boasts the longest, unbroken imperial line extant today, but what does this continuity really mean? This course looks at Japan's emperors and empresses from antiquity to the present, raising questions about the nature of power, the idea of good government, gender, divinity, war responsibility, and the liberty of the family now called upon to symbolize a purportedly democratic nation. Although most of the course will focus on modern emperors, it begins with Japan's earliest political structures in order to ask such questions as: Was the Imperial House an indigenous idea, or was it an imitation of Chinese ideas of power? Why were there so many powerful women leaders in ancient Japan, and why did Japan stop having empresses on the throne? What is the relationship between the imperial house and the various religions of Japan? The course will then consider the medieval and Tokugawa periods asking why powerful samurai failed to overthrow the militarily impotent emperors. Finally, the course will turn to the modern period, beginning in the middle of the 19th century with the elevation of the Meiji Emperor to unprecedented prominence. Why was the ancient imperial house used to modernize Japan? Even though sex of emperors has been male for centuries, why were ancient emperors female and why is the imperial gender (and Japan as a whole) in the modern period often regarded as female? Was Hirohito guilty of fomenting war? What is the function of the Imperial House today? This course sweeps through myth and 1,500 years of Japanese history, tracing the permutations, continuities, and discontinuities of the imperial line.

GSC 30427. The Japanese Empire and Literature

(3-0-3)

Japan emerged on the global stage as an imperialist power with the defeat of China in 1895 (over Korea) and the defeat of Russia in 1905 (again, over Korea). By the end of the First World War, the "Japanese Empire" included Taiwan, Korea, the south Pacific islands called Nan-yo, and the southern half of Sakhalin, not to mention the late-19th-century acquisitions of Okinawa and Hokkaido. Hardly a static referent from 1895 until its dismantling upon defeat in 1945, the "Japanese Empire" must have meant something terribly different, depending on whether you were a Japanese national or colonial subject; a man or a woman; in the military or a man of letters; a domestic worker or colonial settler; businessman or maid. Even within the Japanese archipelago—indeed, even at the height of government censorship on cultural production in the early to mid '40s—the meaning of the "Japanese Empire" was a site of cultural contestation. This class looks at the literary and artistic production—fiction, memoirs, poetry, film, visual arts, and drama—of the 50-year rise and fall of the Japanese Empire. A current of this class deals with the inter-Asian, Bolshevik-inspired organizations that looked to Japanese radicals, with no little irony, for solidarity in the fight against Japanese imperialism.

GSC 30430. Islam and Modernity

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Islam and its compatibility with modernity is a much-debated issue in the contemporary period. The course will engage this timely topic and discuss the most important "hot-button" issues involved in these debates: political Islam, democracy, pluralism, rights of women, and secularism. The historical contexts that provide the backdrop for the range of responses to the phenomenon of modernity and its attendant issues will also receive attention. What internal resources exist within Islamic thought that are being drawn upon by modernists to make a strong case for an essential compatibility between Islam and democracy, for example? Is democracy (or Islam, for that matter) a monolithic concept? Students will be expected to actively take part in discussions centered around such questions, the assigned readings, and class lectures. Prior exposure to at least one class on Islam or the Middle East is strongly recommended.

GSC 30448. Sex, Freedom, and Economy in Contemporary China

Today China is undergoing a revolution (a word used so frequently as to be meaningless, but very meaningful in this case as we will learn) in society, politics, economy, and thought perhaps as significant as that which brought the Chinese Communist Party to national power in 1949. The objective of this course, constructed through film and new media investigation, along with readings on social status, identity, sexuality, work, home, youth culture, gender, business, education, sports, ecology, is to come to an understanding of the multiple domestic forces that have made China a global power. Furthermore, the course will familiarize the student with the very complex ramifications of the passionate national quest for international recognition as it affects every aspect of present-day life while exploring the mercurial manner in which the economic transformation of China has been represented in the media. In this last respect, it represents an experiment in cultural studies in that its avowed subject, contemporary China, is studied in dialogue with the United States—the two nations most exemplifying the promise and terror of modernization. No knowledge of Chinese or previous knowledge of China is required.

GSC 30449. Chinese Ways of Thought

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This lecture and discussion course on the religion, philosophy, and intellectual history of China that introduces the student to the world view and life experience of Chinese as they have been drawn from local traditions, as well as worship and sacrifice to heroes, and the cult of the dead. Through a close reading of primary texts in translation, it also surveys China's grand philosophical legacy of Daoism, Buddhism, "Confucianism" and "Neo-Confucianism," and the later religious accommodation of Christianity and Islam.

GSC 30464. Race, Ethnicity, and American Politics

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course introduces students to the dynamics of the social and historical construction of race and ethnicity in American political life. The course explores the following core questions: What are race and ethnicity? What are the best ways to think about the impact of race and ethnicity on American citizens? What is the history of racial and ethnic formation in American political life? How do race and ethnicity link up with other identities animating political actions like gender and class? What role do American political institutions—the Congress, presidency, judiciary, state and local governments, etc.—play in constructing and maintaining these identity categories? Can these institutions ever be used to overcome the points of division in American society?

GSC 30469. Fundamentals of Human Evolution

(3-0-3)

This course deals with human evolution in both biological and cultural terms. Topics covered will include primate behavior, the mechanisms of evolution, the fossil record, and the characteristics of prehistoric cultures.

GSC 30500. Renaissance Woman

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It considers the image of women in the writings of male authors as well as the work of female authors.

GSC 30501. Hemingway and Walker

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A comparative study of the fiction of Ernest Hemingway and Alice Walker, with particular emphasis on gender, class, and historical issues explored in each author's works.

GSC 30502. American Film

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

How the themes of "love" and "desire" are explored in selected American novels, and movie adaptations of those novels, written in the 20th century.

GSC 30503. Knighthood and Chivalry in Medieval Europe 750–1625

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course introduces students to the history of knighthood (the status of noble heavy cavalryman) and chivalry (the distinctive ethos and code of the knightly class) from their emergence in Western Europe between 950 and 1180 through their apogee between 1180 and 1380 to their slow decline between 1380 and 1625 (and their revival in the 19th century). It will deal first with the knight as warrior, vassal, and monk (in the religious orders of knighthood), then with the knight as nobleman and landowner, and finally with the knight as courtier and civil servant in the emerging state. It will next proceed to an examination of knightly games, festivals, and iconography, and conclude with a look at the survival and revival of chivalry in the post-Gothic period.

GSC 30504. Crime, Heredity, and Insanity in American History (2.5-0-3)

The 19th century witnessed a transformation in the understanding of the origins of criminal behavior in the United States. For many, a religious emphasis on humankind as sinful gave way to a belief in its inherent goodness. But if humans were naturally good, how could their evil actions be explained? Drawing on studies done here and abroad, American doctors, preachers, and lawyers debated whether environment, heredity, or free will determined the actions of the criminal. By the early 20th century, lawyers and doctors had largely succeeded in medicalizing criminality. Psychiatrists treated criminals as patients; judges invoked hereditary eugenics in sentencing criminals. Science, not sin, had apparently become the preferred mode of explanation for the origins of crime. But was this a better explanation than what had come before? Discussion is the primary form of instruction.

GSC 30505. Mary Through the Ages

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A study of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, as her figure and role in the history of salvation emerge in Scripture and the Tradition of the Church. An examination of the Church's understanding of Mary as expressed in sacred and historical text, theological reflection, liturgical expression, iconographic representation, magisterial pronouncement, and the life of devotion. The course will also consider the relationship of Mariology to other branches of theology, such as protology, Christology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology, as well as the impact of the cultus of the Virgin Mary on Western art, music, and literature.

GSC 30506. Theology of Marriage

(2.5-0-3) Odozor

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course seeks to introduce participants to the principal elements in the Catholic tradition on marriage by examining the sources of this tradition in sacred scripture, the work of ancient Christian writers, the official teachings of the Church, and recent theological reflection. The method employed in the course is thus historical, scriptural, and thematic. The readings selected for this course are intended to expose students to contemporary discussion in moral theology apropos of these issues, and provide them with the necessary theological tools to critically evaluate a wide variety of ethical positions dealing with marriage in the Catholic tradition.

GSC 30507. Love and the Christian Tradition

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This intermediate theology course explores the rich and diverse history of love in the Christian tradition. It begins with an examination of the biblical terms for love and traces their theological development through the varied writings of Augustine, Julian of Norwich, Abelard and Heloise, Aquinas, Luther, Edwards, Kierkegaard, Reinhold Niebuhr, Martin Luther King Jr., and others up to the present. Through the lens of love, we will carefully attend to specific, pivotal moments that mark Christianity's historical and contemporary engagements with its own resources, external intellectual currents, and an array of moral, social, and cultural demands. The course generally follows the outline sketched by Bernard Brady's Christian Love, and further primary readings will augment Brady's text.

GSC 30508. Survey of French Literature II

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Reading of selections and complete works of outstanding French authors from major genres and periods. All majors are required to take this sequence, or equivalent advanced courses. Students are expected to have already taken 30310 or to take ROFR 30310 concurrently with the first survey taken.

GSC 30509. Everybody's Shakespeare

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A close analysis of Shakespeare's plays (including tragedies, comedies, and romances), as well as a number of contemporary "re-visions" of those works by authors of varying cultural, ethnic, or gender backgrounds.

GSC 30511. Modern British and Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The 20th century arrived to a world altered by industry and the metropolis, by scientific theory and psychoanalysis, by mechanical transportation and communication devices. Such a climate challenged traditional values, social mores, class distinctions, gender roles, and conceptions of nation, propriety and home. The literature from the first half of the century suggests that the increasingly alienating world forces interpersonal connection to take place under new circumstances, often outside of the traditional settings regulated by marital, social and religious convention. Through close reading, students in this course will examine how the literature presents colonialism, the Great War, the deterioration of aristocratic class values and privilege in both Britain and Ireland, the destruction of the metropolis and the home during the London air raids of World War II, and the shift in personal values vis-à-vis alcohol consumption and marital infidelity. The course will look at these modernist works in light not only of the alienating circumstances they represent, but also of the effect that alienation has on the interpersonal connections between individuals.

GSC 30512. Stein, Weil, Arendt

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Like Sylvie Courtine-Denany's Three Women in Dark Times: Edith Stein, Simone Weil, and Hannah Arendt (Cornell UP, 2000), this course groups together three extraordinary Jewish women philosophers of the World War II period. All three studied under noted male philosophers—Husserl, Alain, and Heidegger, respectively—and they developed their original insights on empathy (Stein), decreation and affliction (Weil), and "natality" (Arendt) partly as a response to their teachers. Their intellectual quests in the shadow of the Holocaust led them to take up theological questions, studying St. Thomas Aquinas and Dionysius the Areopagite (Stein), St. Augustine (Arendt), and Pascal (Weil). The answers they gave to God and others testify to the heroism and brilliance of their spiritual searches for truth.

GSC 30513. History of TV

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 31513

This course analyzes the history of television, spanning from its roots in radio broadcasting to the latest developments in digital television. In assessing the many changes across this span, the course will cover such topics as why the American television industry developed as a commercial medium in contrast to most other national television industries; how television programming has both reflected and influenced cultural ideologies through the decades; and how historical patterns of television consumption have shifted due to new technologies and social changes. Through studying the historical development of television programs and assessing the industrial, technological, and cultural systems out of which they emerged, the course will piece together the catalysts responsible for shaping this highly influential medium.

GSC 30514. Women's Voices in French Prose from the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines the gendered notions of “voice” and “silence” in the narrative prose of French and Francophone women authors of the 20th to 21st centuries. Works by Anna de Noailles, Gerard d’Houville (Marie de Regnier), Colette, Simone de Beauvoir, Anne Herbert, Marguerite Duras, Nicole Brossard, Sylvie Germain, Amelie Nothomb, and essays in French feminist criticism.

GSC 30515. Men, Women, and Work

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Why do Wal-Mart’s current advertising campaigns idealize the “stay-at-home mom”? Conversely, why does Congress require that mothers on welfare be sent out to work? This course will introduce students to a broad view of American social history that foregrounds the gendered aspects of work and asks students to examine the meaning of work in American history from the colonial period to the 21st century. This broad historical perspective is especially crucial to the examination of the construction of current beliefs about work in the United States since changing gender ideologies dictated the work experiences of large race- and class-defined segments of the population. On one level, this approach allows for the recovery of women and girls’ contributions to the formal and informal economies, including their work activities within the household. Male work practices will be similarly illuminated through a gender studies approach. Hence, an overarching purpose of the course will be to explore the fluidity and instability of those conceptions of work that were applied alternately to masculine as opposed to feminine occupations, just as they were alternately applied to white versus non-white, free versus enslaved, and public versus domestic activities.

GSC 30516. Gender and Science

(2.5-0-3) Kourany

Corequisite: GSC 27999

An exploration of the ways in which science is gendered, starting with the ways in which women have been excluded from science, and moving through such issues as the invisibility and shabby treatment of women with the products of scientific research, the contributions of women to science and whether these are different in kind from the contributions of men, and the differential effects of science on men’s and women’s lives.

GSC 30517. Garden to Ecosystem: Nature Poetry, 1650–2008

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A study of the changing role of the natural world in the poetic imagination of English and American writers from Andrew Marvell and James Thomson to Denise Levertov and Gary Snyder. Other writers to be studied may include Charlotte Smith, William Wordsworth, John Clare, Emily Dickinson, G.M. Hopkins, Thomas Hardy, Robert Frost, Robinson Jeffers, Ted Hughes, Maxine Kumin, Seamus Heaney, Mary Oliver, and Pattiann Rogers. Attention to the history of the idea of nature and ecological awareness as well as to poetic representation and expression.

GSC 30518. History of Consumerism in the Modern United States, 1880 to the Present

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will explore the creation of contemporary consumer culture in the United States. Beginning in the late 1880s, the nature of buying, selling, and consuming was fundamentally transformed in the United States. After a brief examination of the broader history of consumption, this course will explore the changes in production, marketing, retailing, and consumption from the Gilded Age to the present. Next it will trace the ways in which those changes have influenced broader cultural, institutional, and political developments throughout the 20th century. A particular emphasis will be placed on the ways in which patterns of consumption helped define and redefine categories of race, class, and gender.

GSC 30519. Fairy Tale Metamorphoses: Damsels in Shining Armor and Knights in Distress?

(2.5-0-3) Weeks

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Whether or not they involve actual fairies, “fairy tales” always explore the boundaries of human experience—emotionally and physically. Children are abandoned in the woods; women are trapped behind glass or walled up in towers; men sent on impossible quests; yet the protagonists always find some way of adapting and overcoming the most impossible odds. This astonishing resilience of spirit is accompanied by a shocking mutability of form: men become beasts, and sometimes beasts become men; women put on armor and march off to battle; mermaids walk on land; and, occasionally, Little Red Riding Hood turns out to be a werewolf. In this course, we will be looking at contemporary films, novels, short stories, and at least one graphic novel, all of which will inspire us to ask complex questions about social norms, gender roles, and the mutability of the human body. What is life like for an ugly princess? The reading list is quite extensive because we will be taking a survey-view of contemporary fairy tale writing, but many of the pieces that we will be looking at are quite short. Authors under consideration will include Patricia C. Wrede, Tanith Lee, Holly Black, Neil Gaiman, Bruce Coville, Patricia McKillip, Jay Williams, and Robin McKinley.

GSC 30520. Questions of Homosexuality in Film and Literature

(3-0-3) Jerez-Farran

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will introduce students to many of the critical perspectives and theories that enliven contemporary literary and cultural studies on gay and lesbian film and literature. Throughout the semester, we will examine a collection of films and literary texts by self-identified gay and lesbian writers and/or by authors who deal with gay and lesbian themes and characters, irrespective of their sexual identity. Through the analysis of the selected texts we will also examine the history, politics, and theoretical arguments both current and historical that deal with homosexuality to see how this human phenomenon and its cultural expression has affected and been affected by heterosexual culture and the conflicts that have arisen between them. We will also explore how sexual and gender norms are constructed historically and culturally; how sexual and gender norms affect gay, lesbian, and heterosexual people’s development and self-perception; how new definitions and theories of human sexuality generated by gay and lesbian individuals and communities present alternatives to dominant heterosexist traditions. One of the main objectives of this interdisciplinary course is to open intellectual dialogue, to broaden students’ awareness of the human experience at the same time we acquaint ourselves with some of the most intellectually interesting works that have stemmed from gay inspiration. Films to be studied will include a selection from the following list: Beautiful Thing (Hettie Macdonald); Boys don’t Cry (Kimberly Peirce); Brokeback Mountain (Ang Lee); Love’s the Devil (John Maybury); Saving Face (Alice Wu); Stage Beauty (Richard Eyre); All About My Mother (Pedro Almodóvar); Another Gay Movie (Todd Stephens); Nico and Dani (Francesc Gay), and The Celluloid Closet. (Rob Epstein) Literary texts will include most of the following: Walt Whitman’s Calamus poems, Virginia Woolf’s Orlando, and others.

GSC 30540. The U.S. Civil War Era, 1848–1877

(2.5-0-3)

Through intensive reading and writing, students will explore the social and cultural history of America’s most costly war. We will focus on various topics as they relate to the war: antebellum origins, religion, gender, Lincoln’s reasons for waging war, dead bodies, freedmen’s families, black soldiers, and the uses of war memory. This will not be a guns-and-generals-smell-the-smoke course, though knowledge of military matters can be helpful. We will ask and try to answer who really “won” and “lost” the war.

GSC 30549. Heroism and Eroticism in Chinese Fiction

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will read works in Chinese fiction from the late imperial periods. We will discuss the aesthetic features of such works and their cultural underpinnings, especially the infusion of Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist meanings. Particularly, we will focus on heroism and eroticism as two major themes in Chinese fiction and their specific expressions in each work. We will consider the transition from heroism to eroticism as a shift of narrative paradigm, which coincided with a general trend of “domestication” in traditional Chinese fiction. Through the readings and discussions, the students are expected to become familiar with pre-modern Chinese narrative tradition and acquainted with some aspects of Chinese culture. All the readings are in English translation, and no prior knowledge of China or the Chinese language is required.

GSC 30550. The Holocaust

Corequisite: GSC 27999; HIST 32408

In this lecture/discussion class, we will study the Nazi German program of mass killings that has come to be known as the Holocaust. We will explore the ideas, decisions, and actions that culminated in the murder of an estimated hundred thousand people deemed handicapped, half a million Roma (Gypsies), and six million European Jews. The role of historical prejudices, the impact of National Socialist ideology and leadership, and the crucial factor of the war itself will all be considered. We will address the experiences of those targeted for annihilation as well as the actions of perpetrators and the role of others: bystanders, witnesses, and rescuers. At the same time we will examine how attacks on other groups—for example, homosexuals, Polish intellectuals, Soviet prisoners of war, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and Afro-Germans—fit into the overall Nazi scheme for a “new world order.” The legacy of the Holocaust after 1945 will be discussed as well. Course requirements include short papers in response to weekly readings, a comparative book review, and a cumulative final exam.

GSC 30551. Prophets and Protesters in African History

(2.5-0-3)

This dialogue-intensive seminar focuses on men and women who led political, religious, and social movements in Africa in the 19th and 20th centuries. The Islamic Murride brotherhood in Senegal, the Women’s Wars of Nigeria, and the Mau Mau uprising in colonial Kenya will introduce students to important episodes in African history and to the intellectual debates of the field. Students are expected to read a variety of texts, participate vigorously in class discussion, make oral presentations, and complete written assignments.

GSC 30552. Caribbean Women Writers

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A sampling of novels written by Caribbean writers, with a particular emphasis on such themes as colonization, madness, childhood, and memory.

GSC 30553. The Victorian National Romance

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

By examining texts from the different nations within the British Isles—Scotland, Ireland, and England—we will explore the complex question of how national boundaries are drawn; how a sense of membership in a nation is created; and what that might have to do with falling in love, getting married, and staying married.

GSC 30554. Colonial Latin America

When Columbus stepped ashore in the Caribbean in 1492, he set in motion a process that led to the creation of wealthy Spanish and Portuguese empires in the Americas, the genocide of countless numbers of indigenous men and women, the enslavement of millions of African men and women, and the eventual formation of a variety of independent states competing in the world economy. In this semester-long survey, we will examine topics in this history that will allow us to consider how history is produced as well as what happened in the past, from various perspectives, from elite colonial administrators and merchants to indigenous peasants and formerly enslaved men and women. Most weeks’ assigned readings include primary texts—sources written by participants in these events—and written assignments and discussion sections will concentrate on the use of these sources.

GSC 30555. Chronicles of the Conquest of Latin America

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This seminar examines key aspects of the conquest of Latin America through readings of chronicles and other texts written by Spaniards and Amerindians in the 15th–17th centuries. We will focus upon the ways in which Spaniards and Amerindians theorized and explained their experiences, and their representations of themselves and their “others.” In particular, we will pay attention to the beginnings of modern notions of race and ethnicity through discussions of barbarians, wildmen, and cannibals, among other “types” important to the colonial encounter. Students will help lead class discussions and will write a series of essays that critically engage with the historical texts.

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Through intensive reading and writing, students will explore the social and cultural history of America’s most costly war. We will focus on various topics as they relate to the war: antebellum origins, religion, gender, Lincoln’s reasons for waging war, dead bodies, freedmen’s families, black soldiers, and the uses of war memory. This will not be a guns-and-generals-smell-the-smoke course, though knowledge of military matters can be helpful. We will ask and try to answer who really “won” and “lost” the war.

GSC 30557. What’s Love Got To Do With It? Marriage and Family in American History From Revolution to Present

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

From the heated trenches of America’s “culture wars,” few things are as polarizing as marriage and the family. At the extremes, some hearken back to less troubled days when one man and one woman made enduring commitments to each other; others imagine a narrative of progress with women throwing off the shackles of patriarchy, as both men and women forged new kinds of relationships informed by individual needs. Through intensive reading and writing, students will grapple with these conflicting narratives of decline and triumph. We will explore Native-American families, polygamy, free-love communities, Cold War homemakers, the black family, and gay marriage. In all of these we will flesh out the ways in which defining “the family” has always been entangled with citizenship, national politics, and religious intolerance.

GSC 30558. African American Women’s History

(4.5-0-3)

This course will trace the cultural, economic, and political history of African American women in the United States from slavery to the present. Through a combination of books, primary sources, and film, we will explore how African American women have addressed what is often referred to as the “double burden” of sexism and racism while seeking to define their own identities as individuals, wives, mothers, workers, and citizens. Major themes will include labor, family social movements, and civil rights.

GSC 30559. Women and Work in Early America

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

What did shopping, tavern keeping, and midwifery have in common in early America? They could all be considered legitimate forms of “women’s work.” This course introduces students to early American social history (from colonial settlement to 1820) by considering the dynamic relationship of women and work. We will consider the ways that girls and women helped make the world of pre-industrial America through their contributions both inside and outside of the home. The course will consider different forms of labor: skilled and unskilled, free and enslaved, and paid and unpaid. It will also pay special attention to the ways that women of European, African, and Indian descent wove their own cultural beliefs and social practices into the broader laboring regimes of early America. Throughout, we will explore the changing meanings of “women’s work” and “men’s work” and assess how these definitions helped to shape boundaries of race and class. We will cover a range of sites from New England to Charleston, Louisiana to Jamaica, and analyze topics such as the gendering of agricultural work; African women’s market activities in the New World; women and politics in Washington; and shopping as skilled work.

GSC 30560. American Catholic Experience

Corequisite: GSC 27999; HIST 32615

This course is a survey of the history of Roman Catholicism in the United States from colonial times to the present. We will consider, among others, the following topics: immigrant and ethnic Catholicism, women in the Church, Catholic social reform, devotional and parish life, and the relationship between Catholicism and American democracy.

GSC 30561. U.S. Labor History

Corequisite: GSC 27999; HIST 32618

The labor questions: “Who does the work? Who reaps the rewards? And who makes the decisions?” are central to any society, and this course explores how those questions have been answered throughout the history of the United States of America. This class will introduce you to the major themes, events, organizations, individuals, and scholarly controversies in American labor history, from 1776 to the present. We will study the diversity of the working-class experience in the United States by exploring the past from multiple perspectives, and we will analyze competing interpretations put forth by labor historians over the past half-century. The workers, workplaces, communities, institutions, and issues will range widely over the semester, but we will investigate some core themes for the duration: issues of power, structure, and agency, from the workplace to Washington, D.C.; workers’ wide-ranging efforts to forge organizations, namely labor unions, to represent their collective interests; intersections between class, race, and gender at work, at home, at play, and in politics; and tensions between capitalism, industrialization, and democracy in U.S. history.

GSC 30562. Sport in American History

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Sport, a major part of American entertainment and culture today, has roots that extend back to the colonial period. This course will provide an introduction to the development of American sport, from the horseracing and games of chance in the colonial period through to the rise of contemporary sport as a highly commercialized entertainment spectacle. Using a variety of primary and secondary sources, we will explore the ways that American sport has influenced and been influenced by economics, politics, popular culture, and society, including issues of race, gender and class. Given Notre Dame’s tradition in athletics, we will explore the university’s involvement in this historical process.

GSC 30563. What’s Love Got to Do with It? Marriage and the Family in American History

(3-0-3) Gregg

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is an introduction to the study of gender and society. We will study how gender is constructed through social interaction and how it is patterned in a wide gamut of structural locations, such as the following: education, media, family, the field of medicine, and business and the economy. Major themes in this course include the social construction of gender, how people “do” gender, and patriarchy and the perpetuation of gender inequality in our society. After exploring the core characteristics of patriarchy and its power as a social system, the final project in this course will work toward solutions to gender inequality.

GSC 30564. Race and Culture in the American South to 1865

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course traces the roots of southern, antebellum culture by exploring the centrality of the relationships between sex, manliness, and slavery in the development of south from 1619 to 1865. By examining how European men viewed their own sexuality and that of European women in contrast to that of African men and women, this course seeks to examine the complex racial and gendered identities at the center of southern culture. The underlying current of the class is to understand the complexity with which racial and gendered identities defined relationships and culture in the South. Using primary and secondary sources, we will critically engage the debates about slavery, racism, gender, and class in southern culture. We will reevaluate the historiographic arguments on American racism. We will take the notion of “southern gentlemen” to task, juxtaposing their responsibility as patriarchs to the ugly underbelly of slavery, race, and sexual exploitation. Our efforts in this class will be to understand the contours of the relationships between sexual control, manliness, and racism. We will explore the daily lives of men and women who lived during the time. A variety of perspectives will constitute our sources about slavery, including those of blacks, free and enslaved, as well as planters, abolitionists, women, and yeomen.

GSC 30565. Andean History and Ethnohistory

(3-0-3) Graubart

Corequisite: GSC 27999; HIST 32929

The Andean countries—the area occupied by the Inca State at the height of its power—are modern-day Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia, as well as the northern half of Chile and the northwest of Argentina. This region is marked by geographic extremes (snow-capped mountain ranges, arid deserts, rainforests and lots of rocky terrain in between), as well as a complex and often violent political and social history. In this course, we will survey the ways that Andean peoples have adapted and contributed to the formation of their societies, from pre-Columbian civilizations, most notably the Inca, to the invasion of Europeans in the 16th century, to the modern states struggling with questions of political integration, economic development, and foreign intervention. Our readings will come, when possible, from primary sources, including archaeological artifacts and first person accounts, to allow for an ethnohistorical approach to these complex cultures.

GSC 30566. Twentieth-Century Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A survey of selected works of 20th-century Irish literature.

GSC 30567. Reading the Unwritten Story: Mother-Daughter Relationships in Twentieth-Century Irish Fiction

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

While the role of father-son relationships (and their attendant conflict) in contemporary Irish literature has been well established, the Irish mother-daughter relationship is, as Anne Fogarty notes, “an unwritten story in Ireland”—not because it really is unwritten, but because it has not been well-charted in literary studies. The dilemmas that the family poses and that daughters face are fruitful topics for exploration; Declan Kiberd notes that “for some women writers the family was a trap, for others it remained a zone of resistance.” This course will engage in a chronological reading of 20th-century Irish women writers, tracing the developing mode(s) of representation employed to depict Irish maternity and analyzing their place in the Irish literary canon; it will also explore the relationships between these images and other pertinent themes, such as political and social issues, expressions of sexuality, the role of religion in Ireland, and images of nationhood. Authors to be read include Elizabeth Bowen, Maeve Brennan, Jennifer Johnston, Molly Keane, Mary Lavin, Dorothy Macardle, Edna O’Brien, and Kate O’Brien. Course requirements include one-page response papers, two short papers, and midterm/final exams.

GSC 30568. Topics: Film and Popular Music

(2.5-2-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of prerecorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and pop biopics. We'll see films using popular music of all kinds—Tin Pan Alley, '50s rock 'n' roll, jazz, disco, French pop, and more. We'll consider the role of the star—ranging from Astaire to Travolta, Dylan to Madonna—and films by directors such as Scorsese and Welles. Looking at films from the 1930s to the present, we'll consider the narrative function and meaning of music, industrial practices, changing social values, how songs get Academy Awards, how soundtracks circulate, and how film relates to various other musical media, such as radio and MTV. Throughout, we will pay special attention to how pop music affects film's ideologies of gender, race, and sexuality. Students do not need a background in music. Films will include The Band Wagon, American Graffiti, A Man and a Woman, Saturday Night Fever, Touch of Evil, Truth or Dare, The Umbrellas of Cherbourg, Round Midnight, and Head.

GSC 30569. New Russian Cinema (in English)

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

No prerequisite. Freed from the constraints of Soviet-era censorship, since 1990, Russian filmmakers have exploited the unique qualities of the film medium in order to create compelling portraits of a society in transition. The films we will watch cover a broad spectrum: reassessing Russia's rich pre-revolutionary cultural heritage as well as traumatic periods in Soviet history (World War II, the Stalinist era); grappling with formerly taboo social issues (gender roles, anti-Semitism, alcoholism); taking an unflinching look at new social problems resulting from the breakdown of the Soviet system (the rise of neo-fascism, the war in Chechnya, organized crime); and meditating on Russia's current political and cultural dilemmas (the place of non-Russian ethnicities within Russia, Russians' love-hate relationship with the West). From this complex cinematic patchwork emerges a picture of a new, raw Russia, as yet confused and turbulent, but full of vitality and promise for the future. Short readings supplement the film component of the course. Film screenings optional; films will also be available on reserve.

GSC 30570. Slavery in the Atlantic World

(3-0-3) Challenger

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This survey course explores the role of coerced African labor in the birth of the Atlantic World. What do we mean by Atlantic World? What do we mean by slavery? What varied and nuanced claims to humanity did Africans make against a dehumanizing labor system? How did sexuality and gender norms shape the experiences of slavery for men and women? Together, we will examine slave autobiographies, travel diaries, and pictorial sources to address these questions. We will explore how trans-Atlantic slavery connected the economies, cultures and societies that bordered the Atlantic Ocean. Our focus will be on the peoples of West Africa, Brazil and the Caribbean who were enslaved from the 15th to the 19th century.

GSC 30571. Mixed-Race America<sup>2</sup>

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Despite popular images of American as a "melting" both of races and ethnicities, our institutions, values, and practices have often tried to create or maintain spatial and social distance between groups defined as racially different. This course will explore that ways in which Americans have transgressed those boundaries or found other ways of interacting across cultural lines, primarily in the 19th and 20th centuries. We will examine popular cultural perceptions of people of mixed ancestry, their social experiences, the development of various mixed-ancestry communities, and historical attempts to limit interracial socializing, relationships, and marriage. These issues were and are deeply imbedded in debates over the meaning of race, gender expectations, and ideas about sex and sexuality. We will also pay close attention to how minority communities have understood people of mixed ancestry in the United States, and how mixed-race identities intersect with African American, Native American, Asian, white, and Latino identities.

GSC 30572. The City in American Culture

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Jane Jacobs wrote in The Death and Life of Great American Cities that all cities are governed by a marvelous and complex order. This order, she said, is composed of movement and change, and though it is life, not art, we may call it the form of the city, and liken it to the dance. The City in American Culture looks closely at the origins and continuation of that dance as it analyzes some of the forces that have shaped and continue to shape America's cities and their surrounding metropolitan areas. The course will center on a number of literary and nonliterary texts and be guided by a series of questions such as: Does urbanization thrive on a culture of poverty? Are 20th-century gated communities a continuation of the brownstone mansion? Does the American dream require vivid urban poverty? Is there such a thing as enough? Who lives in cities today? How are societal changes and the goals of urban development rewriting the role of cities? How has gentrification and evolving patterns of metropolitanism/cosmopolitanism effected the modern city and its composite neighborhoods. Why and how do cities compete for target communities such as arts, gay/lesbian, minority, young, urban, and professional? The course will have a written, research, and a practical/experiential component.

GSC 30573. Literature of Immigration: The Latino/a Transnational Experience

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Close reading of recent literature that explores the immigration between Mexico, Latin America, and the United States.

GSC 30574. History through Her/story: Women's Historical Fiction From the Atlantic Triangle

(3-0-3) Palko

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In the past few decades, historical fiction has become an increasingly popular literary genre for several important reasons. In this course, a survey of 20th-century women writers from around the Atlantic Triangle, we will read novels (all in English) from Senegal, Algeria, the Caribbean, Ireland, the United States, and Canada, to examine the ways in which the writers explore their personal relationship to history, as well as history's impact on the women of their nations. Turning to the past enables a novelist to distance herself from the society and historical moment in which she writes; this distance can free her from contemporary perspectives and allow her to critique her society. Historical fiction can also permit her to consider a point of view not recorded in history. Our readings, which will begin by attempting to define historical fiction, will be guided by questions the following statements prompt: "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." (George Santayana) "Well-behaved women seldom make history." (Laurel Ulrich Thatcher) "The one duty we have to history is to rewrite it." (Oscar Wilde) With each novel, we will consider the impact of 20th-century political developments on women, with especial consideration for the ways their roots have been tangled by the routes colonialism forced upon their ancestors. Such a reading will also permit us to explore other pertinent themes, such as political and social issues, expressions of sexuality, the role of religion in society, and images of nationhood. Authors to be read include Angela Bourke, Fatou Diome, Malika Mokeddem, Kate O'Brien, Gisèle Pineau, Jane Urquhart, Myriam Warner-Vierya, and Sherley Anne Williams. Course requirements include short response papers (1–2 pages each), a short paper (3–4 pages), a research paper (8–10 pages), and midterm and final exams.

GSC 30575. Disability

(2.5-0-3) Joshua

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course investigates the cultural meanings attached to extraordinary bodies and minds. Cultural and literary scholarship has extensively explored issues connected with identities derived from race, gender, and sexuality. Only recently have concepts of bodily identity, impairment, stigma, monstrosity, marginalization, beauty, deviance, and difference begun to cohere around disability as a concept and have emerged into a discipline called “disability studies.” This course covers topics such as human rights, feminism, medical attitudes, social stigma, normalcy, life narratives, pedagogy, Gothic horror, bodily representation, mental impairment, the politics of charity, community and collective culture, Bible narrative, the built environment, and empowerment, in a range of disciplines including literary studies, film, theology, government policy, art, and drama. Key texts and films will include The Elephant Man, The Hunchback of Notre Dame, Victor Hugo’s Notre-Dame de Paris, Jean-Dominique Bauby’s The Diving Bell and the Butterfly: A Memoir, Milton’s Samson Agonistes, Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s “The Yellow Wallpaper,” Ben Jonson’s Volpone, and Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein. As part of the assessment, students who take this class will take part in a local placement with people with disabilities in order to gain experience of community-based learning.

GSC 30576. Masculinity in Spanish Literature and Film

(2.5-0-3) Jerez-Farran

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will explore issues of masculinity as portrayed in modern Spanish drama, poetry, fiction, and film. It provides students with an opportunity to study literature and film that implicitly or explicitly shows what it means to be male and how masculinity is socially constructed. We will consider issues of male-female relationships, sexual identity and orientation, cultural identity, education and upbringing, fatherhood, and alternative social arrangements, giving due attention to the experience of men and to the struggle involved in living up to the difficult ideals of masculinity that have dominated our civilization from earliest times. Topics to be discussed in class will include, among others, the masculine stereotype, boy culture, masculine youth culture, sports, variations of the masculine image and the men’s movement. The course should be useful and interesting to students of both genders in helping them to understand their own experience as men or that of men in women’s lives.

GSC 30577. Women, Marriage, Family, and Sexuality in Medieval Europe

(3-0-3) Handy

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will explore the medieval roots of our modern ideas about marriage, gender roles, and sexuality. The period to be studied ranges from the early Christian period up until the 15th century. We will first examine the spread of Christian influence on the practices of marriage, divorce, and child-bearing through legal and theological records. Once armed with the basic concepts of how marriage functioned, we will move on to more varied topics, including parenthood, contraception, rape/abduction, and prostitution, as well as a look at how women’s daily lives changed over the course of the medieval period.

GSC 30578. Survey of French Literature II

(2.5-0-3) Perry

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is designed as an introduction to French and Francophone literatures from the 18th century to the present. It will cover works of representative authors (such as Graffigny, Voltaire, Sand, Zola, Colette, Camus, and Makine), focusing this semester on the theme of the “other” in literature. The juxtaposition of works by male and female authors who wrote on similar themes will also enable us to examine how literature represents the intersection of gender and sexuality with ethnicity, class, and nationality across several centuries and cultures. The course will be conducted in French. A series of mini-essays, a term paper, and active and assiduous participation in class discussions will be required.

GSC 30579. Civil Rights and Protest Movements

(3-0-3) Ardizzone

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will look at protest movements for civil rights and other related issues, focusing on the 20th century, especially the second half. One central theme will be the African American civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. How did race, gender, class, religion, and region impact the strategies, goals, and reception of various threads of black struggles for full citizenship? In addition, we will explore previous and later generations of African American activism, as well as other protest movements in the post-WWII period. How did the civil rights movement that emerged in the 1950s draw on early 20th-century activism and leadership? What directions did African American protest movements take after the late 1960s? How did other civil rights, racial and ethnic consciousness, and social reform movements in the 1960s, ‘70s, and ‘80s develop from their own historical experiences and in relationship to other protest movements?

GSC 30580. Reforming America in the Long Nineteenth Century (1776–1919)

(3-0-3) Turpin

With the recent 2008 presidential election, there is a lot of excitement about the possibility of “change” and “reform” in our country. This class will provide perspective on our present historical moment by examining American reform movements of the past. It will focus on “the long 19th century” from the American Revolution to World War I. During this time optimistic Americans of various stripes set out to reform all sorts of things: religion, sex, eating and drinking, race and gender relations, education, and working and living conditions, to name just a few. As we look at these reform movements, we will ask the questions: What drove certain people to buck convention and seek reform? Why did they choose to focus on these particular reforms at these times? What did they believe would be the ultimate significance of the changes they were seeking? Why were some movements more successful than others?

GSC 30600. Modern Political Thought

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, students will study the focal ideas and arguments that helped shape the development of Western modernity—and its notions of freedom, equality, citizenship, rights, democracy, nationality, justice, and cosmopolitanism—through close readings of classic texts of European and American political thought. Hobbes’s Leviathan, Locke’s Second Treatise of Government, Rousseau’s First Discourse, Second Discourse, and Social Contract, plus several historical and political essays by Kant will offer students the opportunity to understand the evolution of the vastly influential “social contract” tradition and the variants of democracy that have sprung from it. In addition, we will read contemporary works of political theory by John Rawls, Anthony Appiah, and Martha Nussbaum that both build on and move beyond the early modern social contract tradition in order to engage pressing issues of global justice that are inflected by race, ethnicity, nationality, class, sex, and gender. Students will participate in an on-campus conference on “Cosmopolitanism: Gender, Race, Class and the Quest for Global Justice,” which will feature Appiah and Nussbaum as keynote speakers.

GSC 30601. Feminist Political Thought

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In many countries, feminism has had a powerful impact on the conduct of practical politics. The purpose of this course is to consider the ways in which feminist thought has influenced political theory. We open our study by plunging into a controversial contemporary debate: What is the relationship between feminism and multiculturalism? Then, returning to some of the earliest feminist critiques of modern politics by Mary Wollstonecraft, John Stuart Mill, and Harriet Taylor, we examine a range of feminist approaches to politics, asking what unifies them, and where and why they diverge from one another. One of the guiding questions of this course will be the extent to which feminist approaches pose a fundamental challenge to traditional political theory: Can feminist theories of politics just “add women and stir”? Or do feminist approaches compel us to new or different methodologies, conceptual tools, and even definitions of politics? We also ask how meaningful it is to speak of feminism in the singular: Given the immense variety displayed by feminist thinking, should we talk about feminisms?

GSC 30602. Advanced Human Ethology

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ANTH 20105 OR ANTH 205 OR ANTH 305)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This class is intended for students who completed Human Ethology, a prerequisite for enrollment. It provides the opportunity to discuss the material and topics presented in the lecture course and will culminate with each student choosing a research topic and presenting it in the form of PowerPoint to the class. A second requirement in addition to weekly readings, discussion, and/or reviews of many articles read previously will be the completion of a significant observational study of some aspect of human behavior covered by class material. The topics to be investigated include but are not limited to the evolutionary and cultural perspectives on human aggression, sleep, laughter, grief, sex differences in behavior, institutional sports, play, parenting, infant care practices, or communication (especially nonverbal). The class fulfills a methods requirement for the anthropology major.

GSC 30603. Cultural Difference and Social Change

(3-0-3)

In the class, students will conduct research to better understand the sites that they visited during their overseas projects, orienting them in relation to broader global, regional, and national patterns. Course readings will cover such topics as world systems theory, globalization, development, NGOs, various understandings of “human rights,” applied anthropology, activism, and the relation between cultural relativism and service. Students will develop three collaborative websites during the semester (although each student will receive individual grades for their work). These collective projects will present the student’s own research interests based on their overseas experience, and will focus on the site where they worked, a problem that they observed in cross-cultural perspective, and an analysis of strategies for redressing this sort of problem. The overall goal of the course will be for students to gain an understanding of how social science analysis might help to understand and confront problems in cross-cultural contexts.

GSC 30604. Global Issues and the United Nations

(2.5-0-3) Smith

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course introduces students to the operations of the United Nations and its potential for contributing to a more peaceful, equitable, and sustainable world. We take up the world’s most pressing issues—such as peace and security, nuclear disarmament, poverty, economic and gender inequalities, and environmental degradation—to explore how the world’s governments have attempted to address global problems. Has the UN been an effective place for managing these issues? How might it be improved? What unique roles do civil society groups, or nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), play in the pursuit of the United Nations’ mission and goals? To help us consider these questions, we will meet via video conference with United Nations ambassadors, UN officials, and representatives from civil society groups. Students will have opportunities to ask questions of distinguished guest speakers, who will be joining us from the United Nations headquarters in New York. In addition to gaining an understanding of contemporary global issues, students will learn about the practical, day-to-day operations of this important world body. They will also have a chance to offer their own proposals for improving the ability of the world community to address major problems.

GSC 30605. Race and Ethnicity in American Politics

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course introduces students to the dynamics of the social and historical construction of race and ethnicity in American political life. The course explores the following core questions: What are race and ethnicity? What are the best ways to think about the impact of race and ethnicity on American citizens? What is the history of racial and ethnic formation in American political life? How do race and ethnicity link up with other identities animating political actions like gender and class? What role do American political institutions the Congress, presidency, judiciary, state and local governments, etc. play in constructing and maintaining these identity categories? Can these institutions ever be used to overcome the points of division in American society?

GSC 30606. Latino Politics

(2.5-0-3)

This course will examine the history and diversity of Latinos in the United States and how Latinos related to the U.S. political system. We will review the extent to which Latinos are incorporated into the political landscape and the degree to which they are adequately represented in the U.S. government. The course will emphasize the multiple pathways of Latino political assimilation and the ways in which Latinos become involved in politics, including electoral and non-electoral participation and partisanship acquisition.

GSC 30607. Introduction to South Asian Politics

(2.5-0-3) Yadav

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will present an overview of the politics of modern South Asia focusing on Afghanistan, Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan. We will begin by studying the impact of the British colonial experience, the rise of nationalism and the emergence of independent nation states. To develop a broad understanding of the political and economic experience of the region, we will spend time analyzing the four countries individually before moving on to explore four important themes in political science. First, regime choice and regime survival in the four countries. Second, the role of women in the development experience. Third, identity politics and the emergence of violent domestic and international movements. Fourth, international relations focusing on the role of three key actors—the United States, China, and the Middle East in regional politics.

GSC 30608. Anthropology of Reproduction

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will examine a variety of issues related to reproduction. We will concentrate on anthropological studies related primarily to reproductive health throughout the life cycle, such as sexuality, pregnancy and childbirth, midwifery, reproductive freedom, and the politics of the nation-state as they affect women’s (and men’s) reproductive lives. We will use ethnographic readings and examples from around the world to illustrate our discussions and gain an understanding of the complex intertwining of local and global politics regarding reproductive experiences and choices. An integral part of the course will be an ethnographic research project wherein you will apply anthropological theories and methods.

GSC 30609. Gender and Archaeology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, students will explore the potential for studying and reconstructing a prehistory of people through archaeology. We will consider the historical and theoretical foundations of creating an engendered past, the methodological and practical aspects of “doing” engendered archaeology, and the intersection between political feminism, archaeological knowledge production, and the politics of an engendered archaeology. Topics for consideration include feminist perspectives on science, anthropology, and archaeology; concepts of gender in prehistory and the present; women’s and men’s relations to craft production, state formation, and space; and the complex relationship between feminism, archaeology, and the politics of women and men in archaeology and the archaeological past. Under the broad theoretical, political and historical umbrella of feminism, archaeologists today are negotiating their own paths toward an engendered past from multiple directions, and this course will explore the diversity of these approaches toward creating a prehistory of people.

GSC 30610. Gender and Violence

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This seminar interrogates the intersections among male, female, violence, and nonviolence. How is gender related to war and peace across cultures? We explore the biological, psychological, ritual, spiritual, social, political, and military entanglements of sex, gender, and aggression in this course. We examine the lived realities of women and men in zones of conflict as both survivors and perpetrators of violence, and consider the potential of each as peace builders.

GSC 30612. Archaeology of the African Diaspora

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is designed to serve as an in-depth undergraduate level introduction to archaeological perspectives on the African Diaspora. In this course, we examine the formation and transformation of the Black Atlantic World beginning with the transatlantic slave trade to the middle of the 19th century through the study of archaeological and historical sources. The emphasis in this course is on English-speaking African America, where the vast majority of archaeological investigations have been undertaken. A major objective of this course is to understand the material world of communities of the African Diaspora within the context of the history and historiography of the Black Atlantic. This course is organized around the following themes: (1) diaspora and the Atlantic World; (2) material life of the diaspora; (3) diverse communities of the diaspora; and (4) intersections of race, class, gender, and representation.

GSC 30613. Slavery and Human Bondage

(2.5-0-3) Hauser

Corequisite: GSC 27999

For many Americans, the history of slavery is synonymous with plantations in the Atlantic world. This course seeks to expand our view of Atlantic slavery by looking to the Ancient World, Africa, Asia, and Europe in historic and contemporary contexts. This course examines slavery as a labor system and a social form intimately connected with the political economies and cultural groups within which it arose. It will also examine debates about contemporary forms of bonded labor and slavery emerging from global encounters today. By examining different types of bonded and unfree labor, such as chattel, domestic, and wage slavery, we will form an inquiry about slavery's relationship to the following: personhood and social death; the emergence of market economies; systems of differentiation used to maintain the social condition of the enslaved; and power and violence. This course will take an interdisciplinary approach relying on archaeology, anthropology, and history for our case studies in understanding this particular social form.

GSC 30614. Global Sociology

(2.5-0-3)

Global level changes have profound impacts on societies and on people's everyday practices. This course explores the major economic and institutional changes that have helped shape the world in which we live. Students will become familiar with the workings of such global institutions as the United Nations, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the World Trade Organization. We explore important topics such as immigration, inequality, gender, human rights, environmental degradation, and development as we consider how the global system affects other levels social organization and practice. How, for instance, does the World Trade Organization affect democracy within countries? Do U.S. policies within the World Bank contribute to environmental protection? What happens when international trade agreements come into conflict with international human rights norms? How has globalization affected the ways people engage in political action? Global changes have important implications for the types and intensities of conflicts around the world, and it is difficult to address these conflicts without an understanding of how they are embedded within a broader, global system. This course helps students analyze the ways power operates in the world economy and political system and its impacts on conflict and peace processes in diverse settings.

GSC 30615. Gender and Peace Studies

(2.5-0-3) St. Ville

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will place the resources of gender theory into conversation with peace studies. In so doing it will highlight both how the category of "gender" serves as a useful analytical tool for peace scholars while at the same time noting how specific situations of conflict and peacebuilding call into question and so prompt a reshaping of prominent concepts in gender theory. In the first section of the course, we will consider how attention to the social marginalization of women has clarified the differential effects of war and peace efforts. Topics to be covered include women's greater vulnerability to personal and systemic forms of violence in conflict situations, the sexual politics of warfare including the use of sexual violence as a tool of war, and the role of women as perpetrators of violence. We will consider also the increased roles in peacebuilding that have emerged for women as a result of the attention to gender, including formal calls for women to be included in peace processes, the recognition of gender-based war crimes, and grassroots peacebuilding initiatives by women. In this section, we will draw heavily on first-hand accounts from specific contexts of conflict, most notably Northern Uganda and Afghanistan. Our study of women's peacebuilding in particular sites will position us in the final section of the course to think still more critically about concepts of gender and power. Critics of contemporary gender theory frequently charge that in its radical questioning of concepts of the self and identity, gender theory has lost its ability to be politically effective. In light of our analyses, we will take up this challenge asking whether and in what ways gender remains a useful tool for students of peace studies and what possibilities our inquiry might open for reimagining concepts of gendered identity to inform future work in peacebuilding.

GSC 30616. Anthropology of War and Peace

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This class will explore the human capacity for war and for peace. The course will explore the many forms of war, from tribal conflicts through guerrilla warfare to conventional and nuclear war. It will also study societies without war, the place of war and peace in human society, whether violence is inherent in human nature or learned, and what the future of war and peace is likely to be on our planet.

GSC 30617. Archaeology of Everyday Life

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course focuses on social psychological aspects of relationships between humans and the natural environment. Issues include how humans interact with different environments, symbolic transformations of environments, and competing accounts or claims concerning human-environment relationships. The course is framed in a sociology knowledge perspectives and touches on alternative ways of envisioning and valuing individual and institutional perspectives on human-environment relationships with an eye toward implications for social change.

GSC 30618. Motherhood in the Public Sphere

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will examine the place that motherhood has historically been given in Western philosophic thought and literature. Drawing from history, political science, and literature, we will examine how motherhood has customarily been valorized in the western republican tradition and incorporated in its political institutions. We will explore the ways in which the gendered assumptions about women's public roles as mothers, particularly in the American context, both circumscribed and opened opportunities for women to participate in public life. Finally, we will consider the extent to which these ideas exist in non-Western cultural contexts, and whether the glorification of motherhood in the developing world will help or hinder women's prospects for social advancement.

GSC 30619. Anthropology of Race

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

While issues of race and racism are pervasive in our society, most people know surprisingly little about the social, biological, political, and historical factors at play. Race is simultaneously a very real social construct and a very artificial biological one. How can this be? Why do we care so much about classifications/divisions of humanity? This course will tackle the anthropology of race from a critical perspective. We will learn about the biology of human difference and similarity, how societies view such similarities and differences, how our social and scientific histories create these structures, and why this knowledge is both extremely important and too infrequently discussed.

GSC 30620. Anthropology of the Muslim World

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will be a survey examination of ethnographic work on the Muslim world appropriate for students with all levels of background in anthropology and Islam. The course will look at the Muslim world broadly defined, including ethnographic work on the Middle East, Central Asia, South Asia, Southeast Asia, Europe, Africa, and North America. The course will consider many aspects of life in Muslim societies, not just religion, including trade, travel, identity, literature, and politics. Because of its relevance to current events, a significant portion of the course will deal with gender relations and constructions of masculinity/femininity in the Muslim context. We will consider such questions as the impact of religion on gender relations, negotiations between textual traditions and “popular” traditions in determining gender relations, and the circumstances in which gender constructions in the Muslim world attract attention from the “West.” The aim of this course is to give students an understanding of a wide array of approaches to ethnography. Lectures and supplementary reading material will situate the central texts in the dominant theories and assumptions of the discipline.

GSC 30621. Utopias and Dystopias

(2.5-0-3) Mendham

Corequisite: GSC 27999

“Utopia” is a term coined by Thomas More, probably as a pun suggesting that the “good place” is “no place.” Exploring utopian traditions in politics and political thought reveals a jarring contrast between the noblest human aspirations and the most devastating outcomes. Even so, some students may find grounds for hope in certain utopian traditions, since these include not only the dozens of well-intentioned schemes that quickly led to slaughter or starvation, but also some enduring and simple communities such as the Amish. Other students may come to the more sobering conclusion that dramatic social progress is impossible. But even for them, there may be much to learn from the portrayals of shocking corruption and degradation in “dystopias” for it may still be possible that, if certain social and cultural trends are left unchecked, society can get far worse. Both utopias and dystopias tend to focus especially on two aspects of —sexuality and economics— which, according to some, are the most in need of radical reform, while according to others, are the most dangerous when altered from their traditional patterns. Utopias and dystopias help refine our idea of what excellence and depravity in society look like, how far progress and decline are possible, and what means tend toward these conditions. This course draws from political theory, history, literature, and film.

GSC 30622. Material Life of Africans in the Americas

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will provide the student with a sampling of the diversity of experiences of people of African descent in the Americas as viewed from the archaeologist’s and historical anthropologists’ perspectives. Because the language of archaeology is material culture, we’ll be exploring how people have used crafts, goods, and space to communicate and negotiate identities and relationships with one another in the contexts of colonization, the birth of new nations, industrialization, and modernization. The experiences of colonizers and colonized, enslaved people, and post-colonial immigrant peoples and their families will be discussed. Due to the breadth and diversity of the material to be covered, the course will have both a loosely chronological and topical structure, but will not adhere formally to either.

GSC 30650. The Anthropology of Childhood and Education

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Concepts of human growth vary extraordinarily across time and space. When children become full-fledged persons, when they can reason, when or whether they should be independent from their parents, and how all this happens are variable and illuminating. Education—either formal or informal—reflects and also constitutes a society’s view of childhood. This course provides a (selective) cross-cultural survey of childhood and education, looking at stages from pregnancy and infancy to late adolescence. Students will devise and conduct projects of their own.

GSC 30651. Contemporary Political Thought

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is an introduction to contemporary American and European political thinkers. The goal of the course is to identify the characteristic questions of modern politics and the challenges to freedom in the modern age.

GSC 30652. Kinship and Comparative Social Organization

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The course uses a broad cross-cultural comparative perspective to identify and analyze the major forms of human social organization. Emphasis is on kinship terminology, descent, marriage, residence units, economic exchange, political structure, and social inequality, among other topics.

GSC 30653. Gender and Society

(2.5-0-3) Gregg

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is an introduction to the study of gender and society. We will study how gender is constructed through social interaction and how it is patterned in a wide gamut of structural locations, such as the following: education, media, family, the field of medicine, and business and the economy. Major themes in this course include the social construction of gender, how people “do” gender, and patriarchy and the perpetuation of gender inequality in our society. After exploring the core characteristics of patriarchy and its power as a social system, the final project in this course will work toward solutions to gender inequality.

GSC 30654. Gender and Society

(2.5-0-3)

This course is an introduction to the study of gender and society. We will study how gender is constructed through social interaction and how it is patterned in a wide gamut of structural locations, such as the following: education, media, family, the field of medicine, and business and the economy. Major themes in this course include the social construction of gender, how people “do” gender, and patriarchy and the perpetuation of gender inequality in our society. After exploring the core characteristics of patriarchy and its power as a social system, the final project in this course will work toward solutions to gender inequality.

GSC 31513. History of Television Lab

(0-0-0)

This course is the lab component of GSC 30513.

GSC 31568. Topics: Film and Popular Music Lab

(0-2-0)

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of prerecorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and pop biopics. We’ll see films using popular music of all kinds—Tin Pan Alley, ‘50s rock ‘n’ roll, jazz, disco, French pop, and more. We’ll consider the role of the star—ranging from Astaire to Travolta, Dylan to Madonna—and films by directors such as Scorsese and Welles. Looking at films from the 1930s to the present, we’ll consider the narrative function and meaning of music, industrial practices, changing social values, how songs get Academy Awards, how soundtracks circulate, and how film relates to various other musical media, such as radio and MTV. Throughout, we will pay special attention to how pop music affects film's ideologies of gender, race, and sexuality. Students do not need a background in music. Films will include The Band Wagon, American Graffiti, A Man and a Woman, Saturday Night Fever, Touch of Evil, Truth or Dare, The Umbrellas of Cherbourg, Round Midnight, and Head.

GSC 33652. Senior Seminar: Transnational Social Movements
(2.5-0-3)

Writing seminars are devoted to a specialized topic and give students a chance to take a writing-intensive course in a seminar setting, with an emphasis on research skills and discussion.

GSC 40103. Cinema Ideologies

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 41103

Cinema, both in fiction and nonfiction forms, is one of the major contributing forces to the construction of ourselves and our perception of “others” in terms of class, gender, and race. This course proposes to study and dissect these constructions in such films as Malcolm X, Schindler's List, Philadelphia, The Killing Fields, and Striptease through a close-reading practice.

GSC 40111. Love and Sex in the Christian Tradition

(3-0-3) Porter
Corequisite: GSC 27999

Christian reflections on sexuality comprise one of the richest yet most controversial aspects of the Christian moral tradition. In this course, we will examine Christian sexual ethics from a variety of perspectives through a study of historical and contemporary writings. Topics to be considered include Christian perspectives on marriage and family, the ethics of sex within and outside of marriage, contraception, divorce and remarriage, and homosexuality. Course requirements will include four or five short papers and a final examination.

GSC 40113. Sex and Gender in Cinema

(3-0-3) Wojcik
Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 41113

This course analyzes representations of and theories about sex and gender in cinema. Students will read major texts in feminist theory, queer theory, and masculinity studies in order to become familiar with important concepts and debates within the field. Topics covered will include “the male gaze,” spectatorship, performance and stardom, camp, “reading against the grain,” consumption, gender and genre, race and gender, masquerade, authorship, and masculinity “in crisis.” Students will view classical Hollywood films, silent films, and avant-garde films and videos. Evening screenings required.

GSC 40119. Twentieth-Century British Women Writers

(3-0-3)
Modern and postmodern fiction (and some nonfiction prose) by British women. Authors may include Woolf, Butts, Rhys, Cunard, Richardson, Carrington, West, Mansfield, Carter, and Winterson.

GSC 40127. Mary Wollstonecraft and her Legacies

(3-0-3)
This course will begin by examining the political thought of Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–97) through a close study of her corpus of original writings, including her early educational writings, her two great treatises of political theory, A Vindication of the Rights of Men and A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, and her late literary writings. Next, the course will investigate the contested question of Wollstonecraft's political, philosophical, literary, and popular legacies. Through the study of the works of major 19th-century writers who read, critically engaged, and, in many cases, appropriated Wollstonecraft's radical ideas on women's rights, marriage and family, theology, and educational, economic, and political reform, we will challenge the thesis that her husband William Godwin's scandalous 1798 biography of her life diminished her influence in the century after her death. Finally, we will look at how Wollstonecraft has been received in the past hundred years and engage the puzzling question of why the most visionary and influential theorist of women's rights in the modern tradition has not yet secured a steady place in the Western canon.

GSC 40128. Images of Women in American Cinema

(3-0-3)
Corequisite: GSC 27999
In viewing any film, we must ask ourselves what the filmmakers want us to think. To answer that question for a specific genre, we will be studying portrayals of 20th-century women in film and how these images have evolved in reaction to, and as a backlash against, the modern feminist movement.

GSC 40129. Family Development

(3-0-3)
This course is directed to the sociology, psychology, counseling, preprofessional, nursing, social work, and other majors who will necessarily be working with or seeking to understand families in the course of their occupations. The course covers change in families from the time when couples marry until their dissolution due to divorce or death of one of the spouses. Parent-child relations beginning when children are born until parents' death, changes in sibling relations as persons age, as well as the development of the marital union will be examined. The family cycles of childless and one-parent families will also be included. Students have the opportunity to apply the course material on family careers to their own families within the context of marriage, occupational, and educational plans. They do a case history of a family in order to gain experience in using the family development approach.

(3-0-3)
This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It will treat the subject of the “Renaissance woman” in three ways. First, there will be a brief historical overview of the condition of women of different social classes during this period, focusing on topics such as their education, the role of marriage, and the convent as an alternative to married life. Secondly, it will survey how women were viewed in the literature written by men in various European countries. Here we shall read excerpts from Dante and the courtly love tradition, Petrarch and the Petrarchists, Shakespeare, and Rabelais, among others. We shall also consider the portrayal of women in artistic works of this time, comparing this to their literary representation. Next, we shall study the literature created by women during the Renaissance in Europe. During this part of the course, we shall consider some of the problems generated by women's writing, using Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own as a point of departure for our discussions. At the end of the course, we will resume our study of the image of woman in the Renaissance by reading a modern play set at that time (Peter Whelan's The Herbal Bed on the trial of Shakespeare's daughter) that treats some of the issues facing women at that time. All foreign texts will be read in English translation.

GSC 40131. Gender, Genre, and the Short Story

(3-0-3)
This course discusses how representations of gender were explored in a survey of 19th- and 20th-century short stories from England, Ireland, France, Russia, and the southern United States.

GSC 40132. Gender, Selfhood, and Suffering

(3-0-3)
Corequisite: GSC 27999
Suffering is one of the most pervasive realities of human experience, and it can be argued that women often suffer in ways that are unique to and informed by their gender and sex. Designed for students of gender studies and theology, this course examines the intersection of gender, suffering, and selfhood with an emphasis on the ways in which suffering has played a role in religious traditions—and in the Christian tradition in particular—in problematizing or promoting the self-understanding and self-formation of women. We will engage authors both “inside” and “outside” the Christian tradition, and while the primary focus will be on contemporary debates and interpretations of the class themes, some attention will be given to earlier periods in history. The challenge of the course will be to learn to assess critically and understand constructively the various means by which the gender- and religion-inflected experiences of asceticism, ritual sacrifice, pain, self-denial, etc. have influenced the selfhood of women.

GSC 40133. Virgins and Vixens of Enlightenment England

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The course will look at various “virgins” and “vixens” of Enlightenment England (the “long” 18th century of 1660–1800) as a means of studying how “woman” was constructed, and why she was represented in certain ways during an important period of British history. Literary representations of women argued for certain views of how the individual, society, and the nation should be and interrelate, thus narratives by and about women tell stories with historical, social, and political implications. In class we will look at some of the constructions of women and “woman” that real women had to navigate in order to function in society and in private; for instance, by what methods can integrity and individual dignity survive when chastity is commodified, marriage is an economic transaction, and financial and professional independence for women is almost impossible? Our aim will be to study and critically evaluate the binary opposition between “virgins” and “vixens” so that the complexity of the terrain women had to engage—intellectual, spiritual, social, political, personal—will be addressed alongside the wider ramifications of how women were represented by writers such as Mary Astell, Alexander Pope, Jonathan Swift, Samuel Richardson, Samuel Johnson, and Mary Wollstonecraft.

GSC 40178. Race, Gender, and Women of Color

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This seminar analyzes dominant American beliefs about the significance of race and gender primarily through the focusing lens of the experiences of women of color in the United States. How did intersecting ideologies of race and gender attempt to define and limit the lives of women of color as well as other American? How did intersecting ideologies of race and gender attempt to define and limit the lives of women of color as well as other American? How have women of color responded to and reinterpreted white American ideas about their identity to develop their own self-defenses and ideologies?

GSC 40183. U.S. Sex/Sexuality/Gender Since 1880

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Sexuality, like other areas of social life, has a history. Yet historians have only written about the history of sex for the last 40 years or so. This course will both introduce students to a variety of current themes in the history of sexuality and invite them to consider how they themselves might research and write that history. The class will survey recent topics in the history of sexuality from first colonial settlement to the end of the Victorian era. Issues we may consider include different religions’ attitudes toward sexuality (the Puritans were not anti-sex!), how different cultures’ views of sex shaped relations between colonists and Indians, why sex was an important factor in establishing laws about slavery in Virginia, birth control and abortion practices, changing patterns of courtship, men who loved men and women who loved women, and why the average number of children in American families fell by 50 percent between 1790 and 1890.

GSC 40186. Gender and Culture

(3-0-3)

An introduction to literary theories of gender and culture in film, literature, and other media.

GSC 40187. Experimental Writing by Contemporary Women Poets

(3-0-3)

Close readings of selected contemporary “experimental” women poets.

GSC 40188. A Gendered Voice: The Poetry of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ni Dhomhnaill’s poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

GSC 40189. U.S. Sex/Sexuality/Gender From 1880

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Sexuality, like other areas of social life, has a history. Yet historians have only written about the history of sex for the last 40 years or so. This course will both introduce students to a variety of current themes in the history of sexuality and invite them to consider how they themselves might research and write that history. The class will survey recent topics in the history of sexuality from first colonial settlement to the end of the Victorian era. Issues we may consider include different religions’ attitudes toward sexuality (the Puritans were not anti-sex!), how different cultures’ views of sex shaped relations between colonists and Indians, why sex was an important factor in establishing laws about slavery in Virginia, birth control and abortion practices, changing patterns of courtship, men who loved men and women who loved women, and why the average number of children in American families fell by 50 percent between 1790 and 1890.

GSC 40221. Gender and Violence

(3-0-3)

This upper-level anthropology course focuses on the problematic intersection between gender and violence. The question of male aggression and female pacifism is explored, with attention to female fighters and male practitioners of nonviolence. Women in circumstances of war, trauma, and healing are studied for the insight such study may provide for peacebuilding initiatives. Gender in the military, gender and violence ritual cross-culturally, and rape as a sociopolitical phenomenon are among the other topics considered. Primary source readings complement intensive class discussion; substantial writing and speaking buttress academic skills.

GSC 40223. Sociology of Masculinity

(3-0-3)

This seminar explores the social construction of masculinity and its many forms, both traditional and emerging, through readings, movies, discussions, and writing assignments. Members of the seminar will seek a better understanding of shifting roles, identities, and social structures that influence the way both males and females develop the meaning of masculinity. Topics include socialization, role conflicts, gender violence, sexuality, the impact of fathering and men’s movements. The masculinities in the United States and around the world. It is intended to complement the study of gender in other disciplines, but some familiarity with basic concepts in sociology is strongly recommended.

GSC 40225. Engendering Archaeology

(3-0-3)

This course will consider the historical and theoretical foundations of creating an engendered past, the methodological and practical aspects of “doing” engendered archaeology, and the intersection between political feminism, archaeological knowledge production, and the politics of an engendered archaeology.

GSC 40251. Fashioning Identities in Colonial America

(3-0-3) White

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will focus on dress and material/visual culture in colonial North America. It will introduce methodology, and offer an overview of key themes in the history of dress and consumerism within the framework of gender studies. In our focus on the colonial period (especially in the 18th century), we will analyze the economics of dress (the production, marketing, and acquisition of cloth and clothing) and will assess the importance of fashion and commerce and politics. We will evaluate the role of dress in the construction of colonial identities, and we will examine the ways that dress operated as a visual locus for racial, class, and ethnic encounters.

GSC 40275. Topics in Modern Art

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Topics course on special areas of modern art.

(3-0-3)

By examining texts from the different nations within the British Isles—Scotland, Ireland, and England—we will explore the complex question of how national boundaries are drawn, how a sense of membership in a nation is created, and what that might have to do with falling in love, getting married, and staying married.

GSC 40294. Venetian and Northern Italian Renaissance Art

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course focuses on significant artistic developments of the 16th century in Venice with brief excursions to Lombardy and Piedmont. Giorgione, Titan, and Palladio, the formulators of the High Renaissance style in Venice, and subsequent artists such as Tintoretto and Veronese are examined. An investigation of the art produced in important provincial and urban centers such as Brescia, Cremona, Milan, Parma, Varallo, and Vercelli also provide insight into the traditions of the local schools and their patronage.

GSC 40301. American Film

Presentations and discussions of the several genres of film produced in America since the early 1900s.

GSC 40309. Strains in Twentieth-Century American Fiction

(3-0-3)

Beginning with F. Scott Fitzgerald's "Jazz Age" and ending with Toni Morrison's Jazz, a study of thematic commonalities and dissonances in selected 20th-century American novels.

GSC 40310. Global Romanticisms

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the intersections between the local, the national, and the global in well-known and lesser-known works of British Romantic era literature including fiction, drama, poetry, journalism, travel writing, abolitionist writing, political prose, and women writers.

GSC 40311. History From Below: Colonialism, Nationalism, and Subalterns

(3-0-3)

This course introduces advanced undergraduates and graduate students to methods of doing and writing history that intervene within dominant historical narratives and frameworks by redefining historians' relationships with sources and the questions asked of them. The Subaltern Studies Collective that emerged from South Asia in the 1980s and 1990s is now recognized as one of the more important historical interventions in recent years. Subaltern studies—historiographic writing has questioned dominant nationalist narratives by arguing that they represent only the history of elites. The objective of the course is to draw attention to differing understandings of colonialism and nationalism by laying out the perspectives of "subalterns"—untouchables, tribals, peasants, workers, women and other marginalized groups. In addition, "subaltern" perspective would also be extended to studying such themes as democracy, politics, modernity, development, cities, environment, films, and television in South Asia. The interventions by the Subaltern Studies Collective will be situated in relationship to developments in European historiography, with special attention to the unique departures of this new school. Debates within and critiques of the collective's approach will also be examined. A background in South Asian history or culture is not a prerequisite.

GSC 40314. Victorian Radicals

(3-0-3)

"Fringe" characters in, and elements of British Victorian literature, with a particular emphasis on a modern world being increasingly defined in economic terms.

GSC 40315. Victorian City

(3-0-3)

How notions of "the city" were depicted in 19th-century British literature.

GSC 40318. History and Theory of Literary Criticism

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The evolution of modern literary criticism.

GSC 40368. Doing Things with Words

(3-0-3)

This course looks at some of the ways humans do things with words. Topics include religious language; silence; politeness and sincerity; truth, deception, lying, and cheating; linguistic variety, identity, and stereotypes; moral evaluations made of language; and language used for power and solidarity.

GSC 40370. Anthropology of War and Peace

(3-0-3)

This class will explore the human capacity for war and peace, from tribal conflicts through guerilla warfare to conventional and nuclear war. It will also study societies without war and populations with innovative ideas about peace.

GSC 40375. Celebrity, Scandal, Obscurity: The Nineteenth-Century Poet

(3-0-3)

How 19th-century British Victorian poets courted, simultaneously, celebrity, scandal, and obscurity.

GSC 40376. The Very Long Victorian Novel

(3-0-3)

A close reading of selected 19th-century British novels.

GSC 40377. Post-War British and Irish Poetry

(3-0-3)

An analysis of British and Irish poetry written after World War II.

GSC 40378. Media Stardom and Celebrity Culture

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 41378

Much of America's contemporary popular culture, movies, TV, music, even sports revolves around stars, and yet few of us understand the implications of, or even the reasons for, our society's fascination with fame and celebrity. This course interrogates the cultural phenomenon of stardom from a variety of historical and theoretical perspectives. Across the semester, we will explore how stardom developed as a concept across the 20th century, learn how to "read" star images, look at the development of the Hollywood star system, consider what the popularity of certain film stars might tell us about the issues of social identity, examine stardom as a global phenomenon, and question why celebrity is such an obsession today. Overall, our goal will be to develop tools for investigating the cultural significance of stardom and to use those tools to uncover what stardom and celebrity reveal about both our society and ourselves.

GSC 40425. Class, Labor, and Narrative

(3-0-3)

How selected American writers addressed class and labor.

GSC 40427. Our America: Exploring the Hyphen Between African and American

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Close readings of various 20th-century African American literatures, with foci on how “black subjectivity” is created; the relationship between literature, history, and cultural mythology; the dialectic of freedom and slavery in American rhetoric; the American obsession with race; and the sexual ideology and competing representations of domesticity.

GSC 40428. Women’s Narrative in the Southern Cone

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course designed as a seminar for upper-level Spanish students aims to critically analyze some of the most important narrative texts by 20th-century Argentine, Chilean and Uruguayan women authors. Some of the writers to be studied include Somers, Geel, Guido, Peri-Rossi, Mercado, Eltit, and Valenzuela among others. Our readings of the selected works will be informed by the social and political circumstances of their time, which will enable us to understand the emergence of feminine subjectivities and their fictional representations. Concepts of gender, sex, and sexuality will be central to our discussions. Thus, theoretical and critical texts on feminism will also be included. Course participants will be required to actively participate in class, prepare weekly readings, two reaction papers, a class presentation on one or more of the authors studied, and a final paper.

GSC 40429. Asian American Writing Sexuality

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will introduce students to major works of Asian American literature while exploring issues of sexuality and gender in this body of literature. We will focus on race/ethnicity, authenticity, and representation as contested sites in Asian American literature, and how these contested sites produce inter/intraracial tensions about the Asian body as it is viewed from within Asian American literature and from without. Primary texts will include novels, short fiction, poetry, film, drama, the graphic novel, and critical essays.

GSC 40477. Gender and Health

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course looks at the intersection of gender, health policy, and health care organization around the world. Some of the issues to be discussed include medicalization of the female body; critical medical anthropology; the politics of reproduction; social production of illness and healing; politics, poverty, and health; national and international health; and development policies.

GSC 40478. Cultures of Fear: Horror Film

(3-1-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Horror and fear play seminal roles in the construction of cultural mythos and practice. In the modern and post-modern eras, the horror film and a culture of fear have come to prominence as core elements of cinematic expression. In this course we will examine the construction and application of central themes in the scope of international horror cinema and how they reveal salient aspects of cultural similarities and differences including: gender, sexuality, violence, and socio-political climates. Students will contextualize the films via texts drawing from anthropology, film studies, basic film production, and culture theory. Coursework will include research papers and the production of a short visual video piece representing the students’ interpretations of “What is scary?”

GSC 40500. Love and the Novel

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Beginning with The Symposium and ending with selected modernist writings, how Eros has appeared and been expressed in the West.

GSC 40501. Fin-de-Siècle Literature

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

For Victorians, the end of the 19th century was a time of instability, anxiety, as well as possibility. This period, known as fin-de-siècle, witnessed an explosion in sexual and gender transgression, as embodied by dandies and decadents. This time period was also one where there were great political and economic conflicts in the form of growing labor and socialist movement. The fin-de-siècle also observed the birth of the New Woman who lobbied for sexual, economic, and social equality. And this period also saw the emergence of new aesthetic movement, with its radical philosophy of “art for art’s sake.” This course will consider a range of literary texts that are representative of the political, cultural and aesthetic innovations that define the fin-de-siècle. These texts will be organized according to the following four thematic sections: (1) socialism and labor politics, (2) the aesthetic movement, (3) decadents and dandies, and (4) the new woman. We will begin with William Morris’s New From Nowhere and then, by section two, move on to poetry by Michael Field and Amy Levy. Our discussions of Oscar Wilde’s prose and novel The Picture of Dorian Gray will carry us into section three, where we will also consider prose by Max Beerbohm and Arthur Symons. The course will conclude with Ella Hepworth Dixon’s novel, The Story of a Modern Woman, as well as stories by Victoria Cross and Olive Schreiner. Scholarly criticism and selections from Victorian writings will help us to read these texts in response to one another and as situated within their respective historical and cultural contexts.

GSC 40502. Women and Magazines

(3-0-3) Green

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will explore women’s print culture by focusing on women as producers and consumers of periodicals. Some of the key figures in what is sometimes called a “female” modernism made their living by publishing literary pieces and journalism in periodicals or through serving as literary editors: Djuna Barnes, Rebecca West, Virginia Woolf, Jesse Fauset, to name a few, and many of the key texts of literary modernism made their first appearance in periodicals. In addition, the periodical press has been called the medium that best “articulates the unevenness and reciprocities of evolving gender ideologies” and thus is ideal for a study of the role literary culture plays in constructing and diagnosing the contradictions of femininity in modernity. The period between the coincident rise of the New Woman and New Journalism in the 1880s and the dominance of the “woman’s magazine” in the interwar years is extraordinarily rich in examples of diverse approaches to understanding femininity presented in the press. As we consider the connections between women and periodical culture from various angles (reception, circulation, representations of women journalists, the centrality of Little Magazines, “slick” magazines, and women’s magazines as key venues for publishing modernist texts, etc.) we will meet the modern woman journalist and her close relations: female editors, “sob sisters,” “stunt girls,” “agony aunts” to name a few. We will take a good look at a variety of publication venues—modernist “Little Magazines,” feminist periodicals, so-called “women’s magazines” as well as the daily press. We will be working with periodicals in various formats: microfilm, digitalized texts, edited collections, and bound volumes. One brief essay, two mid-length (8- to 10-page) essays and one group presentation.

GSC 40503. Film and Television Theory

(3-0-3) Wojcik

Prerequisite: (FTT 30101 OR FTT 30102)Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 41503

This course offers an introduction to the philosophical, aesthetic, cultural, and historical issues that inform current scholarship and production in film and television, including auteurist, psychoanalytic, semiotic, and cultural studies approaches to film, with attention to cinema ideology, including issues of gender and sexuality.

GSC 40504. Contemporary Women Writers

(3-0-3) Sayers

Corequisite: GSC 27999

We will read, discuss, and write about a wide range of contemporary writing by women, with a particular concentration on the short story and the writers visiting Notre Dame's Women Writers Festival. Our readings will include realistic fiction as well as innovative and experimental work, including graphic fiction; some of our readings will focus on women's experiences and perspectives, but some will "make the leap" to imagine men's consciousness and reality. We'll also read critical essays and reflections by the writers themselves to situate the work within the history of women writers; we'll be especially interested in the publishing and critical realities facing women writers today. Reading journal, midterm and final, brief presentation, and an 8- to 10-page critical paper.

GSC 40505. The Romantic Novel in the 1790s

(2.5-0-3) Joshua

Corequisite: GSC 27999

When Lionel reflects, in Charlotte Smith's Desmond (1792), "I found that if I would really satisfy myself with a certain view of Geraldine, I must seek some spot, where, from its elevation, I could, by means of a small pocket telescope, have an uninterrupted view of these windows," and the eponymous heroine of Mary Hays's Memoirs of Emma Courtney (1796) observes "I shall, I suspect, be impelled by an irresistible impulse to seek you. Though you have condemned my affection, my friendship will still follow you," they represent an extreme unrequited devotion that is part of the period's preoccupation with passion. The novel of the 1790s teems with rapists, stalkers, abusive employers, weeping men, and fighting women who confront prison, madness, murder, jealousy, and suicidal melancholy. This course aims to explore the significance of passion for understanding developments in the representation of femininity, masculinity, social virtue, and humanitarian reform at the end of the 18th century.

GSC 40506. Gender and Space (Literature)

(3-0-3) Green

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A study of the spaces of modernity and gender in the novel.

GSC 40507. American Women Writers

(3-0-3) Irving

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A survey of American women writers from Chopin to present.

GSC 40549. Self, Family, Nation: Insular and U.S. Hispanic Caribbean Women Authors

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course focuses on the literature of Hispanic Caribbean women authors in the islands and in the United States. By contrasting the works of recent and more established authors from Puerto Rico, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and their counterparts in the United States, we'll explore the construction of gender and sexuality from a Caribbean feminist perspective. Some of the texts that this course will examine include: In the Time of the Butterflies by Julia Alvarez, Papi by Rita Indiana, When I was Puerto Rican by Esmeralda Santiago, Maldito amor by Rosario Ferré, and Dreaming in Cuban by Cristina García.

GSC 40550. Nebraska v. Fields: Death by Abortion, 1920

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Students who have not taken the prerequisite courses but have a background and/or particular interest in the study of gender in history are welcome to appeal to the History Department for permission to register for this course. In 1921, Dr. Leslie S. Fields of Omaha, Neb., was sentenced to one-to-10 years in prison for performing an illegal abortion resulting in the death of 20-year-old Miss Ruth Ayer. Although the case has long been forgotten, a complete, word-for-word transcript of Fields's five-day trial recently surfaced on Ebay. This hitherto-unknown, and never-before-analyzed document opens a window into the histories of gender, law, medicine, society, and culture in the American heartland at the end of the progressive era. Students in this class will begin the work of unpacking and analyzing the history and context of the story told by that trial transcript. The first half of the class will be devoted to understanding the broader historical context of the law, medicine, politics, women, and abortion during the early 20th century; to that end, a number of secondary source books and articles will be read, and students may be asked to locate and read a variety of relevant primary and secondary sources to help us understand the larger historical context. During the last half of the class, each student will research and write an in-depth report on one person, aspect, or issue raised by the case of the State of Nebraska vs. Leslie S. Fields.

GSC 40551. Migrating Melodramas: Latino/a Literature and Popular Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines how various forms of popular culture from Latin America and the Caribbean migrate to the United States and are reappropriated by Latina/o cultural producers. Focusing particularly on theories of melodrama as a feminine discursive space, we will analyze several works of Latina/o literature that underscore women's active interpretation of music, film, and television. While this is a literature-based course, students will also examine how hybrid cultural products such as contemporary boleros, films, and telenovelas produce a transnational imaginary that connects Latinas/os in the United States with Latin America and the Caribbean. We will read novels such as Loving Pedro Infante by Denise Chavez, The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love by Oscar Hijuelos, and Tomorrow They Will Kiss by Eduardo Santiago.

GSC 40552. Films of Pedro Almodovar

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

An introduction to contemporary Spanish culture and society through a selection of Pedro Almodovar's most representative cinematic output. Discussions focus on important features such as postmodernist aesthetics, questions of national identity, pop culture, the controversial representation of gender roles and sexuality in general, and the celebration of heterodox desires vis-a-vis repressive social conventions. This course is taught in Spanish.

GSC 40553. Beyond the Islands

(3-0-3) Moreno

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines the literary and cultural production of Latinos/as from the Spanish-speaking Caribbean. Issues of migration, transnationalism, and transculturation will be explored through the analysis of texts by Puerto Rican, Cuban American, and Dominican American authors.

GSC 40554. Identity and Gender in Modern Irish Women's Poetry

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course interrogates issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish women poets. We examine the ways in which contemporary poets write from a constellation of identities—sexual, cultural, and linguistic—and will focus in particular on the ways how question as they articulate versions of identity in specific cultural and literary forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies, feminist theory and postcolonial studies, among others, this course examines texts that question and problematize essentialist notions of cultural and gender identity. We will also explore tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary Irish-language writing. We read, among others, poets such as Eavan Boland, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Maedhbh McGuckian, Paula Meehan, and Eiléan Ní Chuilleanáin.

GSC 40555. History of Sport and the Cold War

(3-0-3) Soares

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will explore the ways that sport reflected the political, ideological, social, economic and military struggle known as the Cold War. Sport permitted opportunities to defeat hated rivals or to develop competition more peacefully. It reflected the internal politics and societies in nations, and also illuminated relations among allies. Using a variety of readings, media accounts and film clips, this course will look at a number of crucial teams, athletes and events from the Cold War, including the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team, the controversial 1972 Olympic basketball final, “ping pong diplomacy”, Olympic boycotts, Martina Navratilova and other Eastern European tennis stars, East German figure skater Katarina Witt, Romanian gymnast Nadia Comaneci, the ferocious Soviet-Czechoslovakian hockey rivalry following the Soviet invasion of 1968, and more.

GSC 40556. Gender, Sexuality, and Colonization in Latin America

(3-0-3) Graubart

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will examine the historical construction of gendered roles in the Spanish colonial world. This will entail thinking about gender in the societies that “encountered” each other in the New World, and also thinking about how that encounter produced new forms of gendered relations. Among the questions we will consider: How was the conquest gendered? How did colonial society produce masculinity as well as femininity? What gendered forms of power were available to women? How did ethnicity and caste, as well as gender, determine people’s sense of themselves and their “others”? The course will look at a mixture of primary and secondary materials, including letters and chronicles written by men and women, testimony before the Spanish Inquisition, poetry, and novels. While there are no prerequisites for this seminar, some familiarity with colonial Latin American history will be helpful.

GSC 40557. Medieval Nobilities

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will introduce students to one of the major areas of historical investigation in Europe since 1945: the evolution and function of the hereditary élites now generally called “nobilities.” Although alien to the culture and legal system of the United States, an élite social category of this general type dominated the economic, political, social, and cultural life of every major European people and state throughout and often somewhat beyond the agricultural or pre-industrial era of its history—most commonly to about 1918—and may be seen as a characteristic feature of polities on the levels of chiefdom and agricultural state throughout the world. Thus some understanding of the phenomenon of nobility and its many variant forms is essential to an understanding of the history not only of Europe, but of the civilized world in general before the 20th century. The course will begin with an examination of both medieval and modern ideas of “nobility” (which designated at once an inherent condition, a legal status, and a social category), the words employed to express those ideas, the ways in which noble status could be acquired and lost, the attributes that might be used to express it (including heraldic emblems), and the approaches taken to the whole phenomenon by social, political, constitutional, and cultural historians of various schools. It will then examine the history of a few of the numerous different nobilities that developed in the countries of Catholic Europe between 400 and 1500, and finally examine what is currently known about such themes as noble privilege, power, wealth, and influence.

GSC 40558. American Feminist Fiction

(3-0-3) Brogan

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will read a number of works, by both women and men, which may be described as feminist fiction. In so doing, we will raise issues about the relation of aesthetics to politics, about the process of canonization, and about aesthetic integrity. Ultimately, we will also be examining the place of women within American culture during the 20th century—how it has changed, how it has remained the same. At the end of the course, students should feel that they have discovered a new body of exciting literature, as well as new ways of reading some of our best-known literature. Texts: Kate Chopin, The Awakening, Edith Wharton, The Age of Innocence, Zora Neale Hurston, Their Eyes Were Watching God, William Faulkner, The Sound and the Fury, F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Great Gatsby, Alice Walker, The Color Purple and The Temple of My Familiar; Toni Morrison,

Sula and Song of Solomon; possibly Elizabeth Dewberry Vaughn, Many Things Have Happened Since He Died. Requirements: Two papers, a midterm, and a final examination (25 percent each).

GSC 40559. Contemporary American Women Poets

(3-0-3) Brogan

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Although the range and productivity of American women writers over the last two centuries has been enormous, the proliferation of extremely accomplished and important women writers has virtually mushroomed in the last few decades, embracing leading poets (such as Elizabeth Bishop and Adrienne Rich), leading novelists (such as Alice Walker, Joyce Carol Oates, and Toni Morrison) and altogether new voices such as the Chicana poet Lorna Dee Cervantes, the Asian American novelist Amy Tan, and the Native American Susan Power (to name only a few). To narrow the range of this explosive development in American literature, we will primarily focus on the work of women written in this country after WW II, with special interest on the last two decades. In addition to a small sampling of a number of different writers to be found in our class reader, we will ultimately focus on seven writers: Elizabeth Bishop (poetry), Adrienne Rich (poetry and essays), June Jordan (poetry and essays), Amy Tan (fiction), Lorna Dee Cervantes (poetry), Susan Power (fiction), and Sandra Gilbert (poetry and essays).

GSC 40560. A Gendered Voice—The Poetry of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3) Nic Dhiarmada

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill, the foremost contemporary poet writing in Irish. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ni Dhomhnaill’s poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

GSC 40561. Gender and the Nineteenth-Century British Novel

(3-0-3) Cameron

Corequisite: GSC 27999

An exploration of the treatment of gender in the 19th-century British novel.

GSC 40562. Contemporary French and Francophone Fiction

(3-0-3) Perry

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Through recent fiction by Francophone writers of Muslim origins, this course will offer us an opportunity to understand and reflect critically upon contemporary issues affecting relations between Muslim and Western cultures. We will read Tahar Ben Jelloun from Morocco (Partir, 2006), Yasmina Khadra from Algeria (Les Sirènes de Bagdad, 2006), Salim Bachi from Algeria (Le Silence de Mahomet, 2008), Chahdortt Djavann from Iran (La Muette, 2008), and Atiq Rahimi from Afghanistan (Syngé sabour: Pierre de patience, 2008, Prix Goncourt). Apart from their literary merits that call for examination and appreciation, these novels raise key issues in our world today, including exile, immigration, post-colonialism, the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Islamic extremism and terrorism, gender and social disparities, and various forms of violence, especially toward women. They also demonstrate various attempts to engage Western readers, in particular through an original, literary approach to the Prophet Muhammad’s biography. Class taught in French. Students are expected to participate fully in class discussions and will be responsible for two essays (one with the opportunity to revise and rewrite) as well as one oral presentation (done in a group).

GSC 40600. Global Crime and Corruption

(2.5-0-3) Nordstrom

Corequisite: GSC 27999

As the world of the 21st century globalizes, so, too, does crime. Millions of people and trillions of dollars circulate in illicit economies worldwide. This represents power blocks larger and more powerful than many of the world's countries. This class will look at what constitutes the illegal today; who is engaged in crime and corruption; and what kinds of economic, political, and social powers they wield. It will also look at the societies and cultures of "out-laws." For example, internationalization has influenced crime in much the same ways that it has multinationals and nongovernmental organizations: criminal networks now span continents, forge trade agreements, and hone foreign policies with other criminal organizations, and set up sophisticated systems of information, exchange, and control. Anthropology—with its studies of cultures—provides a dynamic approach to the illegal: What customs inform law abiders and criminals? What values guide their actions? What behaviors shape their worlds? The course will explore the many kinds and levels of criminality and corruption: How do we consider the differences (or similarities) among, for example, drug and arms smugglers, white collar corruption, gem runners or modern day slavers, and governmental or multinational corporate crime? What impact does each have on our world and in our lives? What solutions exist? Class is interactive in nature, and in addition to the normal reading and writing, students will do an anthropological class project on a topic of their choice concerning global crime and corruption.

GSC 40601. Gender and Health

(2.5-0-3) Smith

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course looks at the intersection of gender, health policy, and health care organization around the world. Some of the issues to be discussed include medicalization of the female body; critical medical anthropology; the politics of reproduction; social production of illness and healing; politics, poverty, and health; national and international health; and development policies.

GSC 40602. Judicial Politics

(2.5-0-3) Colucci

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course examines the effect of the legal system on American politics, government, and society. We begin by reviewing the institutions, actors, and processes of the legal system, focusing on the institutional and individual influences on judicial decision making. In the second part of the semester, we closely analyze the political consequences of legal decisions in areas such as criminal law, race and education—including desegregation, school finance, and school choice; abortion; the death penalty; and homosexual rights. We conclude by evaluating the extent to which courts can and should be expected to bring about social and political change.

GSC 40603. Space, Place, and Landscape

(3-0-3) Rotman

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will explore human relationships to the built environment and the complex ways in which people consciously and unconsciously shape the world around them. Cultural landscapes are not empty spaces, but rather places we imbue with meaning and significance. We are particularly interested in the ways in which the built environment has worked as an agent of cultural power as well as how social relations (notably class, gender, and ethnicity) have been codified and reproduced through landscapes. We will examine how people perceive, experience, and contextualize social spaces at the intersection of symbolic processes, senses of place, memory, and identity formation, as well as how these change through time and across space. As an interdisciplinary endeavor, we will draw from history, geography, art, environmental science, architecture, landscape studies, anthropology, and urban planning, among other disciplines. Students will undertake a significant original research project that investigates the human experience through space, place, and landscape.

GSC 41103. Cinema Ideologies Lab

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: GSC 40103

Required lab that accompanies Cinema Ideologies.

GSC 41113. Sex and Gender in Cinema Lab

(0-3-0)

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 40113

During the lab times, certain films will be viewed for further discussion in class.

GSC 41251. Theatre and Social Activism

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will explore the potential of theatre as social activism and as a vehicle for social change. The course will involve two modes of study: (1) investigation of a variety of techniques and approaches to creating activist, "grassroots" theatre (e.g., looking work by artist/activists like Augusto Boal ("Theatre of the Oppressed", Bread and Puppet Theatre, ACT/UP, etc.) and (2) creation of original theatre pieces addressing social concerns in the local community (for example, students might focus on creating theatre centered on local environmental issues, the living wage campaign, the Michiana Peace Coalition, etc). The class will culminate in public performances of our own "activist theatre," with the aim of making an impact and effecting change through the performing arts.

GSC 41378. Media Stardom and Celebrity Culture Lab

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 40378

Certain presentations will be viewed for further discussion in class.

GSC 41502. Honors Seminar: Hitchcock Lab

(0-2-0)

Corequisite: GSC 43502

This course aims to teach honors students research methods, project development and advanced writing techniques through an examination of Alfred Hitchcock. Students will see numerous Hitchcock films and TV shows, and read and research extensively in the literature on Hitchcock. Students will consider different approaches to Hitchcock, including auteurist, generic, feminist, psychoanalytic, and queer methodologies. Students will also consider the work of Hitchcock collaborators, including James Stewart, Cary Grant, and Bernard Hermann. By invitation only.

GSC 41503. Film and Television Theory Lab

(0-0-0)

Prerequisite: (FTT 30101 OR FTT 30102)

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 40503

This course offers an introduction to the philosophical, aesthetic, cultural, and historical issues that inform current scholarship and production in film and television, including auteurist, psychoanalytic, semiotic, and cultural studies approaches to film, with attention to cinema ideology, including issues of gender and sexuality.

GSC 43101. Philosophy in a Different Voice: Feminist Perspectives on Knowledge

(3-0-3)

Traditional epistemology and philosophy of science analyze the prospects and conditions of knowledge in a very abstract, general way—as though our individual characteristics (gender, race, etc.) and the sociopolitical situation in which we find ourselves have no bearing on such knowledge. In contrast, this course will consider such issues as the epistemic resources and liabilities of particular social locations, the ideological role of epistemic norms, and the relation between social values and objectivity.

GSC 43102. The Ethics of Gender

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

We observe gender differences between men and women, but these differences vary over time and place, depending on the customs and practices of different societies and depending on the choices individuals make. To the degree that gender differences are a product of social and individual choice, we can raise the question, as we will in this course, of what, if any, gender differences, we should have in society.

This question is of particular ethical significance in light of our commitment to the equality of men and women.

GSC 43103. Seminar: Feminism, Print, and Spectacle in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

How feminist cultures of the 20th century have engaged print culture and visual culture in imaginative ways to carve a space for discussions of women's issues.

GSC 43201. Families and Their Interrelations with Gender and Work

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

A consideration of the part gender plays in family processes like the couple formation through cohabitation and/or marriage, having and rearing children, division of labor and the post-children era.

GSC 43251. Contemporary Political Philosophy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will critically evaluate the major political ideals of our time, namely, libertarian justice, welfare liberal justice, socialist justice, and feminist justice, with a particular focus on how feminist justice presents an important challenge to the other ideals that needs to be met. We will further consider how these political ideals apply to a range of practical problems on the assumption that addressing practical problems can sometimes lead us to revise the political theories we hold.

GSC 43301. Seminar: Narratives of Modern Art

(3-0-3) Pyne

Corequisite: GSC 27999

Permission required. Seminar on specific subjects in 19th-century and 20th-century European art.

GSC 43451. Sociology of Divorce and Remarriage

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course describes the adversity and reorganization of family life through marital discord, divorce, nonmarital births, single parenthood, and remarriage, with a particular focus on how these processes affect children. Through weekly lectures, readings, and discussions, students will become familiar with current research and policy related to these topics.

GSC 43453. Social Movements in Global Perspectives

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This seminar explores how increasing global integration affects political participation and the prospects for democracy. We will briefly review the broader research literature on the sociology of social movements within nations as a first step in our consideration of the relationships between "globalization" and social movements. Seminar discussions will explore how transnational movements compare with those operating at local and national levels. Readings will reflect a range of cases and analytical perspectives. We will explore relationships between movements and political institutions, the factors affecting the abilities of relatively powerless groups to mobilize resources and build coalitions, and the ideological and cultural dimensions of transnational mobilization. Considerable attention will be placed on the contemporary global justice movement as we explore these questions, and methodological issues relevant to this field of study will be addressed throughout the course.

GSC 43500. Images of Women in American Cinema

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In viewing any film, we must ask ourselves what the filmmakers want us to think. To answer that question for a specific genre, we will be studying portrayals of 20th-century women in film and how these images have evolved in reaction to, and as a backlash against, the modern feminist movement.

GSC 43501. Seminar: Topics in Medieval Art

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The topic and format of this course will vary from year to year.

GSC 43502. Honors Seminar: Hitchcock

(2.5-2-3) Ohmer

Corequisite: GSC 41502

This course aims to teach honors students research methods, project development, and advanced writing techniques through an examination of the films of Alfred Hitchcock. Students will see numerous Hitchcock films and TV shows, and read and research extensively in the literature on Hitchcock. Students will consider different approaches to Hitchcock, including auteurism, genre studies, feminist and psychoanalytic theories, reception studies and industrial histories. Films we will screen include Rear Window, Psycho, North by Northwest, Blackmail, The 39 Steps, Rope, and Rebecca. Corequisite: FTT 41602 For FTT Honors students and students eligible for honors, by permission of instructor.

GSC 43549. Race, Gender, and Women of Color

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This seminar analyzes dominant American beliefs about the significance of race and gender primarily through the focusing lens of the experiences of women of color in the United States. How did intersecting ideologies of race and gender attempt to define and limit the lives of women of color as well as other Americans? How have women of color responded to and reinterpreted white American ideas about their identity to develop their own self-defenses and ideologies?

GSC 43550. The Meaning of Things

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The Meaning of Things asks how objects as diverse as a ND class ring, a pair of jeans, a lava lamp, or an iPod acquire meaning and value. This seminar will introduce students to a range of practices relating to consumption in American history. We will investigate the gendered aspects of production, marketing, buying and using goods as these impact not only on gender, but also on the construction of a range of identities. This will lay the foundation for students to write substantive individual research papers on a "thing" of their choice.

GSC 43551. The Ethics of Gender and Race

(2.5-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course is concerned with two central ideas—equal opportunity and discrimination. It focuses on what constitutes equal opportunity with respect to gender and race and how best to achieve it, as well as what constitutes sexual and racial discrimination and how best to avoid it. It begins by considering arguments of those who hold that feminist causes discriminate against men and that affirmative action programs discriminates against whites, and then considers opposing arguments. The goal of the course is to help students make up their own minds about which views on these topics are most morally defensible.

GSC 43600. Global Sociology

(2.5-0-3) Smith

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course introduces students to global perspectives in sociology. We consider how sociological analyses help us understand variation in people's experiences and life chances as well as larger processes of social change. We examine the history of the world economic and political system and its implications for people today. We consider how the experiences of women, indigenous peoples, and Third World countries have been shaped by global-level institutions and structures. Social movements challenging economic globalization—fundamentalist movements—are examined as we attempt to understand how global policies and practices shape conflicts in local and national settings. The course is designed for students who simply want to learn how the World Bank, IMF, and United Nations are impacting the experiences of people around the world as well as for those who expect to do further research in the field.

GSC 43650. Self, Society, and Environment

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course focuses on social psychological aspects of relationships between humans and the natural environment. Issues include how humans interact with different environments, symbolic transformations of environments, and competing accounts or claims concerning human-environment relationships. The course is framed in a sociology knowledge perspectives and touches on alternative ways of envisioning and valuing individual and institutional perspectives on human-environment relationships with an eye toward implications for social change.

GSC 43651. Divorce and Remarriage

(2.5-0-3) Sobolewski

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course describes the adversity and reorganization of family life through marital discord, divorce, nonmarital births, single parenthood, and remarriage, with a particular focus on how these processes affect children. Through weekly lectures, readings, and discussions, students will become familiar with current research and policy related to these topics.

GSC 43652. Families, Employment, and Their Interrelations with Gender

(2.5-0-3) Aldous

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The purpose of the course is to look at how the two genders' relations in the paid labor force are affecting family behaviors, and the reverse. The expectations we have learned from childhood, and the education we are receiving about the tasks men and women should do with respect to household and childcare, affect the kind of jobs we look for. The kinds of jobs people seek and obtain vary according to gender, even though women and men have the same education. Recently, however, women have been obtaining more education than men, but they still tend to go into jobs that pay less money and have fewer opportunities for promotions than those of men. Women continue to be the persons most involved in the household work and childcare. Thus, as we will learn, women with families tend to have less freedom and less opportunity to choose applying within a range of jobs, and women's wages even within the same jobs tend to be less. This course gives you the opportunity to discuss the assigned reading material and to see whether it applies to a woman and man job holder, each in a different partnership, whom you will be interviewing for an interview report. This latter report will be based upon your initial study of the research that is done on some aspect of family life and paid work relations. The latter would include such programs as family leave, varying hours on the job, childcare opportunities, and flexibility of job requirements. All in all, the course can be a demanding one but one that also expands your perspectives on the interrelations of family life, employment requirements, and opportunities as they are affected by gender.

GSC 45001. Gender Studies Senior Internship

In collaboration with the gender studies internship advisor, students choose an organization or business in the South Bend area for which they serve as a nonpaid intern. In addition to performing 6–8 hours of internship service per week for their chosen internship site, students write either a research paper which analyzes the roles of gender, sexuality, and/or intersectionality at the internship site and in the broader profession to which it belongs, or propose and complete an applied project that meets a particular need at their internship site. This course may be taken in either the fall or spring semester of the senior year. The hours per week may be spread across several days, or completed in one long block. The student will be expected to complete a minimum of 80 total hours. This course fulfills the senior capstone project requirement for gender studies supplementary majors, or can be taken as an elective in either the gender studies supplementary major or the gender studies minor.

GSC 46501. Seminar: Topics in Medieval Art

(2.5-0-3)

The topic and format of this course will vary from year to year.

GSC 47000. Special Studies

(7-0-3)

Special studies are available with gender studies-affiliated faculty.

GSC 48001. Senior Thesis

(3-0-3)

In collaboration with the gender studies academic advisor, students choose a gender studies faculty member who will guide them through the semester-long composition of a senior thesis. The senior thesis is an original and professional piece of scholarly writing based on the student's interdisciplinary research in their primary and supplementary majors. The gender studies senior thesis may build upon, but cannot replicate, the work done for a senior thesis or paper in another major or course. This course fulfills the senior capstone project requirement for gender studies supplementary majors. It can only be taken in the fall semester of the senior year. In the spring semester of the junior year, interested students should speak to the gender studies academic advisor about planning their thesis topic and research and securing a faculty advisor. For the thesis to be accepted by gender studies, the minimum page requirement is 30 pages.

GSC 50100. Women and Christian Origins

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

The course is a survey of the New Testament and other literature from its context from a feminist perspective. It will delineate patterns of gender in the theology and structure of these works, attempt to retrieve the participation of women in the movements behind them, and consider the impact of the texts and their contexts in gender relations, sexual politics and arrangements of race and class in the 21st century. Participation, three short or one short and one longer paper.

GSC 50549. Feminine in Irish Literary and Oral-Vernacular Tradition

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

This course addresses issues concerning the representation of the feminine in Irish literary and oral-vernacular tradition. It treats of the historical displacement and re-interpretation of the figure of the autonomous "Otherworld" female in literature and oral narrative. In particular it examines a series of texts from pre-modern oral narrative tradition featuring the figures of cailleach/hag and bean feasa/wise woman with a view to understanding their significance for the "native" ear. The potential significance of such texts as therapeutic resources for the modern reader is also considered.

GSC 51104. Cinema, Gender, and Space Lab

(2.5-2-0)

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 53104

This course will explore various configurations of cinema, gender, and space in American film. We will consider the space of the cinema screen and its gendering through framing and mise-en-scene. We will also consider the space of the cinema itself, as a site of amusement, and its shifting gendering. We will examine how various spaces (the city, the department store, the office, the home, the apartment, the West) are represented in film and how those spaces are gendered.

GSC 53100. Philosophy in a Different Voice: Feminist Perspectives on Knowledge

(3-0-3)

Traditional epistemology and philosophy of science analyze the prospects and conditions of knowledge in a very abstract, general way—as though our individual characteristics (gender, race, etc.) and the sociopolitical situation in which we find ourselves have no bearing on such knowledge. In contrast, this course will consider such issues as the epistemic resources and liabilities of particular social locations, the ideological role of epistemic norms, and the relation between social values and objectivity.

GSC 53101. U.S. Women's Gender History

(3-0-3)

This colloquium is intended to serve as an introduction to the field of U.S. women's and gender history. It will provide a basic background to some of the major current methodological approaches and topical interests in the field, as well as acquainting the student with the way approaches to women's history have developed and changed over the past 35 years. Although the course will be organized chronologically, from colonial times through the 20th century, the main focus will be historiographical. We will not attempt to "cover" all the important areas of U.S. women's history. Students who wish to master this field, however, will emerge from the class with the requisite analytical tools to begin that task.

GSC 53102. Feminist Theatre Performance

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we'll investigate the history and practice of feminist theatre. The seminar will focus not only on feminist playwrights (such as Caryl Churchill, Sarah Daniels, and Pam Gems in England, and Maria Irene Fornes, Paula Vogel, Claire Chafee, Eve Ensler in the United States), but also on feminist theories of the theater and on theoretical and critical responses to the plays we read (i.e. Elin Diamond, Sue-Ellen Case, Peggy Phelan, etc.). The course will pay particular attention to feminist theatre by women of color (i.e. Adrienne Kennedy, Ntozake Shange, Suzan-Lori Parks, Cherrie Moraga, Coco Fusco, and Diana Son) and to intersections between feminist theatre and queer theatre (The Five Lesbian Brothers, Tony Kushner, Charles Ludlam, Kate Bornstein). We will at all times keep our texts in context, and look closely at the processes and practices that distinguish "feminist" theater (as a stage product, and not merely a playtext) from "nonfeminist" theater. We'll also devote significant attention to feminist performance artists such as Holly Hughes, Karen Finley, Robbie McCauley, and Laurie Anderson. The course will include several translated texts; Ph.D. in literature students will be required to read texts in the original language if they have proficiency in that language. In addition, they will be encouraged to pursue a final project that incorporates research in one of their language proficiencies (for example, a student proficient in French will be directed to research French feminist theatres). The seminar will require each student to offer a presentation of original research, and to write an article length paper on a topic of their choice.

GSC 53103. Contemporary Political Philosophy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: GSC 27999

In this course, we will critically evaluate the major political ideals of our time, namely, libertarian justice, welfare liberal justice, socialist justice, and feminist justice, with a particular focus on how feminist justice presents an important challenge to the other ideals that needs to be met. We will further consider how these political ideals apply to a range of practical problems on the assumption that addressing practical problems can sometimes lead us to revise the political theories we hold.

GSC 53104. Cinema, Gender, and Space

(2.5-0-3) Wojcik

Prerequisite: (FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101)

Corequisite: GSC 27999; GSC 51104

This course will explore various configurations of cinema, gender, and space in American film. We will consider the space of the cinema screen and its gendering through framing and mise-en-scene. We will also consider the space of the cinema itself, as a site of amusement, and its shifting gendering. We will examine how various spaces (the city, the department store, the office, the home, the apartment, the West) are represented in film and how those spaces are gendered.

GSC 53500. Science and Social Values

(3-0-3)

Should science be value-free, or should it be shaped by the needs and ideals of the society that supports it? If the former, how can scientists shaped by society contribute to it, and what claim to the resources of the society can scientists legitimately make? If the latter, how can scientists still claim to be objective?

GSC 53651. Global Sociology

(3-0-3)

The course is designed as a broad overview of sociological analysis that extends beyond traditionally accepted national and local boundaries. It provides a perspective on the discipline as one that seeks to understand human society as a nested collection of interdependent societies. In particular, the course draws from world systems theory and institutional approaches—as well as from related disciplines such as anthropology—to consider how the "development project" of the 20th century evolved over time. The impacts of global economic integration on cultural and institutional change, gender relations, inequality, and on changing identities and forms of collective action (including social movements) are phenomena we explore in the course. The course is designed for students who simply want to learn how the World Bank, IMF, and United Nations are impacting the experiences of people around the world as well as for those who expect to do further research in the field.

Hesburgh Program in Public Service

HESB 20000. Introduction to American Government

(3-0-3) Ayala; Campbell

This course provides students with an overview of the American political system. Topics include the presidency, Congress, the Supreme Court, bureaucracy, separation of powers, federalism, political parties, interest groups, the public policy process, voting, public opinion, and participation. This course cannot be taken if you have already taken POLS 10100.

HESB 20001. American Politics

(3-0-3) Wolbrecht

Corequisite: POLS 22100

This course provides students with an overview of the American political system. Topics include the presidency, Congress, the Supreme Court, bureaucracy, separation of powers, federalism, political parties, interest groups, the public policy process, voting, public opinion, and participation.

HESB 20002. Principles of Microeconomics

(3-0-3)

An introduction to economics, with particular attention to the pricing mechanism, competitive and monopolistic markets, government regulation of the economy, labor-management relations and programs, income determination and public policy, trade and the international economy.

HESB 20010. Introduction to Public Policy

(3-0-3) De Ridder

The Hesburgh Program in Public Service prepares students for an active and informed life in public service, and HESB 20010 is the gateway course to the Hesburgh interdisciplinary minor. This course explores the character and substance of public policy making in the United States. We shall consider why and how government responds to some issues (and not others). We shall examine how public problems are conceptualized in the public arena and focus our attention to the elements of the policy process and its operation, and students will develop some knowledge of substantive areas of public policy. Finally, we will turn our attention to leadership to link a conception of effective and ethical public service with our analytic understanding of the policy process. The course will conclude with students participating in policy hearings based on their research on substantive public policy controversies.

HESB 20210. U.S. Latino Spirituality

(3-0-3) Elizondo

U.S. Latino spirituality is one of the youngest spiritualities among the great spiritual traditions of humanity. The course will explore the indigenous, African, and European origins of U.S. Latino spirituality through the devotions, practices, feasts, and rituals of the people.

HESB 30100. Methods of Sociological Research

(3-0-3) Guntz; Williams

Limited to sociology majors. Begins with discussion of scientific method, conceptualization of research problems and measurement. The course then explores the dominant modes of social science research: field work and participant observation, survey and interviewing, experimental designs, and evaluation research.

HESB 30101. Statistics for Social Research

(3-0-3) Peaslee

This course is designed to show students how to interpret and critically evaluate statistics commonly used to describe, predict, and evaluate in the social sciences, as well as many areas of the business and/or medical world. The focus is on a conceptual understanding of what the statistic does, means and what assumptions are made from it. Hands-on experience in using data analysis is part of the course.

HESB 30102. Intermediate Economic Theory—Micro

(3-0-3) Betson

An examination of the language and analytical tools of microeconomics, emphasizing the functional relationship between the factor and product markets and resource allocation.

HESB 30103. Quantitative Political Analysis

(3-0-3)

Students in this course will learn to understand the most common statistical techniques used in political science and acquire the skills necessary to use these techniques and interpret their results. Mastery of these techniques is essential for understanding research on public opinion and voting behavior, electoral studies, and comparative research on the causes of democracy. For each topic, students will read works to orient them to key issues and debates. They will learn the reasoning behind the statistical analysis in these readings and create their own spreadsheet programs to execute such analyses. They will then download and clean datasets actually used in the published research, replicate selected analyses from these readings using a statistical package, and write short papers evaluating the inferences defended in the published research.

HESB 30104. Statistics for Economics

(3-0-3) Betson

This course seeks to introduce the student to the principles of probability and statistical theory appropriate for the study of economics. The emphasis of the course will be on hypothesis testing and regression analysis.

HESB 30230. Religion and Social Life

(3-0-3) Christiano

How does social life influence religion? How does religion influence society? What is religion's social significance in a complex society like ours? Is religion's significance declining? This course will consider these and other questions by exploring the great variety in social expressions of religion. The course examines the social bases of churches, sects, and cults, and it focuses on contemporary religion in the United States.

HESB 30232. Morality and Modernity

(3-0-3) Solomon

Corequisite: PHIL 22415

An examination of many of the deepest contemporary moral disputes that rest on philosophical disagreements about the nature of modernity. These disputes focus particularly on the modern commitments to individualism and the idea of progress.

HESB 30233. Philosophy of Religion

(3-0-3)

A discussion of some basic issues: the nature of the philosophy of religion, the notion of God, grounds for belief and disbelief in God, faith, revelation, religious language and knowledge, verification, immortality.

HESB 30237. Medical Ethics

(3-0-3) Solomon

An exploration from the point of view of ethical theory of a number of ethical problems in contemporary biomedicine. Topics discussed will include euthanasia, abortion, the allocation of scarce medical resources, truth-telling in the doctor-patient relationship, the right to medical care and informed consent, and human experimentation.

HESB 30244. World Religions and Catholicism in Dialogue

(3-0-3) Gorski

A theological exploration of Hinduism, Buddhism, Taoism, Judaism, Islam, and the relationship of Christianity to those religions. The goal of this exploration is specifically (1) to set forth the essential characteristics of the world's great religions, (2) to disengage the essential differences between Christianity and the other world religions, (3) to identify the distinctiveness of Catholicism within the family of Christian traditions, and (4) to examine historically and systematically the Christian theological appraisal of other world religions. Thus, the course will enable the students to gain a deeper understanding of Christianity by “passing over” into and experiencing as well as appraising the different major religious traditions of the world. To enhance the learning experience, the course will use the BBC film series titled The Long Search. Each of these hour-long films focuses on perspectives of the world’s major religions.

HESB 30245. Political Theory

(3-0-3) Villa

Corequisite: POLS 22600

This course is an introduction to political theory as a tradition of discourse and as a way of thinking about politics. The course surveys selected works of political theory and explores some of the recurring themes and questions that political theory addresses. This introductory course fulfills the political theory breadth requirement for the political science major.

HESB 30246. Science, Technology, and Society

(3-0-3) Peterson

This course introduces the interdisciplinary field of science and technology studies. Our concern will be with science and technology (including medicine) as social and historical, i.e., as human, phenomena. We shall examine the divergent roots of contemporary science and technology, and the similarities and (sometimes surprising) differences in their methods and goals. The central theme of the course will be the ways in which science and technology interact with other aspects of society, including the effects of technical and theoretical innovation in bringing about social change, and the social shaping of science and technology themselves by cultural, economic and political forces. Because science/society interactions so frequently lead to public controversy and conflict, we shall also explore what resources are available to mediate such conflicts in an avowedly democratic society.

HESB 30248. Catholics in America

(3-0-3) Cummings

Since 1850, Roman Catholics have constituted the single largest religious denomination in the United States. This course explores what the presence of Catholics has meant for the American experience, focusing on themes of church/state separation, religion and politics, education, and social reform. We will also examine how the American context has transformed the practice of Catholicism, with attention to ethnicity, gender, region, race and class as variables that have shaped the American Catholic experience. Assigned readings range from excerpts of anti-Catholic publications to first-hand accounts written by American Catholics from the colonial period to the present. In addition we will study the representation of Catholics in American film, themes of Catholic fiction, material culture relating to Catholic devotional life and the sacraments, and the shifting position of American Catholics in the universal Roman Catholic Church.

HESB 30249. Feminist and Multicultural Theologies

(3-0-3) Hilkert

An exploration of how the voices of women have helped to reshape theological discourse and to bring to light new dimensions of the Christian tradition. Using the writings of feminist, womanist, Latina, mujerista, Asian, and Third World theologians, the course will focus on the significance of gender and social location in understanding the nature and sources of theology, theological anthropology, Christology/soteriology, the mystery of God, and women’s spirituality.

HESB 30250. Utopias and Dystopias

(3-0-3) Mendham

“Utopia” is a term coined by Thomas More, probably as a pun suggesting that the “good place” is “no place.” Exploring utopian traditions in politics and political thought reveals a jarring contrast between the noblest human aspirations and the most devastating outcomes. Even so, some students may find grounds for hope in certain utopian traditions, since these include not only the dozens of well-intentioned schemes which quickly led to slaughter or starvation, but also some enduring and simple communities such as the Amish. Other students may come to the more sobering conclusion that dramatic social progress is impossible. But even for them, there may be much to learn from the portrayals of shocking corruption and degradation in “dystopias” for it may still be possible that, if certain social and cultural trends are left unchecked, society can get far worse. Both utopias and dystopias tend to focus especially on two aspects of society: sexuality and economics which according to some, are the most in need of radical reform, while according to others, are the most dangerous when altered from their traditional patterns. Utopias and dystopias help refine our idea of what excellence and depravity in society look like, how far progress and decline are possible, and what means tend toward these conditions. This course draws from political theory, history, literature, and film.

HESB 30251. Ecology, Ethics, and Economics

(3-0-3) Sayre

An examination, through literature and reasoned argument, of (1) social values behind the economic excesses that have led to our ecological crisis and (2) alternative values by which the crisis might be alleviated.

HESB 30252. Christianity and World Religions

(3-0-3) Malkovsky

The purpose of this course is to introduce the student to the basic teachings and spiritualities of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Islam. We will approach these religions both historically and theologically, seeking to determine where they converge and differ from Christianity on such perennial issues as death, meaning, the nature of the ultimate Mystery, the overcoming of suffering, etc. We will also examine some traditional and contemporary Catholic and Protestant approaches to religious pluralism. Our own search to know how the truth and experience of other faiths is related to Christian faith will be guided by the insights of important Catholic contemplatives who have entered deeply in the spirituality of other traditions. By course end we ought to have a greater understanding of what is essential to Christian faith and practice as well as a greater appreciation of the spiritual paths of others.

HESB 30253. Popular Culture and Religious Change

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the relationship between popular culture and religious change, including traditional religions, new religious movements, and other cultural and leisure activities that have meaningful, religious elements. Themes include the adaptation of cultural productions for religious purpose and practice among both religious denominations and popular culture quasi-religions (e.g. Star Trek fandom), the dynamics of conversions between religions, all in a context of religious and lifestyle pluralism, with both international and domestic case studies.

HESB 30254. Moral Limits of a Free Market

(1-0-1) Wilber

This class is designed to investigate questions such as: Do markets need ethical standards? Do markets make us moral? Should a market for transplant organs be allowed? What should we think about sweatshops?

HESB 30255. Original Intent and Freedom of Religion

(3-0-3)

The focus of this course is the constitution as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. It covers landmark constitutional cases.

HESB 30256. Human Rights and Human Wrongs

(3-0-3) Verdeja

This course will examine theories of human rights and their applications and implications for international politics.

HESB 30257. Contemporary Political Islam

(3-0-3) Shahin

This course is designed to provide students with an understanding of the phenomenon of political Islam in the Arab and Muslim worlds. It examines the reasons, implications, and consequences of the reassertion of Islam in today’s politics. The first part of the course provides a thorough analysis of the Islamic order and the model(s) that inspires modern Islamist activists. The second part critically examines the ideas of the main ideologues of contemporary Islamic movements. The third part discusses the approaches to the understanding of contemporary political Islam and the Islamic movements and presents cases studies of mainstream and radical Islamic movements in a number of Arab and Muslim countries. Finally, the course concludes with a critical analysis of the future of political Islam and its relations with the West.

HESB 30258. Christianity and the Modern State

(3-0-3) McCumbers

In the Gospels, Jesus instructs Christians to give to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God, the things that are God's. However, what exactly it is that believers owe to Caesar and to God has been a source of both political and religious division for more than two millennia. Most of the major political thinkers in the western tradition have commented on this issue, and in this course we will evaluate critically the diverse solutions that have been offered to questions such as: What does it mean to have a separation of church and state? Is achieving a separation of church and state possible or desirable? What should be done when one's religious and civic duties come into conflict? The reading list for the course will include selections from thinkers such as St. Augustine, Machiavelli, Luther, Calvin, Rousseau, Jefferson, Madison, Washington, Hume, Lincoln, Tocqueville, and Rawls as well as documents from Vatican Council II, papal encyclicals, and U.S. Supreme Court cases. In addition to learning about this issue that is fundamental to the study of politics both past and present, students will be encouraged to develop their ability to think and write critically through paper assignments and class discussion.

HESB 30400. American Congress

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100) OR (POLS 20100) OR (GOVT 10100) OR (GOVT 20100)

This class will expose the student to the practical workings of the U.S. Congress, some major theories attempting to explain those workings, and some of the methods and materials needed to do research on Congress. It will place the study of Congress in the context of democratic theory, and in particular the problem of the way in which the institution across time grapples with the problem of the common good.

HESB 30401. Presidential Leadership

(3-0-3) Arnold

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100) OR (POLS 20100) OR (GOVT 10100) OR (GOVT 20100)

This course examines the role of the presidency in the American regime and its change over time. Particular attention will be given to expectations about presidential leadership through the course of American political history. Beginning with questions about the original design and role of the presidency, the course turns to consideration of the role of leadership styles for change and continuity in American politics. Finally, cases of presidential leadership are studied to comprehend the way leadership and political context interact.

HESB 30410. The United States, 1900–45

(3-0-3) Blantz

The purpose of this course is to study the political, diplomatic, economic, social and cultural development of the United States from 1900 to 1945. The principal topics to be investigated will be the Progressive Period legislation of Presidents Theodore Roosevelt, William Taft, and Woodrow Wilson, the causes and effects of World War I, the cultural developments of the 1920s, the causes of the Wall Street Crash and Great Depression, the New Deal legislation of President Franklin Roosevelt, the diplomacy of the interwar period, and the home front during World War II.

HESB 30422. Introduction to Social Problems

(3-0-3)

Analysis of selected problems in American society such as crime, narcotic addiction, alcoholism, delinquency, racial and ethnic conflict, prostitution, and others. Discussions, debates, films, tapes, and readings.

HESB 30426. Today's Gender Roles

(3-0-3) Aldous

Current changes in male and female roles and the reasons for these changes are examined. Existing gender differences, various explanations for them and proposals for change are discussed and evaluated.

HESB 30427. American Political Parties

(3-0-3) Wolbrecht

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A) OR (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A)

Political parties play many vital roles in American politics: They educate potential voters about political processes, policy issues, and civic duties. They mobilize citizens into political activity and involvement. They provide vital information about public debates. They control the choices—candidates and platforms that voters face at the ballot box. They influence and organize the activities of government officials. Most importantly, by providing a link between government and the governed, they are a central mechanism of representation. These roles—how well they are performed, what bias exists, how they shape outcomes, how they have changed over time—have consequences for the working of the American political system.

HESB 30437. Constitutional Law

(3-0-3) Kommers

This course examines the main principles of American Constitutional law, the process of constitutional interpretation, and the role of the Supreme Court in the American political system. Topics covered are presidential war powers, congressional—executive relations, free speech, church-state relations, the right to life (abortion, right to die, and death penalty), race and gender discrimination, and the American federal system. A good deal of attention is given over to recent personnel changes on the Supreme Court and the extent to which these changes are reflected in the court's opinions. A background in American national government is desirable.

HESB 30438. Social Movements

(3-0-3)

How is social change possible? This is one of the central questions for the study of social movements, as well as the organizing theme of this course. In this course we will consider the ways in which different sociological theories of social movements have asked and answered this question, paying particular attention to theories of identity, emotion, and networks.

HESB 30449. Constitutional Interpretation

(3-0-3) Barber

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A) OR (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A)

Americans have always debated Supreme Court opinions on specific constitutional questions involving the powers of government and the rights of individuals and minorities. The leading objective of this course is to acquaint students with the basic issues of constitutional interpretation and to show how they influence questions involving constitutional rights and powers and the scope of judicial review.

HESB 30451. Leadership, Ethics, and Social Responsibility

(3-0-3) Brandenberger

This course examines leadership and empowerment issues from multidisciplinary perspectives, focusing on the role of the leader within organizations that promote service, social action, or other forms of social responsibility. Alternative models of leadership are explored, with attention to value and moral implications.

HESB 30467. Information Security

(3-0-3) Chapple

This course provides students with a working knowledge of information security topics through a focus on best practices, applications and implementation strategies. Students will learn the fundamental principles of information security and explore contemporary topics in the field, including access control methodologies, business continuity/disaster recovery planning, firewalls, network security, operating system security, intrusion detection, cryptography, and incident handling.

HESB 30472. Mexican American History

(3-0-3) Rodriguez

Corequisite: HIST 32621

This course is an introductory survey of Mexican American history in the United States. Primarily focused on events after the Texas revolution and annexation of the American Southwest, we will consider the problems the Spanish and Mexican settlers faced in their new homeland, as well as the mass migration of Anglo-Americans into the region following the annexation. Throughout the course, we will explore the changing nature of Mexican American U.S. citizenship. Other themes and topics examined will include immigration, the growth of agriculture in Texas and California, internal migration, urbanization, discrimination, segregation, language and cultural maintenance, and the development of a U.S.-based Mexican American politics and culture. Although primarily focused on the American Southwest and California, this course also highlights the long history of Mexican American life and work in the Great Lakes and Midwestern United States. We will conclude with the recent history of Mexican and Latin American migration to the United States after 1965, and the changing nature of Mexican American identity and citizenship within this context.

HESB 30473. U.S. Foreign Policy to 1945

(3-0-3) Brady

This course covers the main developments in American foreign relations from the Spanish-American War in 1898 through World War II. It traces the emergence of the United States as a major world power and examines in some detail how the United States became involved in the two world wars. A recurring theme will be the major traditions in America foreign policy and the ways in which these traditions influenced policy makers in the early years of the “American Century.”

HESB 30480. Labor and America Since 1945

(3-0-3) Graff

This course explores the relationship between workers and the labor movement to American politics and culture since 1945. The United States emerged from World War II as the strongest global power, and its citizens subsequently enjoyed a long postwar economic boom that created what we might call the first truly middle-class society in world history. At the heart of that new society was the American labor movement, those unions like the United Auto Workers and the United Steel Workers who ensured that at least some of the postwar profits made it into the wallets of workers and their families. Today, however, unions represent only 8 percent of workers in the private sector. What accounts for the decline of organized labor since the 1950s? What has the decline of the labor movement meant for workers specifically, and the American economy and politics more broadly? How and why have popular perceptions of unions changed over time? What has been the relationship of organized labor to the civil rights movement, feminism, and modern conservatism? What is “globalization” and what has been its impact upon American workers and their unions? Through an exploration of historical scholarship, memoirs, polemical writings, and Hollywood films, this course will try to answer these questions. Students interested in politics, economic development, international relations, social justice, human rights, peace studies, or mass culture are particularly welcome.

HESB 30484. Intermediate Economic Theory—Macroeconomics

(3-0-3)

An extensive examination of macroeconomics, with particular reference to the determination of economic growth, national income, employment, and general price level.

HESB 30486. Introduction to Political Economy

(3-0-3) Wolfson

The course is an introduction to the “other” side of economics: heterodox economics or political economy. Political economy perspectives include Marxian, Post Keynesian, radical, institutionalist, feminist, and other approaches. The course will also investigate the theoretical and social consequences of different approaches, and how policies and institutional changes that promote social justice and human dignity can be formulated in our current economic environment.

HESB 30487. Population Dynamics

(3-0-3) Williams

Demography, the science of population, is concerned with virtually everything that influences, or can be influenced by, population size, distribution, processes, structure, or characteristics. This course pays particular attention to the causes and consequences of population change. Changes in fertility, mortality, migration, technology, lifestyle, and culture have dramatically affected the United States and the other nations of the world. These changes have implications for a number of areas: hunger, the spread of illness and disease, environmental degradation, health services, household formation, the labor force, marriage and divorce, care for the elderly, birth control, poverty, urbanization, business marketing strategies, and political power. An understanding of these is important as business, government, and individuals attempt to deal with the demands of the changing population.

HESB 30488. The Internet and Society

(3-0-3) Monaghan

This course will spend the semester studying the impact the World Wide Web has had on several key areas of our society, including communications, commerce, marketing, productivity, education, collaboration, and our sense of community. Through a combination of discussion, group presentation, guest lectures, and out-of-class research, students will be exposed to some of the profound effects this medium has had on our culture. In spite of the bursting of the dot com bubble, the Web has left all of the abovementioned areas substantially changed, many for the long term. The positive and negative forces brought on by this technology must be recognized, studied, and dealt with if we are to truly embrace the momentous opportunities brought about by the World Wide Web.

HESB 30490. International Migration and Human Rights

(2-0-2) Bustamante

Designed to be either complementary to or independent of International Migration: Mexico and the United States I. Both correspond to relations between theory and methods for the scientific research on the subject. Each course stands by itself inasmuch as the distinction between theory and methods can be made. The common objective of the courses is to prepare students to design research projects on international migration with emphasis on immigration to the United States for theses and dissertations. Course II refers to a review of basic questions on this subject and the methods through which these questions have been adequately or inadequately answered. The numbers, the impact, the nature, the structure, the process, the human experience, will be discussed in terms of the research methods commonly used to approach them.

HESB 30494. Religion and American Politics

(3-0-3) Noll

Corequisite: HIST 32630

Since the early 1950s, religion has been an obviously major factor in American political life driven first by the African American leaders of the civil rights movement and then, in more recent decades, by the concerns of the religious right. Especially after the election of John F. Kennedy in 1960, Catholics have also been fully recognized participants in the nation's political uses of religion as well as in debates over whether and how religion should be used politically. This class tries to show that modern political-religious connections are but new instances of what has always gone on in the American past. The shape of contests over religion and politics may have changed considerably over time, but not the fact of dense connections between the two spheres. Readings for the course include primary and secondary accounts that treat notable incidents, problems, debates, and controversies from the colonial period to the present. Lectures spotlight major issues of historical interpretation, like religion and the Constitution, religion and antebellum debates over slavery, religion and Reconstruction, Catholic versus Protestant understandings of liberty, civil rights and the new Christian right.

Opportunities for student writing will feature responses to primary documents and historical interpretations.

HESB 30501. Witnessing the Sixties

(3-0-3) Giamo

The purpose of this interdisciplinary course is twofold: to examine the social context and cultural change of the '60s, on the one hand, and on the other to explore the various journalistic and aesthetic representations of events, movements, and transformations. We will focus on the manner in which each writer or artist witnessed the '60s and explore fresh styles of writing and cultural expression, such as the new journalism popularized by Tom Wolfe and the music/lyrics performed by Bob Dylan. Major topics for consideration include the counterculture and the movement—a combination of civil rights and anti-war protest.

HESB 30512. Foundations of Sociological Theory

(3-0-3) Faeges; Konieczny

Sociological theory is the foundation of sociology. Students in this course will learn two things: first, what theorists do and why; and second, how to use fundamental theoretic concepts—such as exploitation and alienation, social structure and solidarity, bureaucracy and charisma—to analyze and explain contemporary society.

HESB 30513. The United States in the 1960s

(3-0-3)

Few periods in American history have been as controversial as the 1960s. Sometimes called the “Long Sixties,” it runs conceptually from the mid-1950s to the early 1970s, and was a turbulent time. Concentrating on politics and society, this course explores the major personalities and events, including Martin Luther King, John F. Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, Richard Nixon, the New Frontier, the Great Society, the Vietnam War, the breakdown of the liberal consensus, the rebirth of the conservative movement, and national movements led by youths, women, and African Americans. Although the emphasis is on the United States, the course also visits several major international issues. There are two goals for students: acquiring knowledge about the period, and developing analytical tools to form their own judgments about it. Toward the first goal, students will encounter a combination of readings, videos, mini-lectures, and class discussions. Toward the second, they will be exposed to four different approaches: (1) discussing primary documents and writing a paper on some of them; (2) studying three small-scale case studies; (3) examining the large-scale phenomenon of protest; and (4) reading the memoirs of a Cabinet member, hence gaining an insider's view of the life and activities in the White House.

HESB 30516. European Cultures and Societies

(3-0-3) Albahari

This course offers an ethnographically grounded understanding of contemporary European cultures and societies. We start by presenting a brief history of the idea of Europe. Then, we define its geographical focus: where are the boundaries of Europe? Are Israel and Turkey part of Europe? Who gets to decide? Are there European Muslims? We will then read recent works focusing on selected regions and on diverse urban populations. We will explore and discuss socio-cultural facets of European everyday life; trends and challenges in technology, the environment, popular culture, demography, and politics; and the diversity of urban/rural, north/south, and more generally intra-European ways of life. The course will be of interest to students of contemporary global issues, and in particular to students who intend to spend a semester in Europe; are back from the field; or intend to write a related senior thesis.

HESB 30517. Education Innovations in Diverse Contexts of Poverty

(3-0-3) Chattopadhyay

This course will look at innovative educational interventions for socio-economically disadvantaged children in diverse contexts—both here in the United States, and internationally. Whether it is the Comer model in New Haven, Conn.; or Diversity Project in Berkeley, Calif.; or EDUCO schools in Nicaragua; or Pratham's community-based supplementary education programs for slum children in India, the course will explore in-depth promising education interventions for children and adolescents growing up in poverty in a globalized world. The course will aim to make students aware of the ways in which educators in diverse contexts of poverty and inequality have conceptualized and implemented empowering alternatives. In doing so, the course will help students better understand what is possible in contexts of poverty, and indeed the limits of the possible devoid any structural change in society.

HESB 30518. Environmental Politics

(3-0-3) Doppke

The first half of the course provides an overview of major American environmental policies such as regulating land use and preservation, water, air, and endangered species. The second half of the course deals more directly with issues of policy formulation, implementation, and enforcement.

HESB 30519. Church and State in American Constitutional Law and Politics

(3-0-3) McCumbers

This course analyzes different approaches to understanding the separation of church and state, and examines how these approaches have played out in political practice and Supreme Court decisions.

HESB 30520. Judicial Politics

(3-0-3) Colucci

This course examines the effect of the legal system on American politics, government, and society. We begin by reviewing the institutions, actors and processes of the legal system, focusing on the institutional and individual influences on judicial decision making. In the second part of the semester, we will closely analyze the political consequences of legal decisions in areas such as criminal law, race and education; including desegregation, school finance, and school choice; abortion, the death penalty and homosexual rights. We conclude by evaluating the extent to which courts can or should be expected to bring about social and political change.

HESB 30521. The Political Economy of Authoritarian Rule

(3-0-3) Wright

This course examines the economic conditions that give rise to authoritarian rule, as well as the economic politics that result from it and support it.

HESB 30522. Environmental Sociology

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the relationship between human societies and the larger natural environment of which they are a part. The main focus of the course will be modern society, but we will also review the history of resource use, pollution, wilderness preservation, environmental movements, and other environmental developments. This course is mainly oriented towards a theoretical perspective and will cover different schools of thought to help students understand the ecological world that surrounds them. The course will be divided into four parts (the moral, the material, the ideal, and the practical).

HESB 30523. Time and Society

(3-0-3) Faeges

Ever felt rushed to finish an assignment? A hit song of 1966 urged people to “slow down, you move too fast”, but since then the pace of life in America, where “time is money,” has accelerated and vacations are shorter. However, in many societies efficiency is disdained, life moves to the rhythms of nature, not the “Day-Timer,” and people seem to have all the time in the world. In short, attitudes towards and ways of dealing with time deeply shape people's lives, and societies' attitudes towards and ways of dealing with time vary greatly. “Social time” is the subject of this course, whose major topics include: how societies track time and use it to regulate and coordinate their members' collective lives at work and play, at home and in public, in everyday life and on special occasions; how “ecological time” based on the sun and moon, stars and seasons, differs from contemporary America's technologically-based “clock time”; how and why the pace of life varies between societies; how the timing of life-cycles varies between societies, for example, in the age at which individuals become adults, old enough to marry and have children—or drink alcohol.

HESB 30525. Gender and Society

(3-0-3) Gregg

This course is an introduction to the study of gender and society. We will study how gender is constructed through social interaction and how it is patterned in a wide gamut of structural locations, such as the following: education, media, family, the field of medicine, and business and the economy. Major themes in this course include the social construction of gender, how people “do” gender, and patriarchy and the perpetuation of gender inequality in our society. After exploring the core characteristics of patriarchy and its power as a social system, the final project in this course will work toward solutions to gender inequality.

HESB 30526. Business, Economics, and Culture

(3-0-3) Oka

Economic, political, and cultural interactions between geographically distant groups have been intensifying over the past century and the 21st century is being seen as the global century. In this rapidly changing world, it is becoming increasingly important to understand the role of cultural (religious, ethnic, and political/socio-economic) factors in determining and shaping interactions. In this course, we will use an ethnographic focused approach to explore the impact of cultural variations on many issues that have arisen or will potentially arise in the course of contemporary global economic interactions. These include the relationships between reciprocity, redistribution and market behaviors, cultural differences in business strategies, relationship building and formation of partnerships, marketing techniques, consumer behavior, and political and environmental situations. We will also look at the impact of business interaction on regional and local economies in Asia (India), Africa (Kenya and the Sudan) and Latin America (Mexico and Guatemala). Coursework will include discussions based on readings, documentaries, an individual ethnographic project and report, and a final paper on the application of cultural factors for global interactions.

HESB 30527. Foundations of Political Anthropology

(3-0-3) Mitchell

This course is a survey of the anthropological study of politics. This advanced course will be of interest to students with some background in anthropology or in political science or political theory. We draw on theoretical, ethnographic, and archaeological readings to examine the kinds of political systems that have existed in human history, the transnational politics of the present, and the possible politics of the human future.

HESB 30528. Law and Religion in U.S. History

(3-0-3) Przybyszewski

This course explores the interconnections between religion and the law as they evolved over the course of the past three centuries of American history.

HESB 30529. The Politics of Poverty and Social Welfare

(3-0-3) Flavin

The United States is the wealthiest nation in the world, yet poverty remains a persistent concern. In this course, we will study the sources of poverty and economic inequality and what has and can be done to address the problem. We begin by discussing different theories on to what extent citizens' income and wealth should be equal in a society and the government's prescribed role, if any, in the process. We then trace the history of poverty in the United States and various government efforts to address the problem through social welfare programs. Finally, we will closely study the different forms poverty takes on today and enter the ongoing debate over what public policies should be implemented in response. Throughout the course, we will pay particular attention to the decidedly political dimension of poverty in America.

HESB 30530. Economics of the Law

(3-0-3) Betson

This course will introduce students to the economics analysis of our legal framework pertaining to property, contract, and tort law. Additional topics will include an examination of the legal process and the relationship between crime and punishment.

HESB 30531. African American Politics: The End or the Beginning?

(3-0-3) Pinderhughes

This course explores the basic elements associated with black politics in the United States: the role of black institutions such as the black church, the importance of the civil rights movement in challenging barriers to black political participation, the mid-20th-century legal framework created to create access to the political system, and an exploration of black political participation in northern cities, where there are also increasing numbers of Latinos and other non-white groups. Since the course will be taught in spring 2009 immediately after the 2008 presidential campaign, we will also have the chance to explore the impact of Illinois Senator Obama's campaign on national politics, whatever the outcome, and to consider the impact on African American politics itself.

HESB 30532. Patriotism and Cosmopolitanism

(3-0-3) Houser

This course will explore the perennial conflict between the cosmopolis and the patria; between adherence to a universal morality and loyalty to one's native country. Because of our common humanity are we called to be “citizens of the world,” and what does such citizenship entail? Is it possible to be both a “citizen of the world” and a citizen of a particular country? What are the sources of these various loyalties? What are the potential areas of conflict between the two? Are there limits to the loyalty of the patriot, and, if so, what form do these limits take? We will examine various manifestations of this conflict from the history of political thought. Readings will include selections from Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, the Stoics, Kant, Lincoln, and Chesterton, as well as some contemporary approaches to both patriotism and cosmopolitanism.

HESB 30534. Abraham Lincoln's America, 1809–65

(3-0-3) Graff

Abraham Lincoln's America will use the life of the republic's most celebrated President as a window to explore the transformations and continuities in American politics, cultures, economics, ideologies, and social life during the half-century ending in the cataclysmic Civil War. Using Lincoln's own experiences as a starting point—his poor upbringing, his family's frequent moves across the sectional borderlands, his self-motivation and professional ambition, his embrace of mass politics, and his rapid ascent to national leadership during the republic's greatest crisis—students will explore much more than the sectional struggle and the fight to save the Union from secession. Important topics will include the evolving struggles over the meanings of race, freedom, and slavery; the increasing commercialization of the economy and the forging of new class relationships and identities; migration, property-holding, and relations with Native Americans in the rural and small-town West; changing realities and conceptions of gender, family, childhood, and parental authority; the changing role of local and national governments and the rise of political parties and mass political participation; and the heated contests over nativity, religion, and citizenship. In short, Lincoln's personal experiences will be the entry into understanding American society as a whole during his life (1809–65), and students will ponder the usefulness of biography to the larger historical project as well as the importance of memory and myth in the ways we repeatedly reconstruct the past.

HESB 30535. Religion and Schooling in American Society

(3-0-3)

Does religion help children do well in school? Focused on primary and secondary schooling in the United States, this course investigates several academic and policy questions on the relationship between religion and schooling: How does religion affect academic outcomes for children? How do contemporary religious Americans view public schools, and how does religion shape Americans' views on curricular and other school policy issues? What is the role of religion in the schooling choices of families in the United States? Do Catholic or other religious schools improve academic outcomes for children? Why, or why not? Through lectures, discussion of key works, and a research paper, the course advances theory and evidence regarding the relationship of religion and academic achievement, the role of religion in politics of education, and the relationship of religion and democratic education.

HESB 30536. Domestic Sources of U.S. Foreign Policy

(3-0-3) Lavallee

This course covers the main developments in American foreign affairs from the Spanish American War in 1898 through World War II. It traces the emergence of the United States as a major world power and examines in some detail how the United States became involved in two world wars. This is a lecture and discussion course. Attendance at BOTH is required. Six books will be assigned (paperbacks). There will be short papers on assigned reading, an 8-page paper, and mid-semester and final examinations. Each student must make an oral presentation in one of the discussion sections.

HESB 30537. International Law

(3-0-3) Reydam

This is an undergraduate survey course in international law designed for social (political) sciences majors. Hence it differs significantly from typical graduate international law courses that tend to focus on norms, procedures, and institutions, with little regard to wider international and domestic politico-legal contexts. This course, by contrast, offers an introduction to IL from an interdisciplinary perspective. Specifically, it seeks to build on some of the fundamental courses offered in the first two years of undergraduate studies: international relations, political theory, U.S. foreign policy, American politics, and U.S. constitutional law. The case studies concern primarily the United States. The goal is to make the study of IL relevant for undergraduate students and to integrate it into their curriculum. The detailed study of international law as such (norms and procedures) deliberately is left to law school.

HESB 30538. International Political Economy

(3-0-3)

This course examines the interactions between international politics and international economics. We begin with a brief exploration of the economic rationale for trade and financial relations, and then examine the recent political history of the global trade and finance. Topics include global and regional trade liberalization; coordination and cooperation in monetary policy (including the advent of the single currency in Europe); causes and implications of financial crises; and the linkages among economic globalization, environmental regulation, and human rights.

HESB 30539. Civil Rights and Protest Movements

(3-0-3) Ardizzone

This course will look at protest movements for civil rights and other related issues, focusing on the 20th century, especially the second half. One central theme will be the African American civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. How did race, gender, class, religion, and region impact the strategies, goals, and reception of various threads of black struggles for full citizenship? In addition, we will explore previous and later generations of African American activism, as well as other protest movements in the post-WWII period. How did the civil rights movement that emerged in the 1950s draw on early 20th-century activism and leadership? What directions did African American protest movements take after the late 1960s? How did other civil rights, racial and ethnic consciousness, and social reform movements in the 1960s, '70s, and '80s develop from their own historical experiences and in relationship to other protest movements?

HESB 30540. Reforming America in the Long Nineteenth Century (1776–1919)

(3-0-3) Turpin

With the recent 2008 presidential election, there is a lot of excitement about the possibility of “change” and “reform” in our country. This class will provide perspective on our present historical moment by examining American reform movements of the past. It will focus on “the long 19th century” from the American Revolution to World War I. During this time optimistic Americans of various stripes set out to reform all sorts of things: religion, sex, eating and drinking, race and gender relations, education, and working and living conditions, to name just a few. As we look at these reform movements, we will ask the questions: What drove certain people to buck convention and seek reform? Why did they choose to focus on these particular reforms at these times? What did they believe would be the ultimate significance of the changes they were seeking? Why were some movements more successful than others?

HESB 30541. Courts and Politics Around the World

(3-3-3) Brinks

This course carries out a comparative study of the nature of courts and law, their position in political systems, and their potential impact on society. The course is very theoretical, and organized around key themes rather than countries. The main themes of the course include the following: Why politicians create powerful courts? How do judges and courts make decisions? What is judicial independence? How do we get it, and which systems have it? And how effective are courts as tools for political and social change? The court has a heavy emphasis on judicial design, and the class will design a court structure for an imaginary country.

HESB 30542. Globalization

(3-3-3) Hagopian

This course will examine the movement of money, goods, information, and cultural norms that are collectively known today as “globalization.” We will consider the “pros” and “cons” of the roles played by the institutions that enforce growing financial and trade integration and the international promotion by governments and transnational activists of democracy and human rights. It will also highlight the cultural reactions to globalization, including the resurgence of nationalism, ethnic identities, and religious fundamentalism. Special emphasis will be placed on contrasting the approach of the United States and other advanced industrial and developing countries.

HESB 40417. Comparing European Societies

(3-0-3)

This course offers students a review of major patterns of difference, along with some similarities, among the 15 member states of the European Union. Despite the larger contrasts with the United States, and the pressures toward convergence generated by the process of European integration, European societies remain remarkably different from one another on a number of dimensions including: the overall level and form taken by employment and unemployment, systems of social protection and welfare state organization, demographic trends ranging from extremely low birth rates in most of southern Europe to significantly higher birth rates further north, the connections between urban and rural life, and the impact of education in inequalities. The role of institutions, cultures, national histories and policies in accounting for this pattern of difference will be reviewed. The course will also examine the combinations of identities—national, regional and European—found among citizens of Europe. Students will be encouraged to develop their expertise on at least one country while also doing comparative reading.

HESB 40420. Current Trends in Computer Applications

(3-0-3) Berzai

The current trends course allows the students to think about and discuss issues openly that pertain to computer ethics, business ethics, and some social ethical issues. We start out by having an understanding of the distinction between the terms moral and ethical. The class works through the generally accepted theories for resolving moral and ethical conflicts. These are egoism, natural law, utilitarianism, and respect for persons. We also discuss the reasons businesses exist and what they think their responsibility toward society is now and how it might change in the future. The students also debate several business ethical issues. In the area of information technology, there is discussion about what the student sees as right or wrong, ethical or not ethical in the many issues of discussion that are presented.

HESB 43020. Research Seminar in Public Policy

(3-0-3) De Ridder

All Lyman interns are required to enroll in this post-internship seminar. Based on their internship experience, students will be asked to select a research topic, formulate a proposal, and write a research paper. Initial class meetings will focus on the nature of policy research. Students will then formulate a research proposal to be discussed and presented in class. After fall break, research will be pursued by each participant on an individual basis. Research findings will be presented in class at the end of the semester.

HESB 43502. Self, Society, and Environment

(3-0-3) Weigert

This course introduces students to social-psychological aspects of the natural environment. Issues considered include interacting with different environments, symbolic transformations of environments, competing accounts, and claims concerning environments. With an overview of basic information, these issues are discussed from the perspectives of individual self and sociocultural institutions. The course touches on alternative ways of envisioning, interacting, and valuing human-environment relations with an eye toward individual and collective change.

HESB 43509. Cultural Aspects of Clinical Medicine

(3-1-4) Wolosin

This course focuses on social science approaches to sickness and healing. The medical encounter is examined from anthropological perspectives. The course emphasizes the difficulties traditional biomedicine has in addressing patients' expectations for care. Students serve an internship as patient ombudsman in a local hospital emergency room 4 hours per week. Students MUST have access to transportation to participate in the ER internships. Students are required to sign a waiver, present evidence of immunizations, and receive a TB skin test.

HESB 43515. Families, Employers and Their Interrelation with Gender

(3-0-3)

A consideration of the part gender plays in family processes like the couple formation through cohabitation and/or marriage, having and rearing children, division of labor, and the post-children era.

HESB 43527. Global Sociology

(3-0-3)

The course is designed as a broad overview of sociological analysis that extends beyond traditionally accepted national and local boundaries. It provides a perspective on the discipline as one that seeks to understand human society as a nested collection of interdependent societies. In particular, the course draws from world systems theory and institutional approaches as well as from related disciplines such as anthropology—to consider how the “development project” of the 20th century evolved over time. The impacts of global economic integration on cultural and institutional change, inequality, and on changing identities and forms of collective action (including social movements) are phenomena we explore in the course. The course is designed for students who simply want to learn how the World Bank, IMF, and United Nations are impacting the experiences of people around the world as well as for those who expect to do further research in the field.

HESB 43534. Sociology of Economic Life

(3-0-3) Spillman

Economic actions like working, buying, selling, saving, and giving are a fundamental part of everyday life, and all spheres of society, from family to religion to politics, are interrelated with economy. Sociologists examine how social relationships from small networks to transnational linkages affect economic actions and their outcomes, and the ways cultural meanings and political strategies shape those social relationships. The goal of this class is to provide students with new perspectives on economic actions by reading recent sociological studies of topics like money, markets, work, businesses, industries, and consumer society.

HESB 43535. Crime and Deviance in Ideological Perspective

(3-0-3) Welch

This seminar course will examine selected issues (e.g., white collar crime, gang violence, pornography, etc.) in the study of crime and deviance (issues will change each time the course is offered) and compare responses made by those representing the left and right in American society. We will critique the adequacy of these responses from a sociological viewpoint.

HESB 43537. Environmental Justice

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

This course will survey environmental impact assessment (EIA), ecological risk assessment (ERA), and human-health risk assessment (HHRA); ethical and methodological issues related to these techniques; then apply these techniques to contemporary assessments for which state and federal governments are seeking comments by scientists and citizens.

HESB 43538. Biomedical Ethics, Scientific Evidence, and Public Health Risk

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

Designed for pre-med, science, and engineering students, the course will survey ethical issues associated with current public health problems, such as pollution-induced cancers, universal health care, occupational injury and death, and inadequate medical attention to prevention, nutrition, and environmental health.

HESB 43540. International Migration and Human Rights

(3-0-3) Bustamante

This course is an extension from the mini-course to a full term, with a wider coverage of international migration experiences in the world with an emphasis on human rights. It starts with a historical approach to various immigration waves to the United States, from the years of the Industrial Revolution to the present. It focuses on the current debate on the impact of the undocumented immigration from Mexico and Central America, with a discussion of the gap between public perceptions and research findings. Differences between Mexico and the United States's migration policies, and its social and economic implications, are discussed. The recent developments within the context of the United Nations' Commission of Human Rights on the relationship between migration and human rights are also covered.

HESB 43543. Health, Healing, and Culture

(3-0-3) Lende

This course provides an introduction to the field of medical anthropology. Medical anthropology examines beliefs, practices, and experiences of illness, health, and healing from a cross-cultural perspective to show that illness, health, medicine, and the body are shaped by social relationships and cultural values from the local level of the family and community to the global level of international development and transnational capitalism. This course will consider the ways in which medical anthropology has historically been influenced by debates within the discipline of anthropology as well as by broader social and political movements. Particular emphasis will be placed on the importance of viewing biomedicine as one among many culturally constructed systems of medicine. Some of the key issues we will explore are medical pluralism and therapeutic choice; biocultural studies; medicalization; the political economy of health and disease; the anthropology of the body; the role of medicine and disease in colonialism and postcolonial movements; and applied medical anthropology.

HESB 43544. Sociology, Self, and Catholic Social Tradition

(3-0-3) Weigert

What's Catholic about sociology? What's sociological about Catholic social tradition? What does all this mean for sociology majors, what they study, and how this may affect their careers and lives after graduation? This course is a critical examination of the links between Catholic social thought and sociology as a discipline. We will engage these ideas through an experimental, team-taught seminar format. Readings will include core statements of Catholic social tradition, critiques thereof, and autobiographical essays written by sociologists and others who are dedicated to social justice.

HESB 43547. Controversies and Crises in Modern Criminology

(3-0-3) Welch

This upper-level seminar course is intended for junior and senior sociology majors only. It will focus on important current issues and controversies (e.g., racial profiling, victimless crimes, cyber-crimes, etc.) that are central to the study of crime and deviance in modern society. Students will be required to discuss and analyze these issues from a variety of sociological perspectives. The issues that are studied may change each time the course is offered. You cannot take this course (even if you are a sociology major), if you have already taken SOC 43730, Crime and Deviance in Ideological Perspective, because of overlap.

HESB 43548. Marxian Economic Theory

(3-0-3) Ruccio

An introduction to Marx's most significant work, Capital, with particular attention to the initial steps of Marx's value theory presented in Volume I of Capital.

HESB 43551. Materializations of America

(3-0-3)

Industrialization in the 20th century resulted in a mega-technic America problematically related to materialism and to earlier visions of the New World. The course will consider a variety of materializations of America.

HESB 43552. History of Economic Thought

(3-0-3) Mirowski

This course intends to ask how it is that we have arrived at this curious configuration of doctrines now called "economics"; and importantly, how differing modes of historical discourse tend to ratify us in our prejudices about our own possible involvement in this project. The course will begin in the 18th century with the rise of a self-conscious discipline, and take us through the stabilization of the modern orthodoxy in WWII. Effort will be made to discuss the shifting relationship of economics to the other sciences, natural and social. A basic knowledge of economics (including introductory economics and preferably intermediate economics) will be presumed.

HESB 43555. Building Democratic Institutions

(3-0-3) Valenzuela

Elements of democratic regimes emerged long before the regimes as such can be identified as being minimally in place. Beginning with a brief discussion of the essential features of democracies, the course examines how and why such institutions emerged, and the critical moments in which the actual transitions to the new democratic regimes occurred. The course focuses on democratizations that took place before the Second World War, and will examine key European and Latin American cases.

HESB 43556. Religion and Classical Social Theory

(3-0-3) Christiano

The purpose of this course is, in the setting of a small seminar, to engage students in close reading and broad discussion of sociological writings about religion by classical theorists of the discipline. Works that may be nominated for treatment include such mainstays as The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life and other studies of religion by Emile Durkheim; The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism and The Sociology of Religion by Max Weber; portions of The German Ideology by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, as well as excerpts from Marx's Capital; The Future of an Illusion and Civilization and Its Discontents by Sigmund Freud; and various essays on religion by Georg Simmel. The course also will cover more recent works, both in the sociology of religion and in related fields, incorporating assumptions about and approaches to religion that can be traced to these pioneering authors.

HESB 43557. Anthropology of Globalization

(3-0-3) Albahari

This course analyzes contemporary patterns of globalization drawing on recent ethnographies. We will briefly overview the historical antecedents of globalization, and then proceed to analyze globalization's cultural, socio-political, and economic complexity, often resulting in urbanization. In particular, we will tackle the global circulation of food, entertainment, fashion, capital, ideologies, violence, religious practice, migrant/trafficked labor, and even of so-called "anti-globalization" movements. Examples of specific topics include youth and free trade in Latin America; cyber-politics among transnational Chinese, Eritreans, and others; McDonald's and consumerism in Moscow; Indian cinema and global media. By locating global processes in everyday practice, we will come to understand the interconnectivity sustaining globalization, and the resulting practices of resistance. More broadly, we will appreciate on the one hand how various cultures and societies become increasingly interconnected, and on the other how people around the world appropriate large-scale processes in culturally specific ways. The course emphasizes anthropology's role as a discipline that is globally relevant and publicly "engaged." Accordingly, we will focus on the discipline's methodological and theoretical contributions in the study of globalization and its inequalities, and toward a more socially just world. The course will also equip you to design and implement an original research project, and to write an ethnographic account based on such project.

HESB 46000. Directed Readings

(0-0-V)

Juniors and seniors have an opportunity to further their knowledge about a public policy topic through a semester of "a la carte" readings. Permission and proposal must be presented to the director of the program in the beginning of the semester. Number of credits varies.

HESB 47000. Special Studies

(3-0-3)

Special studies to be determined by the professor and the student.

Department of History

HIST 10010. American History (AP credit)

(3-0-3)

A student at Notre Dame qualifies for academic credit for this course with a score of 5 on the American History AP exam.

HIST 10020. European History (AP credit)

(3-0-3)

A student at Notre Dame qualifies for academic credit for this course with a score of 5 on the European History AP exam.

HIST 10030. World History (AP credit)

(3-0-3)

A student at Notre Dame qualifies for academic credit for this course with a score of 5 on the World History AP exam.

HIST 10050. African History to 1800

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 12050

This course introduces students to major themes in African history to 1800. It investigates agricultural and iron revolutions, states and empires, religious movements, and patterns of migration and labor exploitation. The latter part of the course focuses on Africa in the era of trans-Atlantic slave trade, from 1550 to 1800. We will study the various methods that historians use to investigate the past; we will also delve into some of the intellectual debates surrounding pre-colonial Africa and the slave trade. By the end of the course, students will have a firm understanding of states and societies in Africa in the pre-colonial period.

HIST 10085. An Introduction to the History of the Modern Middle East

(3-0-3)

This course surveys Middle Eastern history from 1500 to the present. The primary themes to be covered include the emergence and demise of the last Muslim unitary states; European colonial and imperial penetration of the Middle East in the 19th century; the social and cultural impact of imperialism; state-building in the 20th century; new ideologies/nationalisms; and contemporary problems of political and economic development. We will also consider the most important movements of Islamic reform and revival over the past two centuries.

HIST 10106. Modern South Asia

(3-0-3)

More than one-fifth of the world's population lives in South Asia, a region comprised of the modern nations of India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bhutan, Afghanistan, and the Maldives. This introductory course will provide a survey of issues and events in South Asian history from the establishment of British East India Company rule in 1757 to the decolonization of South Asia in 1947. The course will explore the following themes: the rise of a trading company, the East India Company, and its transition into a colonial power; the emergence of a colonial economy; colonial production of knowledge; 19th- and 20th-century cultural, religious, and political movements and formations of new identities; the emergence of elite and popular nationalisms; independence; and the partition of the subcontinent.

HIST 10200. Western Civilization I

(3-0-3) Noble

Corequisite: HIST 12200

A survey of the central themes in Western civilization from ancient Mesopotamia to the Renaissance. Emphasis will be on problems of social organization, especially the mutual obligations and responsibilities of individuals and states; evolving concepts of justice; aesthetic standards; religious ideas and institutions; basic philosophical concepts; different kinds of states; and the ideologies that defined and sustained them.

HIST 10210. Ancient Greece and Rome

(3-0-3) Mazurek

An introduction to the major historical and cultural periods of ancient Greek and Roman civilization through close reading of texts central to the Classical Greek and Latin literary traditions. Topics to be considered include concepts of the divine; heroism and virtue; concepts of gender; and democracy, empire, and civic identity. The course aims to deepen students' appreciation for the classical roots of their own social, intellectual, and religious lives.

HIST 10400. Western Civilization Since 1500

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 12400

This course will provide a comprehensive overview of European history over the last four centuries. During this period European states emerged as powerful institutions, extending their control over the peoples of Europe, and battling with each other for territory, subjects, and status, both in Europe and throughout the world. The enormous growth of state power provoked opposition from both elites and ordinary people. This course will explore resistance to the state as well as tracing its growth, with special attention paid to the English revolution in the 17th century, the French and Russian revolutions in 1789 and 1917, and the collapse of the Soviet empire in the late 20th century. Particular attention will be paid to the development of the ideologies of liberalism, socialism, and nationalism, which defined new relationships between people and their states in the 19th and 20th centuries. The changing status of women, and the emergence of feminism as another ideological alternative, will be dealt with as well. The conflicted relationship between Europe and its colonial territories will constitute another major theme.

HIST 10600. U.S. History I: to 1877

(3-0-3) Turner

Corequisite: HIST 12600

A survey of the social, cultural, and political history of the British North American colonies and the United States to the close of the Civil War. Organized around the question of American "nationhood," topics include Native American, European, and African encounters; regional development and divergence; imperial conflict and revolution; constitutional development and argument; democratization and its implications; religious impulses and reformism; immigration and nativism; the importance of land and westward expansion; slavery and emancipation; and sectional division and Civil War.

HIST 10605. U.S. History II: 1877–present

(3-0-3) Blantz

Corequisite: HIST 12605

This course will be a survey of the political, diplomatic, economic, social, and cultural development of the United States from 1865, the end of the Civil War, to 1988, the end of the Ronald Reagan presidency. Major topics to be covered include post-war reconstruction, the Industrial Revolution of the late 19th century, the progressive legislation of Presidents Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson, the causes of the Wall Street Crash and Great Depression, the New Deal programs of Franklin Roosevelt, World Wars I and II, the Fair Deal and containment policies of Harry Truman, Dwight Eisenhower's Modern Republicanism, the New Frontier of John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson's Great Society, the civil rights and feminist movements, Vietnam, Richard Nixon and Watergate, and the presidencies of Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter, and Ronald Reagan.

HIST 10610. Irish American History

(3-0-3) Griffin

Corequisite: HIST 12610

This course will explore the Irish American experience from Atlantic, global, and comparative perspectives. We will, of course, cover traditional topics, such as labor, politics, and religion. And we will encounter many colorful characters and fascinating stories. But we will do so by viewing the Irish who came to America as part of a broader, dynamic diaspora that would span the globe. Viewing migration to the American colonies (including the Caribbean) and the United States from this vantage point means that we must consider the changing relationship between Ireland and America, as well as the ways in which both regions were parts of broader economic and cultural systems. As such, we will examine dynamics that occurred within the Atlantic basin, such as movement and adaptation to a New World, within a global context. Needless to say, we will cover the history of both sending and receiving societies in rigorous fashion. Only by doing this sort of work can we understand what defined the Irish American experience.

HIST 10612. American Catholic Experience

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 12612

This course will examine the history of the Irish in the United States. In many respects the Irish are the great success story in American history. They have moved from the shantytowns of urban America to the boardrooms of Wall Street. Along the way, they have left their mark on American politics, literature, religion, and the labor movement. These are the areas that the course will study. The course begins in the 18th century when large numbers of Irish immigrated to North America. Then we will examine the Great Famine of the 1840s and the subsequent immigration of over one million Irish people to the United States. The great themes of Irish American history—politics, literature, religion, and labor—will be the focus of our study as we examine the Irish during the century of immigration, 1820–1920. We will conclude our study with an overview of 20th-century Irish America and the new Irish immigrants of the 1980s and 1990s.

HIST 10750. History of U.S. National Security Policy Since the 1890s

(3-0-3)

In the aftermath of 9/11, with American troops deployed in Afghanistan and Iraq, and concern about the nuclear ambitions of such nations as North Korea and Iran, “national security” is the phrase that is often discussed and is of crucial importance to informed citizens. This course will examine national security policy: what it is, how it is formulated and executed, and how U.S. national security policies have evolved since the 1890s. Using a variety of readings and films such as Casablanca and Dr. Strangelove, this course will examine U.S. national security policies from the late 1890s through two world wars, the interwar period, the cold war, the post-cold war years, and up to the current post-9/11 world. We will identify continuities and departures in historic U.S. national security policies, and consider the roles of policymakers and their critics in a self-governing society.

HIST 10901. Colonial Latin America

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 12901

When Columbus stepped ashore in the Caribbean in 1492, he set in motion a process that led to the creation of wealthy Spanish and Portuguese empires in the Americas, the genocide of countless numbers of indigenous men and women, the enslavement of millions of African men and women, and the eventual formation of a variety of independent states competing in the world economy. In this semester-long survey, we will examine topics in this history that will allow us to consider how history is produced, as well as what happened in the past, from various perspectives, from elite colonial administrators and merchants to indigenous peasants and formerly enslaved men and women.

HIST 10929. Andean History and Ethnohistory

(3-0-3) Graubart

Corequisite: HIST 12929

This course looks at the history of the peoples who live in the Andean region of South America (modern-day Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia) from some of the earliest recorded settlements through the end of Spanish colonization. Using ethnohistoric—archaeological and anthropological — as well as historic—written texts—materials, we will look at how Andean peoples adapted to and contributed to the formation of their societies, under arduous geographic and climatic conditions. Topics will include the formation of early imperial civilizations such as the Moche and Wari; the development of an Inca empire out of the remnants of these earlier cultures; Spanish conquest and colonization; the adaptation of Andean religiosity to Catholicism; the rebellions of the 18th century. The course will include a visit to the Snite Museum in order to work first-hand with objects from ancient Andean cultures.

HIST 10990. Environment and Civilization

(3-0-3) Fernandez-Armesto

Corequisite: HIST 12990

This course explores the relationship between environment and human societies across several continents and centuries.

HIST 13184. History University Seminar

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction that explores the major methodologies of the historical discipline and which accents the organization and expression of arguments suggested by readings in historical topics.

HIST 13196. Honors History Seminar

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ALHN 13950 OR ALHN 195)

A general introduction to history, taught in a seminar format for students in the science and arts and letters honors program.

HIST 20075. Introduction to Islamic Civilization

(3-0-3)

This course provides an introduction to Islamic civilization and Muslim culture and societies through scholarly works, literature, media clips, films, and audio-video material (some made by the instructor during recent trips to the Middle East). The background readings will provide a context for the audio-visual material, giving a general overview of the history of the Islamic world from the advent of Islam to the present day. The ultimate goal of this course is for students to gain a better understanding of the Muslim peoples and their culture and societies within the broader context of Islamic civilization. Focal point: brief overview of the canons and basic tenets of Islam as a world religion, recognition and transcendence of stereotypes, awareness of Western culture and political influence on today's Arab Islamic world and vice versa, and exposure to Middle Eastern culture.

HIST 20076. Revelation and Revolution

(3-0-3)

Between the years A.D. 100 and 1000, Christianity and Islam were born and struggled for supremacy as world empires. The rivalry that resulted was religious and theological, but it expressed itself in story, art, and imagination. This course follows the early progress of a rivalry that continues to our own day. Topics include history of religious interaction, politics of empire, Arabic literature, mytho-poetics, art, and architecture.]

HIST 20079. Historical Survey of the Arab Middle East

(3-0-3) Amar

This course will chart the history of the Arab Middle East from the formative period of the emergence of Islam in the seventh century through the fall of Constantinople in 1453 and the creation of the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Intended to be broad in its coverage and comprehensive in its scope, the course will introduce students to the social, cultural, and religious crosscurrents that came to define the Arab life and culture in the region.

HIST 20106. Introduction to Modern South Asian History

(3-0-3)

More than one-fifth of the world's population lives in South Asia, a region comprised of the modern nations of India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bhutan, Afghanistan, and the Maldives. This introductory course will provide a survey of issues and events in South Asian history from the establishment of British East India Company rule in 1757 to the decolonization of South Asia in 1947. The course will explore the following themes: the rise of a trading company, the East India Company, and its transition into a colonial power; the emergence of a colonial economy; colonial production of knowledge; 19th- and 20th-century cultural, religious, and political movements and formations of new identities; the emergence of elite and popular nationalisms; independence; and the partition of the subcontinent.

HIST 20110. Ancient Japan

(3-0-3)

This course provides training in understanding and engaging history as a series of wide-ranging debates. The class will examine three issues: first, the politically charged question of Japan's origins in myth and archeology; second, the question of whether the forces of Chinese culture or nature as disease and environmental degradation defined the Yamato state from the sixth to the ninth century; and, third, whether Heian court power until about 1200 rested on economic, political, military, judicial, or aesthetic grounds. The second purpose of the course, the development of the disciplined imagination necessary to enter another culture and another time, relies on the reading of primary texts in translation. There will be three tests and several classroom assignments.

HIST 20200. Western Civilization I

(3-0-3) Noble

Corequisite: HIST 22200

A survey of the central themes in Western civilization from ancient Mesopotamia to the Renaissance. Emphasis will be on problems of social organization, especially the mutual obligations and responsibilities of individuals and states; evolving concepts of justice; aesthetic standards; religious ideas and institutions; basic philosophical concepts; different kinds of states; and the ideologies that defined and sustained them.

HIST 20204. King Arthur in History and Literature

(3-0-3)

This course—intended to introduce undergraduates to one of the major themes as well as to the interdisciplinary approaches characteristic of medieval studies—is a team-taught examination of the development and influence of the legend of Arthur, King of Britain, both in history and in literature. The historical Arthur is very obscure, but he was probably a Romanized Celtic war-leader who fought the invading Anglos and Saxons at the beginning of the history of what was to become England. His memory was preserved in the oral literature of his own people, now called the Welsh, but he was soon converted into a mythic hero surrounded by magical companions. In the 12th century, this legendary Arthur was not only incorporated into the new historiography of England (since 1066 under the rule of French-speaking Normans), but into the new genre of literature created in France around 1150—the chivalric romance—which, itself, embodied a new ideal for the relationship between men and women derived from the songs of the troubadours of the south. The great majority of these tales of love and marvelous adventures written over the next four centuries were to be set in the court of the legendary Arthur, and the Round Table was invented in this period as the central focus of the ideals it was made to represent. History soon began to imitate literature, as kings and princes attempted to emulate the idealized Arthurian court in their tournaments and other court festivities, and from 1330 to 1469 actually founded orders of knights based on the Round Table. The class will read the relevant parts of some of the chronicles, histories, and epics in which Arthur was mentioned, as well as a representative sample of the Arthurian romances of the later period, and of related documents like the statutes of the chivalric orders.

HIST 20400. Western Civilization II

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 22400

This course will provide a comprehensive overview of European history over the last four centuries. During this period European states emerged as powerful institutions, extending their control over the peoples of Europe, and battling with each other for territory, subjects, and status, both in Europe and throughout the world. The enormous growth of state power provoked opposition, from both elites and ordinary people. This course will explore resistance to the state as well as tracing its growth, with special attention paid to the English revolution in the 17th century, the French and Russian revolutions in 1789 and 1917, and the collapse of the Soviet empire in the late 20th century. Particular attention will be paid to the development of the ideologies of liberalism, socialism, and nationalism, which defined new relationships between people and their states in the 19th and 20th centuries. The changing status of women, and the emergence of feminism as another ideological alternative, will be dealt with as well. The conflicted relationship between Europe and its colonial territories will constitute another major theme. In addition to political and social developments, this course will treat in broad terms the major cultural and intellectual trends in Europe, examining the growth of the critical spirit in the Enlightenment and the emphasis on feeling and subjectivity in the age of romanticism. The course will conclude with a section on recent developments, focusing on efforts to create an integrated Europe, and on the emergence of the current tensions that divide Europe and the United States. Slides, music, and film will be used to illustrate and supplement material treated in lectures. Students will be assigned a general text and about five additional books, including both primary and secondary sources. The grade will be based on two short essays, a midterm and final exam, and on class participation.

HIST 20600. U.S. History I: to 1877

(3-0-3) Turner

Corequisite: HIST 22600

A survey of the social, cultural, and political history of the British North American colonies and the United States to the close of the Civil War. Organized around the question of American “nationhood,” topics include Native American, European, and African encounters; regional development and divergence; imperial conflict and revolution; constitutional development and argument; democratization and its implications; religious impulses and reformism; immigration and nativism; the importance of land and westward expansion; slavery and emancipation; sectional division and Civil War.

HIST 20605. U.S. History II: Since 1877

(3-0-3) Swartz

This course will be a survey of the political, diplomatic, economic, social, and cultural development of the United States from 1865, the end of the Civil War, to 1988, the end of the Ronald Reagan presidency. Major topics to be covered include post-war reconstruction, the industrial revolution of the late 19th century, the progressive legislation of Presidents Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson, the causes of the Wall Street Crash and Great Depression, the New Deal programs of Franklin Roosevelt, World Wars I and II, the Fair Deal and containment policies of Harry Truman, Dwight Eisenhower's Modern Republicanism, the New Frontier of John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson's Great Society, the civil rights and feminist movements, Vietnam, Richard Nixon and Watergate, and the presidencies of Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter, and Ronald Reagan. The class format will be two lectures each week and one discussion session. There will be three short writing assignments, a midterm, and a final examination.

HIST 20612. American Catholic Experience

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 22612

This course is a survey of the history of Roman Catholicism in the United States from colonial times to the present. We will consider, among others, the following topics: immigrant and ethnic Catholicism, women in the Church, Catholic social reform, devotional and parish life, and the relationship between Catholicism and American democracy. Texts for the course include a general history, two interpretive works, and a course packet of primary sources. Requirements include a midterm and final examination and three short (3- to 5-page) essays. Students enrolled in this class must also take HIST 22612, a tutorial.

HIST 20614. Critical Issues in American History

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is twofold: to provide the students with a college-level survey of American history from the founding of the colonies through the 1980s, and to examine in some detail 14 “critical issues” in our history: cultural diversity in the American colonies, the American Revolution and the Constitution, the Federalist contributions of George Washington and John Marshall, Jeffersonian and Jacksonian democracy, slavery and antebellum reform, the Civil War and Reconstruction, the Industrial Revolution, progressivism, the Wall Street Crash and Great Depression, Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, World War II and the cold war, civil rights and reform, the Great Society and Vietnam, and the Reagan revolution.

HIST 20631. History of American Sport Since 1876

(3-0-3)

Since professional baseball was institutionalized with the establishment of the National League in 1876, sport in the United States has played a large and complex role in American life, intertwined with such developments as the rise of the mass media, democratization of higher education, race and gender issues, and the growing popularity of sport as a form of entertainment exemplified by the rise of the ESPN "family of networks." This course will explore the social, cultural, political, and economic implications of sport in American society since 1876. It will include such topics as the rise of professional sport, the long history and rapid fall of the "reserve clause" that gave so much power to pro sport owners, the origins and development of college sports (and Notre Dame's place in that history), the rise of "sports heroes" in the 1920s, the role of sport in the cold war, sport and the social turmoil of the 1960s, and sports' impact on changing race relations and gender roles in recent decades.

HIST 20750. History of U.S. National Security Policy Since 1890

(3-0-3) Soares

In the aftermath of 9/11, with American troops deployed in Afghanistan and Iraq, and concern about the nuclear ambitions of such nations as North Korea and Iran, "national security" is the phrase that is often discussed and is of crucial importance to informed citizens. This course will examine national security policy: what it is, how it is formulated and executed, and how U.S. national security policies have evolved since the 1890s. Using a variety of readings and films such as Casablanca and Dr. Strangelove, this course will examine U.S. national security policies from the late 1890s through two world wars, the interwar period, the cold war, the post-cold war years, and up to the current post-9/11 world. We will identify continuities and departures in historic U.S. national security policies, and consider the roles of policymakers and their critics in a self-governing society.

HIST 20900. Introduction to Latin American History

(3-0-3)

This course will introduce students to the history of Latin America from the encounter of European and indigenous civilizations in 1492, up to the present. It will cover three major historical periods (colonial, 19th century, and contemporary), utilizing a variety of sources, including history, literature, and film. The course will pay special attention to such issues as the dynamics of centralization and fragmentation, regionalism and caudillismo, political instability, and international relations. However, it will also serve as an introduction to Latin American culture, popular as well as elite, as reflected in literature and art.

HIST 20910. History of Mexico

(3-0-3)

Mexican history is often portrayed as a recurring conflict between foreign conquests and an authentic Mexican culture. We will examine this theme over 500 years of Mexican history, from indigenous cultures and the Spanish conquest to the 20th-century revolution and its social consequences. Through readings, lectures, discussions, art, and film, we will explore the roots of modern Mexico and its development from the 15th century to the present. No background in Mexican or Latin American history is required.

HIST 20975. Making Australia

The struggle to "make" Australia, as opposed to replicating Britain, got under way early on after European settlement, and it has been in process ever since. This course will seek to understand and illuminate this nation-building process. Approximately two-thirds of the course will be devoted to examining the major issues in Australia's history, beginning with an appropriate treatment of Aboriginal history through to the present debates over Australian identity and the nation's political structure. The final third of the course will explore important issues in contemporary society and culture. This course will have special interest for students who either have studied or plan to study in the Notre Dame Australia program. In addition to reading five or six books, students will view a number of important Australian documentary and feature films. A willingness to participate in extracurricular activities is a prerequisite for the course. (Please keep Wednesday evening clear in your schedule.) The course will involve lecture, discussion, and class presentations. Students will write a 10-page research paper and take mid-semester and final examinations.

HIST 20990. Environment and Civilization

(3-0-3) Fernandez-Armesto

Corequisite: HIST 22990

This course explores the relationship between environment and human societies across several continents and centuries.

HIST 30050. African History to 1800

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to major themes in African history to 1800. It investigates agricultural and iron revolutions, states and empires, religious movements, and patterns of migration and labor exploitation. The latter part of the course focuses on Africa in the era of trans-Atlantic slave trade from 1550 to 1800. We will study the various methods that historians use to investigate the past; we will also delve into some of the intellectual debates surrounding pre-colonial Africa and the slave trade. By the end of the course, students will have a firm understanding of states and societies in Africa in the pre-colonial period.

HIST 30060. African History Since 1800

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on African history from 1800 to the independence movements of the 1960s. In the 19th century, new states, economies, and societies emerged in Africa as African peoples developed new relations among themselves and with the rest of the world. With the "scramble for Africa" of the 1880s, European powers colonized Africa and suppressed many of these processes. In the 1960s, however, self-rule resurged as Africans helped throw off the yoke of colonial rule and form independent nation-states. This course will consider the social, economic, and political history of Africa by using case studies from the Democratic Republic of Congo (Congo-Zaire), Nigeria, Sierra Leone, and South Africa.

HIST 30065. Social History of Modern South Africa

(3-0-3)

This course offers an overview of modern South Africa from the perspective of radical social history, a major intellectual tradition in South African studies. It will begin by identifying processes of dispossession, urbanization and proletarianization set in train by South Africa's mineral revolution. It will then look at the clash between imperial and Boer interests, and the South African war. The Union of South Africa in 1910 represented a reorganization of white power, and the course will turn to the experiences of Union for both black and white, including the emergence of African nationalism and other, culturally-located, forms of resistance. The apartheid state was inaugurated in 1948, and the course will examine the consolidation of the state, how it sought to control black and white citizens and subjects, and the accelerating politics of defiance. There will be particular emphasis on black consciousness and its role in the 1976 Soweto revolt. By way of conclusion, the course will turn to the culture and politics of resistance in the 1980s, up to the initial dismantling of apartheid in 1990.

HIST 30075. Muhammad and the Qur'an

(3-0-3)

Islamic law, theology, and spirituality are all derived primarily from the Qur'an and the practice (sunna) of the messenger and exemplar Muhammad. This course provides students with an in-depth introduction to these twin foundations of the Islamic religious tradition. Students will read a comprehensive biography (sira) of Muhammad based on the earliest sources. Students will also read selections from the Qur'an, contextualized within the narrative of Muhammad's prophetic career. In addition to familiarizing students with the traditional narrative of Muhammad's life and the style, content and structure of the Qur'an, this course also explores contemporary questions and debates in the historical-critical study of Islamic origins.

HIST 30078. Hieroglyphs and History

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on Egyptian hieroglyphs both as a means to reconstruct Egyptian history and culture as well as a reflection of that culture. The student will be taught to translate and interpret primary sources especially on monuments and archaeological finds. Material from the tomb of Tatakhamun will be read and analyzed in detail. In addition there will be lectures and discussions on specific historical topics and also on developing chronologies, understanding color symbolism, recognizing the numerous Egyptian deities, and interpreting Pharaonic names.

HIST 30079. Death and the Afterlife in Ancient Egypt

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (HIST 30078 OR CLAS 30799)

After an initial survey of historical sources, this course will focus on a wide range of texts, archaeological artifacts, and architectural remains associated with Egyptian funerary practice and conceptions of the Otherworld.

HIST 30080. Medieval Middle East

(3-0-3)

This course offers a survey of Middle Eastern history from the rise of Islam in the seventh century C.E. until the rise of Mongol successor polities in the 15th century. The course is structured to cover political and cultural developments and their relationship with broader changes in society during the formative centuries of Islamic civilization. Specific topics include the career of the Prophet Muhammad and the origins of the earliest Muslim polity; the creation and breakup of the Islamic unitary state (the Caliphate); the impact of Turkic migrations on the Middle East; social practices surrounding the transmission of learning in the Middle Ages; the diversity of approaches to Muslim piety and their social and political expression; popular culture; non-Muslims in Islamic society; and the creation of the medieval Islamic "international" cultural order. Among the more important themes will be long-term cultural and social continuities with the Islamic and ancient Near East, and concepts of religious and political authority.

HIST 30082. Christianity in the Middle East

(3-0-3)

The spread of Christianity from Palestine to the West is well documented. Less well known is the development of Christianity in the lands of its origin, the Middle East. This course introduces students to the largely untold story of Christianity that expresses itself in the native Aramaic language and culture of the Semitic East. Topics include the origins of the indigenous Christian churches of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Armenia, Iraq, and Iran; and the development of these traditions will be viewed in relation to Western/European forms of Christianity that have come to dominate and that are viewed as "mainstream" and "normative." The course concludes with an assessment of the impact of religious "fundamentalisms," the diaspora of Middle Eastern Christians throughout Europe and the United States, and the contemporary state of Christianity in the Middle East.

HIST 30085. Modern Middle East

(3-0-3)

This course surveys Middle Eastern history from 1500 to the present. The primary themes to be covered include the emergence and demise of the last Muslim unitary states; European colonial and imperial penetration of the Middle East in the 19th century; the social and cultural impact of imperialism; state-building in the 20th century; new ideologies/nationalisms; and contemporary problems of political and economic development. We will also consider the most important movements of Islamic reform and revival over the past two centuries.

HIST 30086. Twentieth-Century Jerusalem

(3-0-3)

This course examines the relationship between what could roughly be defined as "the West" (Europe and the United States) and Middle Eastern societies from the Napoleonic invasion of Egypt in 1798 until the American invasion of Iraq in 2003. We shall start by trying to make sense of the terms the "West" and the "Middle East." We shall then explore different and eclectic themes such as European colonial penetration into the Middle East, reciprocal stereotypes of the Middle East and the West, cultural exchanges between these regions, and the relationship between contemporary Europe and its growing Muslim population. We shall also examine American involvement in the region by focusing on themes such as oil interests, the Arab-Israeli conflict, and the Iraqi imbroglio. Finally, we shall discuss contemporary Middle Eastern perceptions of the West in light of American hegemonic power around the globe in general and in the Middle East in particular.

HIST 30087. The Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

(3-0-3)

This class discusses the roots, evolution, current situation and prospects of resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In order to better understand this theme the class will also locate this conflict in larger regional and global perspectives. Thus, issues such as nationalism in the Middle East, colonial impact in the region, the Arab states and their involvement in the conflict, cold war and post-cold war dynamics, will all be an integral part of the class discussions. We will also juxtapose the competing narratives of Israelis and Palestinians towards this conflict. Finally, we will engage in an un-historical practice by looking at the future and thinking about possible avenues for concluding this protracted conflict.

HIST 30088. Middle East and the West

(3-0-3)

This course explores the complicated relationships between the Middle East and the Western world as they evolved over the past several centuries.

HIST 30099. Borders, Boundaries, Frontiers

(3-0-3)

This course explores political borders, boundaries and frontiers and their changing meaning and dynamics from the beginning of the colonial era (circa 1500) until the present. We will explore the formation of political borders, life along borders and border conflicts and their resolutions (or lack thereof). Themes, including colonialism and globalization, will also be discussed through the prism of political boundaries. Geographically we will look at areas including the Middle East, Africa, Europe, South Asia and the U.S.-Mexican border in order to analyze boundaries through both global and regional perspectives.

HIST 30106. Modern South Asia

(3-0-3) Sengupta

Home to over a billion people, just over 23 percent of humanity, the South Asian subcontinent is a fascinating laboratory in which to analyze the unfolding of such themes in modern history as colonialism, nationalism, partition, decolonization, post-colonial democracies, the modern state, economic development, center-region problems, and relations between Asia and the West. The course will consider critical themes in social, political, economic, and cultural history, which will include imperialism, capitalism, nationalism, religious politics, regionalism, ethnicity, globalization, diaspora, ecology, social inequality, and gender development and democracy. It will not only provide a lively historical narrative told through lectures based on scholarly research and primary texts, but will also seek to embellish this narrative with the perception and articulation of vision and sound, as well as with readings from representative genres of South Asian literature.

HIST 30110. Ancient Japan

(3-0-3)

This course provides training in understanding and engaging history as a series of wide-ranging debates. The class will examine three issues: first, the politically charged question of Japan's origins in myth and archeology; second, the question of whether the forces of Chinese culture or nature as disease and environmental degradation defined the Yamato state from the sixth to the ninth century; and, third, whether Heian court power until about 1200 rested on economic, political, military, judicial, or aesthetic grounds. The second purpose of the course, the development of the disciplined imagination necessary to enter another culture and another time, relies on the reading of primary texts in translation. There will be three tests and several classroom assignments.

HIST 30115. Japan's Imperial House

(3-0-3)

Japan boasts the longest, unbroken imperial line extant today, but what does this continuity really mean? This course looks at Japan's emperors and empresses from antiquity to the present, raising questions about the nature of power, the idea of good government, gender, divinity, war responsibility, and the liberty of the family now called upon to symbolize a purportedly democratic nation. Although most of the course will focus on modern emperors, it begins with Japan's earliest political structures in order to ask such questions as: Was the Imperial House an indigenous idea or was it an imitation of Chinese ideas of power? Why were there so many powerful women leaders in ancient Japan and why did Japan stop having empresses on the throne? What is the relationship between the imperial house and the various religions of Japan? The course will then consider the medieval and Tokugawa periods asking why powerful samurai failed to overthrow the militarily impotent emperors. Finally, the course will turn to the modern period, beginning in the middle of the 19th century with the elevation of the Meiji Emperor to unprecedented prominence. Why was the ancient imperial house used to modernize Japan? Even though sex of emperors has been male for centuries, why were ancient emperors female and why is the imperial gender (and Japan as a whole) in the modern period often regarded as female? Was Hirohito guilty of fomenting war? What is the function of the Imperial House today? This course sweeps through myth and 1,500 years of Japanese history, tracing the permutations, continuities, and discontinuities of the imperial line.

HIST 30120. Modern Japan

(3-0-3)

This introduction to modern Japanese history focuses on political, social, economic, and military affairs in Japan from around 1600 to the early post-WWII period. It considers such paradoxes as samurai bureaucrats, entrepreneurial peasants, upper-class revolutionaries, and Asian fascists. The course has two purposes: (1) to provide a chronological and structural framework for understanding the debates over modern Japanese history; and (2) to develop the skill of reading texts analytically to discover the argument being made. The assumption operating both in the selection of readings and in the lectures is that Japanese history, as with all histories, is the site of controversy. Our efforts at this introductory level will be dedicated to understanding the contours of some of the most important of these controversies and judging, as far as possible, the evidence brought to bear in them.

HIST 30125. Japan Through the Camera Lens

(3-0-3)

Japanese culture embraced the camera almost as soon as it was invented in Europe. Even while the Japanese government rigorously controlled contact with outside nations, this new device for recording and exploring the world entered a Japanese port and was put to use by Japanese and, eventually, by foreigners to document Japan's opening to the West, its military adventures, its transformation into an industrial and consumer society, and its erotic longing. This course uses photography and film and writing about art and politics as a way of exploring key issues in Japanese society.

HIST 30140. Pre-Modern China

(3-0-3)

The course will provide a general survey of Chinese history from the Shang Dynasty (1766–1027 B.C.) to A.D. 1600. Besides highlighting the major developments of each dynasty, the course will devote special attention to the Confucian and legalist underpinnings of the Chinese empire, the influence of Buddhism on Chinese society, the emergence of gentry culture and the civil service examination system, and the phenomenon of "barbarian" conquest and cultural interaction.

HIST 30141. History of Chinese Medicine

(3-0-3) Murray

In light of the contemporary currency of certain Chinese practices in the field of alternative medicine, this course will explore the phenomenon of Chinese traditional medicine in both its historical and contemporary settings. The first unit, Medicine in Ancient China, will explore the earliest medical ideas of the Chinese and will demonstrate how the state's political unification gave rise to a correlative cosmology that not only included Heaven and Earth, but also human beings as integral elements of an organic cosmos. The second unit will explore the influences and contributions of Taoism (Daoism) and Buddhism to Chinese medicine and will explore what it meant to be both physicians and patients in late imperial China. The third unit will focus on medicine in contemporary China and will feature the experiences of Elisabeth Hsu, a student of Chinese medical anthropology who, as a part of her doctoral research, enrolled as a student in Yunnan Traditional Chinese Medical College between September 1988 and December 1989. We will conclude the course with a brief examination of the influence of Chinese medicine on the contemporary world.

HIST 30142. Chinese Mosaic: Philosophy, Politics, and Religion

(3-0-3)

This course is a special-topics class that provides an introduction to the diverse life ways constituting the puzzle of the Chinese people. The course will chart the terrain of current Chinese imagination as it has been shaped from the contending, and often contentious, influences of religion, philosophy, and politics, introducing students to the heralded works of the Chinese intellectual tradition while at the same time requiring critical engagement with the philosophic and religious traditions animating this culture. Thus, as they learn about China, students will also reflect on how it has been interpreted by Chinese and by Westerners. From readings in both primary texts and secondary interpretations, the class will reconstruct the ethos of the Chinese, attending particularly to the ways in which inherited traditions have been affected by the rise of the modern, authoritarian state. Our concerns will include questions of philosophy as a response to moral crisis, the abridgement of tradition in ideology, the creative reinvention and persistence of popular religion, and the politics of representation. From our attempts to address these concerns, we will reconstitute the philosophic discourse of ancient China and the religious practice of the present in an unconventional, but more evocative, manner that engenders understanding of contemporary political resistance to single-party rule.

HIST 30143. Chinese Ways of Thought

(3-0-3) Jensen

This is a special-topics class on religion, philosophy, and the intellectual history of China. Conventionally, it is assumed that the religion and philosophy of the Chinese can be easily divided into three teachings: Daoism, Buddhism, and "Confucianism." This class questions this easy doctrinal divisibility by introducing the student to the world-view and life experience of Chinese as they have been drawn and local cultic traditions, worship and sacrifice to heroes, city gods, earth gods, water sprites, nature deities, and above all, the dead. China's grand philosophical legacy of Daoism, Buddhism, "Confucianism," and later "Neo-Confucianism" with which we have become familiar in the West, derived from the particular historical contexts of local practice and it was also in such indigenous contexts that Islam and later Christianity were appropriated as native faiths.

HIST 30144. Introduction to Chinese Culture and Civilization

(3-0-3) Yang

This is a survey course that introduces the students with little or no knowledge of the Chinese language or culture to the major aspects of Chinese cultural tradition from the dawn of its civilization to the present time. Readings (in English translation) include traditional Chinese historical, philosophical, political, religious and literary texts as well as modern scholarship. Students are encouraged to bring in their experience, living or reading, of Western culture in order to approach the Chinese texts from a comparative perspective. This course will use a combination of lectures, discussion, and presentation by students. Movie documentaries will also be used from time to time. Reading assignments should be done before the lectures and in the sequence as they are given in the course schedule for each class so that the students may be ready for discussion in class. Whereas their amount and level of difficulty vary, the texts always demand careful and thoughtful reading.

HIST 30150. Modern China

(3-0-3)

The course will provide a general survey of Chinese history from 1644 (the establishment of the Qing Dynasty) to the present. It will highlight China's evolution from a period of strength and unity during the last dynasty to a period of disunity and weakness during the revolutionary period 1911–49, back to a period of strength under the communist government from 1949 to the present. Special attention will be given to the problems of economic modernization, the role that foreigners have played in this process, and the relationship of both to cultural development.

HIST 30169. Sex, Freedom, and Economy in Contemporary China

(3-0-3)

Today China is undergoing a revolution (a word used so frequently as to be meaningless, but very meaningful in this case as we will learn) in society, politics, economy, and thought perhaps as significant as that which brought the Chinese Communist Party to national power in 1949. The objective of this course, constructed through film and new media investigation, along with readings on social status, identity, sexuality, work, home, youth culture, gender, business, education, sports, and ecology, is to come to an understanding of the multiple domestic forces that have made China a global power. Furthermore, the course will familiarize the student with the very complex ramifications of the passionate national quest for international recognition as it affects every aspect of present-day life while exploring the mercurial manner in which the economic transformation of China has been represented in the media. In this last respect, it represents an experiment in cultural studies in that its avowed subject, contemporary China, is studied in dialogue with the United States—the two nations most exemplifying the promise and terror of modernization. No knowledge of Chinese or previous knowledge of China is required.

HIST 30189. South Asia: Colonialism and Nationalism

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the colonial encounter in the Indian subcontinent; i.e. the period of the advent, establishment, and collapse of British colonial power during the period roughly between 1750 and 1950. It will explore the nature of this encounter and its impact on the subcontinent, particularly the emergence of modern nationalisms and the making of the modern South Asian nation-states of India and Pakistan. Recent scholarship on British colonialism and Indian nationalism has been rich and diverse, examining areas ranging from the nature of “anti-colonial” nationalism to the impact on the economy, on state practices, social structures such as caste, peasant resistance, gender relations and modern history-writing itself. One of the objectives of the course is to introduce students to some of the major historical debates in South Asian history through the concepts of “nationalism,” “colonialism,” and “modernity.” Another is to think about the ways in which this encounter has been represented in different kinds of texts ranging from scholarly texts to fiction and films.

HIST 30201. History of Christianity to 1500

(3-0-3)

A survey of the development of Christianity from late antiquity to the eve of the 16th-century Reformation. Emphases include processes of Christianization, definitions of prescribed and proscribed beliefs and practices, institutional elaboration, relations with imperial and royal authority, impact of and on culture, and varieties of religious behaviors. Although the history of the Latin (Catholic) church is highlighted, the dynamics and consequences of its separation first from the Oriental and then from the Orthodox churches will be examined. The course aspires to achieve a routine of interactive lectures. There will, in addition, be three small-group reading seminars and at least one individual conference. Requirements include three short (five to six pages) papers that engage the texts discussed in the seminars, midterm and final examinations, class attendance, and participation. The written examinations seek to assess knowledge applied as analysis.

HIST 30202. History of Catholicism, 300 to 1500

(3-0-3)

Course explores the evolution of Catholicism from 300 to 1500.

HIST 30211. Sex and Gender in Greco-Roman Antiquity

(3-0-3)

This course examines the differing roles and stereotypes, forms of behavior, and values associated with women and men in Greco-Roman antiquity. Special attention is given to the preoccupations of the Greeks and Romans with the categories of “female” and “male” and to the dynamics of relations and relationships between women and men. The course both deepens knowledge of Greco-Roman society and provides an informed background for contemporary gender debates.

HIST 30212. History of Ancient Medicine

(3-0-3) Ladouceur

This course traces the development of medicine in the ancient Mediterranean world, concentrating on the medical beliefs, theories, and practices of the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. The course emphasizes the value of studying written sources such as the Hippocratic treatises and the works of Galen with artistic evidence and human remains. A connection between ancient and modern medicine is made by considering two contrasting models of disease, the biomedical and the biopsychosocial, that figure as the focus of a contemporary debate on health care.

HIST 30215. Sport and Spectacle in the Ancient World

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the centrality of athletics and spectacle in Ancient Greece and Rome. Beginning with a survey of sport practices in Mesopotamia and Egypt, the course moves on to discuss the role of athletics in Greek culture, including studies of the ancient Pan-Hellenic games like the Olympia, Homeric sport, Athenian citizen-athletes, and Spartan soldier-athletes. The latter part of the class concentrates on contests in the Roman Empire, to include an examination of the origin and development of the ultimate spectacle: the gladiatorial combats. We will also examine chariot racing in the Roman Empire, both the racers and the fans, who became the first sport fanatics in the world. The course will also discuss the role of sport in society, sport and gender in the ancient world and modern (mis)conceptions of ancient athletics. The course materials will be multimedia, with readings in English.

HIST 30220. History of Ancient Greece

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: CLAS 32105

The purpose of the course is to provide a basic narrative history of Greece from the Bronze Age through the Roman conquest. The second purpose is systematic insight into special problems of two key phases of Greek development, the archaic and classical periods. The rapid growth of the city-states and the cultural ideals and problems that led to the invention of philosophy and tragedy are considered. The course then takes up the institutions and policies of democratic and imperialistic Athens and the political theories they embodied. The class ends with a look at the new Hellenistic world and the impact of Greek values on Christianity. The grade is based primarily on two essay exams plus the final.

HIST 30221. Democracy and the Greeks

(3-0-3) Baron

This course builds on CLAS 30105, The History of Ancient Greece, and examines the theory, practice, and development of ancient Greek, especially Athenian democracy. Particular attention is devoted to comparing ancient with modern forms of democracy. Among the special topics studied are the origins of democracy, its advantages and disadvantages as a form of government, Greek ideas of alternatives to democracy, and democracy as an abiding legacy of Greek civilization to the modern world.

HIST 30223. The Age of Alexander

(3-0-3) Baron

This course examines the military achievements of Alexander of Macedon (356–323 B.C.) and their far-reaching political, social, cultural, and religious consequences. Topics covered include the Greek, Macedonian, Persian, and other cultural contexts of the time, Alexander's attitude toward divinity (including his own), his concept of empire, his generalship, and his legacy for Greco-Roman antiquity. Particular attention is devoted to representations of Alexander through the ages, beginning during his own lifetime with the accounts of ancient writers (historians and others) down to novels and films of the present day. Ancient authors and documents are read in translation.

HIST 30230. The History of Ancient Rome

(3-0-3) Hernandez

Corequisite: CLAS 32205

An outline introduction to the history of ancient Rome from Romulus to Constantine. The topics covered include the meteoric spread of Roman rule in the ancient Mediterranean, the brilliance of a republican form of government tragically swept away by destructive civil war, the rise of repressive autocracy under the Caesars, and the threats to empire in late antiquity posed inside by the rise of Christianity and outside by hostile invaders. Readings include narrative, documentary, and archaeological sources. The course prepares students for advanced study in ancient history. Offered biennially.

HIST 30231. Roman Law and Governance

(3-0-3)

The course will provide a historical overview of Roman Republican and Imperial law from the XII Tables to Justinian's Digest. We will investigate not only the Roman judiciary and juristic writings, but also the other branches of government, in order to create a thorough understanding of the bureaucratic operation of the ancient Roman state. Specific topics covered include civil law, criminal law, constitutions, juries, jurists, magistracies, assemblies, and provincial administration. In addition to taking a midterm and final, students will write and rewrite one three- to five-page paper. Prior study of Roman history is recommended, but not required.

HIST 30232. Roman Literature and Culture

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the leading works of ancient Roman literature and examines the cultural contexts in which they were written, received, and transmitted. Students read poetry and prose from many genres, and sample works from 600 years of literary versatility that combined enormous originality with a literary tradition inherited from the Greeks. Among the authors introduced are Plautus, Lucretius, Catullus, Cicero, Horace, Livy, Lucan, Tacitus, Apuleius, Ammianus, and Augustine. Special attention is paid the formal structures of Roman literary works, the cultural issue they raise, and the lasting value of Latin literature to the modern age. The course prepares students for more advanced study in classical literature and culture. Offered annually.

HIST 30233. The Roman Revolution

(3-0-3)

This course builds on the work of CLAS 30012 and CLAS 30022 and examines the climactic events in Roman history of the late first century B.C. and early first century A.D. that changed Rome from an open republic to a repressive military monarchy. Chronologically, the course begins with the appearance on the Roman political stage of the unabashedly ambitious Julius Caesar, and ends with the accession of a hereditary autocrat in the person of the morose ruler Tiberius. Exploring a variety of sources, the course focuses on the political tensions and civil commotions of the revolutionary era associated with warlords such as Pompey, Crassus, Caesar, and Antony, and concentrates especially on the rise to power of Augustus, the most ruthless warlord of all, and his creation of a personal political regime that was to last in style for centuries.

HIST 30250. The World of the Middle Ages

(3-0-3) Noble

Corequisite: MI 22001

The Middle Ages have been praised and reviled, romanticized, and fantasized. The spectacular popularity of Harry Potter, The Lord of the Rings, and Narnia have brought a revival of interest in and curiosity about the Middle Ages. But what were they like, these 10 centuries between Rome and the Renaissance? In this course, we will explore major themes and issues in medieval civilization in an attempt to offer some basic answers to that question. We will have in view three kinds of people: rulers, lovers, and believers. But we will also study carefully those who wrote about those kinds of people. We will constantly ask how can we know about the Middle Ages, and what kinds of things can we know? We will consider major literary texts as both works of art and historical documents. We will explore various kinds of religious literature. We will try to understand the limits, boundaries, and achievements of philosophy and theology. Some lectures will incorporate medieval art so as to add a visual dimension to our explorations. This course will constitute an extended introduction to the dynamic and fascinating world of the Middle Ages.

HIST 30255. Medieval Cities

(3-0-3) Constable

Corequisite: HIST 32255

This course will cover the structure and development of urban centers in Europe and the Mediterranean world from the late antique period until the 14th century. The course will begin with a general discussion of modern urban theory together with ancient and medieval conceptions of what makes a "city." From this point, we will track the history of urban life in medieval Europe, Byzantium, and the Islamic World, with lectures devoted to urban geography, architecture, society, economy, and demography. We will also look in depth at medieval life in individual cities, including London, Paris, Cairo, and Constantinople, in order to consider variations in urban society and institutions in different regions.

HIST 30260. Late Antiquity

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the transformation of the Roman World from about A.D. 300 to 600. We will ask: was the "fall" of the Roman Empire a civilizational catastrophe? Or was it a slow, messy process blending continuity and change? Or was late antiquity, itself, a dynamic and creative period? Our emphasis will fall on the changing shape of Roman public life; the barbarians and their relations with Rome; the emergence of the Catholic Church; the triumph of Christian culture; and literature, art, and architecture in the late imperial world. There will be a midterm and a final. Students will write either one term paper or a series of shorter papers. Readings will emphasize primary sources.

HIST 30261. Middle Ages I

(3-0-3) Perett

This course will examine the history of the Roman world from the time of the first incursions of barbarians into the Roman Empire in the third century to the time of the final invasions in the 10th. It will concentrate first on the crises of the third century, and on the consequent transformation of the relatively unified, urbanized, tolerant, polytheistic Roman Empire of late antiquity into the two distinct, deurbanized, intolerant, monotheistic, and politically divided civilizations of Latin or Catholic Christendom and Greek or Orthodox Christendom. Next, it will briefly examine the emergence in the seventh century of the new monotheistic religion of Islam and of the new civilization and empire centered on it, which quickly conquered not only the old Persian Empire but most of the Asian and all of the African provinces of the continuing Roman Empire, and in 711–18 conquered most of Spain as well. The remainder of the course will concentrate on the history of Latin Christendom and its pagan barbarian neighbors to the north and east between the beginning of the Germanic conquests of the western provinces c. 400 and the final conversion of the peoples of central and northern Europe to Christianity and the simultaneous emergence of a new socio-political order in the older kingdoms around 1000. There will be two short papers, two tests, and a final examination.

HIST 30263. Age of Charlemagne

(3-0-3)

The Carolingian (from Carolus, Latin for Charles: Charles the Great—Charlemagne—was the most famous Carolingian) period, roughly the 8th and 9th centuries, was foundational for Western Europe. But this was also the time when the mid-Byzantine Empire consolidated its position and when the Abbasid family of caliphs introduced important and durable changes in the Islamic world. This course will focus on the West in the age of Charlemagne, but will draw frequent comparisons with and make continuous reference to Europe's Byzantine and Islamic neighbors. The course will explore such themes as Europe's Roman and Christian inheritances from antiquity; the peoples of the Carolingian world; kingship and empire; political and social institutions and ideologies; religious and secular law; war and diplomacy; agriculture and trade; the church—popes, bishops, monks, and nuns; theology; art and architecture; Latin and vernacular literature. Reading assignments will combine modern scholarship and primary sources (in translation). Students will write midterm and final examinations and will choose between several short papers or one long paper.

HIST 30270. Middle Ages II

(3-0-3)

This course is a thematic survey of the high (1000–1300) and late (1300–1500) Middle Ages. The course begins with an introduction to three emblematic developments of the high Middle Ages: cathedral building, the crusading movement, and the beginnings of the universities. Themes addressed include the nature of high medieval religion, the agricultural and commercial revolutions, and high medieval politics and patronage. Treating the later Middle Ages, the course focuses upon a catastrophic event and an epic poem. The Black Death (and related late-medieval catastrophes) has traditionally been seen as marking a turning point in European history. To what extent is this so? Finally, Dante's Inferno will offer a window into key issues of late-medieval religious culture, including papal politics, the role of the laity in religion, late-medieval philosophical thought, heresy, and the Italian city-state as the site of a new Renaissance of learning.

HIST 30272. Twelfth-Century Renaissance and Reform

(3-0-3)

Twelfth-century European Renaissance and reform.

HIST 30273. World of the Late Middle Ages, 1300–1500

(3-0-3)

The course studies Europe in the time of the late middle ages, roughly 1300–1500, often called a time of crisis: plague, war, rebellion, and economic upheaval. But it was also a time of enormous achievement, of Dante and Chaucer, of new techniques in warfare and government, of conciliar representation in church and state, and of extravagant display in fashion and building. This course will proceed by way of both secondary and primary readings, with at least three short papers and student discussion required.

HIST 30274. Violence in Late Medieval and Renaissance Europe

(3-0-3) Rapple

Violence was a dominant feature of life in late medieval and Renaissance Europe, and students in this course will explore that violence in all its manifestations—political, economic, military, cultural, and social.

HIST 30282. The Medieval Mind

(3-0-3)

This course offers an introduction to thought and culture in the European Middle Ages, the era of romance, scholastic theologians, and female mystics. After a relatively brief look at the early Middle Ages, the course will focus on the origins of the literature of love and chivalry, of schoolmen in universities, and of women religious writers. There is a general textbook to guide the course, but much of the reading will be in primary sources, that is, in the thinkers and poets and mystics of the medieval period.

HIST 30290. Castles and Courts in Medieval Europe

(3-0-3) Boulton

The expanded title of this course is Castles, Castellannies, and Courts in Latin Europe, 900–1650. This course will examine the high period in the history of the castle—a combination of fort and residence—of the castellany or district subjected to the domination of a castle, and of the household and court of the kings, princes, and barons who built such residences and organized their lives and their activities within their various structures. It will first consider the castle as a form of fortification, review briefly the history of fortifications before 900 and examine the ways in which lords and their builders steadily improved their defensive capabilities in response to new knowledge and to new methods and tools of siegecraft. It will then examine the relationship of the castle to the contemporary forms of non-fortified or semi-fortified house, and finally its relationship to the lordly household (the body of servants organized into numerous departments associated with particular rooms or wings of the castle) and with the court (or body of soldiers, officers, allies, students, and temporary guests) who filled the castle when the lord was present. The course will conclude with an examination of the history of the castellany as a form of jurisdiction. The course will concentrate on the castles of the British Isles and France, but will examine the great variety of types found throughout Latin Europe.

HIST 30291. Politics and Religion in Medieval Europe

(3-0-3)

This course considers the intersection between political action and religious claims in medieval Europe. Virtually all the powers—kings and popes, princes and bishops—claimed to act on religious principle and in accord with transcendent notions of virtue or world order. And yet they fought bitterly with each other, with words and with swords, and mutually condemned one another. The course will begin with the showdown between emperors and popes known as the investiture contest, then take up pivotal figures such as Pope Innocent III, King Frederick II, and Pope Boniface IX, and conclude with sections on the spiritual Franciscans and on conciliarism. Two papers based on primary sources, one midterm, and a final.

HIST 30320. The Viking Age and the World of the Norse

(3-0-3) Luckhardt

Vikings are usually painted in modern popular culture as either fierce warriors or bloodthirsty pagan barbarians who descended upon peaceful monks or settlements without cause. The negative view is largely based on the sources written by the early medieval victims of Viking raids, while later medieval Scandinavian saga literature tended to characterize their warrior ancestors as noble savages. Ever since, historians have examined the Vikings as embodying one of these two extremes. However, Viking raids were merely one part of a complex adaptation by the Norse people to the marginal lands of Scandinavia. Raids certainly occurred, but so, too, did explorations, foreign settlement, trade, and extended subsistence activities at the home in Scandinavia. The Norse were also savvy merchants, gifted craftsmen, hardworking farmers, and cunning political players who built kingdoms in Europe, established relations with the Muslim world, and even made it to the shores of North America. In this course students will explore the culture, history, arts and worldviews of the Old Norse, including their mythology, the saga literature, and their conversion to Christianity. They will also investigate how the Vikings have been understood and represented through the centuries between their days and ours, and will ask questions about how our knowledge of the Vikings is produced. This course is open to all students; no previous knowledge of the topic is necessary.

HIST 30321. Early Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3) Rapple

Consideration of the period between 950 and 1400 is of crucial importance in understanding Irish history. This course not only covers the range of continuities and radical discontinuities that marked Ireland's development during this time, but also charts the attempted conquest of the entire country by the English Crown. The lecture series also seeks to answer a number of questions. Why did the papacy give the English Crown sovereignty over Ireland? Why did a country like Ireland, on the verge of attaining political and economic centralization, not organize better resistance to English attempts to subdue it? Why did the English colony fail to prove more successful in exerting its will over indigenous Irish potentates? Culturally the period also witnessed the growing assimilation of English invaders to the norms of Gaelic Irish politics and society. Lastly, events in Ireland had a serious influence on developments in England, Wales, and Scotland, provoking, amongst other things, the fall of the Plantagenet dynasty and an attempted invasion by King Robert I of Scotland.

HIST 30330. Muslims and Christians in Medieval Europe

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32330

The encounter between Christianity and Islam began in the 7th century A.D., the time of the Prophet Muhammad. Within a few centuries, Islamic rule had spread across the southern Mediterranean world from Syria to Spain. This shift initiated a long-term relationship—sometimes hostile and sometimes peaceful—between Christians and Muslims in these regions. The neighboring presence of Islam had an enduring influence on medieval Christian theology, philosophy, medical knowledge, literature, culture, imagination, art, and material life. Likewise, developments in Christian Europe and Byzantium, especially the Crusades, affected the Islamic world. This course will trace the history of the Christian-Muslim relationship, from its beginnings in the early medieval period until the Renaissance (15th century). The heritage of this medieval encounter still has profound resonance in the modern world of today.

HIST 30331. Medieval Spain: Land of Three Religions

(3-0-3)

This lecture course will cover the history of medieval Spain from the Visigothic period (6th to the 7th centuries) until the time of Ferdinand and Isabella (15th century). The main focus of the course will be the interaction (both congenial and confrontational) of the three religious groups resident in the Iberian Peninsula: Christians, Jews, and Muslims. The course will proceed roughly chronologically, with pauses to consider particular topics in social, intellectual, and economic history. Interspersed with lectures, discussion sessions will concentrate on close readings of primary texts and consideration of some of the historiographical problems peculiar to Spanish history. There will be several short papers, a midterm, and a final exam.

HIST 30352. Storming Heaven: Christianity in the Reformation Era

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32352

A narrative history of Christianity in Western Europe from c. 1500 to c. 1650, which takes an international and comparative perspective, including Catholicism, Protestantism, and radical Protestantism. Topics covered include Christianity on the eve of the Reformation, Christian humanism, Luther and the German Reformation, the Peasants' War and Anabaptism, the English Reformation, Calvin and Calvinism, Catholic Reform and the Council of Trent, the French Wars of Religion, confessionalization, the Thirty Years War, and the English Revolution. Major themes include matters of religious content (doctrinal positions and devotional sensibilities), the relationship between different Christian groups and political regimes, the impact of religious changes across the population, and the definitive emergence of Christian pluralism. Lectures plus discussion.

HIST 30353. The Catholic Reformation

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32353

This course will examine some of the main historical realities, theological developments, and traditions of spirituality within Roman Catholicism c. 1450–c. 1700, the period of Catholic reform both before and after the emergence of the Protestant Reformation. The class format will be two lectures plus one discussion-based tutorial section per week, the latter based on the reading of primary sources in translation. Major topics to be discussed include the character of the late medieval church and reforming efforts within it (e.g., the Observantine movement, Christian humanism); Roman Catholic response to the Protestant Reformation, including the Roman Inquisition; the revival of existing and emergence of new religious orders (especially the Society of Jesus); the Council of Trent and its implementation among the clergy and laity; Catholic missionary activity in Asia and the Americas; post-Tridentine Catholic art and scholarship; the relationship between the Church and European states in the 16th and 17th centuries; Jansenism; and the flowering of Catholic spirituality in the 17th century.

HIST 30401. History of Christianity II, 1500 to the Present

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the development of modern Christianity, with emphasis on the West. Subjects include ideas and movements of reform, church government and structures, missionary enterprises, forms of spirituality and worship, and the political role and cultural impact of Christianity. Requirements: two examinations and class participation, including three reading seminars with papers.

HIST 30402. History of Catholicism Since 1500

(3-0-3) Sullivan

This course surveys the development of modern Catholicism, with an emphasis on Europe. Subjects include ideas and movements of reform, church government and structures, missionary enterprises, forms of spirituality and worship, and the political role and cultural impact of the Church.

HIST 30405. Europe from the French Revolution to World War I

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32405

During this time, Europe changed dramatically in ways that shaped the 20th century: political reform movements advocating nationalism, democracy, and socialism challenged established regimes; the industrial revolution led to massive changes in society and the economy, including the emergence of a large and affluent middle class and an industrial proletariat; European states consolidated power and mobilized popular support and an advanced technology for wars in Europe and throughout the world, into which they expanded as colonial powers; writers, artists, and composers reacted to the changes and conflicts with novels, paintings, songs, and symphonies that, in their variety of styles, suggest the vitality and anxiety of this period.

HIST 30406. Europe in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3)

This course presents a general history of the world from a European perspective, 1917 to 1989. The goal of this course is to convey a broad understanding of various policies—what they have and have not been, the major problems they faced, and the directions they might be taking. The approach of the course is neither revisionist nor traditionalist. In such controversial areas, it is impossible to give really broad answers that everyone will find acceptable.

HIST 30407. Europe Between The Wars

(3-0-3)

Between the end of the First World War and the beginning of the second, there were only 20 years. But during this short period were Hitler, Stalin, the Great Crisis, the League of Nations, and much more. Understanding the present requires knowledge of these pivotal years.

HIST 30408. The Holocaust

(3-0-3)

In this lecture/discussion class, we will study the Nazi German program of mass killings that has come to be known as the Holocaust. We will explore the ideas, decisions, and actions that culminated in the murder of an estimated hundred thousand people deemed handicapped, half a million Roma (Gypsies), and six million European Jews. The role of historical prejudices, the impact of National Socialist ideology and leadership, and the crucial factor of the war itself will all be considered. We will address the experiences of those targeted for annihilation as well as the actions of perpetrators and the role of others: bystanders, witnesses, and rescuers. At the same time we will examine how attacks on other groups—for example, homosexuals, Polish intellectuals, Soviet prisoners of war, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Afro-Germans—fit into the overall Nazi scheme for a "new world order.” The legacy of the Holocaust after 1945 will be discussed as well. Course requirements include short papers in response to weekly readings, a comparative book review, and a cumulative final exam.

HIST 30409. History of Europe Since 1945

(3-0-3)

This course will include discussion of the history, politics, and culture of the post-World War II period. Beginning with the destruction wrought by the war, it will examine closely the tie between the economic-political resurgence of Europe, and the development of the “cold war.” Important subjects covered include the development of the European Union, the development of consumer societies, the 1968 turmoil in both the West and East, the establishment and eventual collapse of the dictatorships in Russia and eastern Europe, the growing internationalization of European economies after the 1960s, the “normalization” of politics and societies after 1970, the end of the cold war, and the major role of European countries throughout the world in the contemporary period. Naturally, the role of individuals in these broad transformations will not be neglected.

HIST 30410. Tudor England: Politics and Honor

(3-0-3) Rapple

The period from 1485 to 1603, often feted as something of a “Golden Age” for England, saw that country undergo serious changes that challenged the traditional ways in which the nation conceived of itself. These included the break from Rome, the loss of England’s foothold in France, and the unprecedented experience of monarchical rule by women. Each of these challenges demanded creative political responses and apologetic strategies harnessing intellectual resources from classical, Biblical, legal, chivalric and ecclesiastical sources. This course will examine these developments. It will also look at how the English, emerging from under the shadow of the internecine dynastic warfare of the 15th century, sought to preserve political stability and ensure a balance between continuity and change, and, furthermore, how individuals could use these unique circumstances to their own advantage.

HIST 30411. British History: 1660–1800

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course of lectures and readings concentrates on British (that is, Scottish as well as English) history from the restoration of monarchy in 1660 to the great crisis detonated by the French Revolution and war in the 1790s. Themes include the politics of Protestant dissent, political ideologies, the role of parliament, Jacobitism, and the rise of the radical parliamentary reform movement.

HIST 30415. England Since 1789

(3-0-3)

The course involves, besides lectures, reading and thinking about and discussing both the history and the interpretation of major elements in the development of modern English politics, society, and culture. Requirements include regular class attendance and participation, midterm and final examinations, and 20 to 25 pages of writing associated with the small seminars into which the class will divide a few times during the semester.

HIST 30416. Nineteenth-Century Britain: The Great Victorian Experiment

(3-0-3)

A thematic survey of Great Britain during the long 19th century, from the impact of the French revolution in 1789 to World War I in 1914. The period saw the emergence of many of the most characteristic and most controversial features of the modern world, such as industrialism, capitalism, the welfare state, the expansion of civil and political rights, and the colonial development of the nonwestern world. The course uses the three themes of introspection, innovation, and inquiry to understand these changes. Nineteenth-century Britain is known for its earnestness, the intensity with which its elites scrutinized their souls on everything from the foundations of faith to social responsibility to their own sexuality. It is known also for an enormous amount of social-technical innovation, planned and unplanned, of steam engines, sewers, and slums; of new ways of organizing work and handling money; of new aspirations; of new classes and class relations; and of new modes of social organization and social control. Finally, it is known as a time of passionate spirit of inquiry; a time of a massive increase in literacy and of hunger for knowledge; and a time of immense confidence when it was felt that new knowledge from economics, sociology, biology, geography, and would provide true, rational, and fair answers to all political problems and conflicts.

HIST 30431. Modern Irish History 1: 1600–1800

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course explores the main themes in Irish histories from the plantation of Ulster, after 1603, to the rebellion of 1798 and the Act of Union with Great Britain in 1800. Attention focuses on plantation, colonization, and religious conflict; the Cromwellian reconquest and the Williamite wars in the 17th century; and the anti-Catholic penal laws and rise of Protestant Ascendancy in the 19th century. This dramatic and formative period witnessed the emergence of many of the forces and rivalries that shaped modern Irish politics and society and continues to generate lively disagreement among historians today.

HIST 30432. Modern Ireland II: Irish History Since 1800

(3-0-3)

This course will consist of lectures and readings examining Irish political history and Anglo-Irish relations from 1801 up to and including the current conflict in Northern Ireland. Attention will be given to religious conflict, the development of romantic and revolutionary nationalism, the changing nature of Anglo-Irish relations, and the special problems of the North. A mid-semester examination, a paper/essay, and a final will be required.

HIST 30434. Early Modern Ireland

(3-0-3) Rapple

This course offers new perspectives on the struggle for mastery in Ireland from 1470 to 1660. Though keeping in mind the traditional view of the “English reconquest” (decades of rebellion, dispossession, and plantation until, in the aftermath of Cromwell, all Ireland was finally subjected to English rule), this course will take a different approach. By investigating a range of primary sources from the period, students will explore the interactions between the three different models of conquest: (1) descendants of the old Norman colonists (e.g., Fitzgeralds and Butlers) seeking to finish the job; (2) Tudor reform (inspired by Renaissance optimism), by which the English attempted to establish rule by means of legal, social, and cultural assimilation; and (3) unabashed exploitation by English private entrepreneurs on the make. The most important effect of these “contending conquests” was the way they shaped the diverse responses of the native Irish, ranging from accommodation and assimilation to outright rebellion and national war.

HIST 30439. Debating Irish History: Conflicting Definitions of Ireland’s Past

(3-0-3)

There has long been disagreement between academic historians about how best to conceptualize Ireland’s troubled past. This course analyzes the approaches attempted in the 19th, 20th and 21st centuries to explain Ireland’s history and addresses a host of questions relevant to the history of any country. To what degree do influences like religious adherence, state loyalty and political commitment affect history writing? How can an historian best deal with the fact of human suffering? What is the difference between a terrorist and a freedom fighter? What effect do the constraints involved in the very process of writing history have on intelligent expression? Can a good history book ever be entirely satisfying to an ethnicity, a nation or a religious grouping?

HIST 30442. Medicine and Disease in Modern Ireland

(3-0-3) Grimsley-Smith

Ireland is among a handful of modern nations whose histories have been thoroughly transformed by disease events. These events, and the Great Famine in particular, are never simple “visitations of providence” that afflict an undifferentiated populace. They are, rather, inextricably linked with existing social structures and the exercise of power. Changes in government and society from the 1801 Act of Union with Great Britain through the relief of the penal laws against Catholics, emigration, electoral and land reform, and independence in the 20th century are reflected in the health (or lack thereof) of the Irish people. This course, therefore, is intended to introduce students to the social and political history of modern Ireland as seen through the lens of health and disease. While focusing on Irish conditions, we will discuss issues that remain especially relevant in our own time, including: Who is responsible for health? Is health a universal right? Who is the “public” in public health? Where are the boundaries of medical expertise, and how are they determined?

HIST 30450. France: From the Old Regime to the Revolution

(3-0-3) Kselman

Corequisite: HIST 32450

In 1700, France, under the Sun King, Louis XIV, was the most powerful state in Europe. Louis' court at Versailles was a brilliant cultural center, envied by the rest of Europe, whose kings saw France as a model to be emulated. In 1789, the French Revolution challenged and eventually destroyed the monarchy, but the power of France nonetheless grew. By 1800, France, under the leadership of the consul Napoleon, was expanding rapidly in Europe, and would eventually control an empire that included Spain, Italy, and much of central Europe. This course examines French history from the establishment of the Bourbon family on the throne in 1589 to the rise of Napoleon in 1790s, with about one-third of the class concentrating on the revolutionary events that began in 1789. The course is organized around major political developments, and seeks to understand how the monarchy, so potent in 1700, could have collapsed less than a century later. Students will also read, listen to, and view some of the great cultural achievements of the time—the plays of Moliere, the music of Lully, the novels of Voltaire, and the paintings of David. The course will generally consist of lectures on Monday and Wednesday and discussions on Friday. Students will read about six books, a mixture of primary and secondary sources, which will form the basis for discussions. There will be a midterm and a final, and students will also write one 10-page essay on a topic of their choice.

HIST 30451. Modern France

(3-0-3) Orr

Corequisite: HIST 32451

This course will survey the history of France in the 19th and 20th centuries and will balance attention to political and social developments with an interest in French culture. Themes will include the revolutions of the 19th century that culminated in a democratic republic; industrialization and the persistence of the peasant ideal; changes in women's roles, gender relations, and sexuality; colonialism and imperialism; victory in World War I; defeat and collaboration in World War II; the role of intellectuals in French social life; decolonization and postcolonialism; cultural and ethnic differences in contemporary France; and Franco American relations. Students will develop an appreciation for the vitality of the French past and an understanding of the current role of France in Europe and the world. The format will be lectures supplemented by discussions, readings, and some films.

HIST 30464. German History, 1740–1870

(3-0-3)

This course begins with Prussia's initial challenge to Austria's dominance in central Europe; it ends with the unification of Germany under Bismarck's Prussia—and Austria's exclusion from it. In addition to covering the on-going Austro-Prussian rivalry in Germany, the course will consider German History in a broad central European perspective that covers the variety of what was German-speaking Europe. We will cover the cultural, social, and political transformations of the period. Specific topics may include enlightened absolutism and the emergence of the “enlightened” police state, and the influence of the French Revolution in the German-speaking lands, as well as the revolutions of 1848 and the struggle for German unification. Additionally, we will cover larger long-term processes such as the emergence of civil society, political transformations such as the growth of German liberalism and nationalism and the emergence of socialism, and German contributions to larger cultural and intellectual fields such as the enlightenment and romanticism.

HIST 30465. Modern Germany

(3-0-3)

This course examines modern Germany from national unification in 1871 to the recent unification of the two Germanies and beyond. We will investigate cultural, political, and social dimensions of Germany's dynamic role in Europe and in the world. Topics include Bismarck and the founding of the Second Reich, World War I and the legacy of defeat, challenge and authority in the Weimar Republic, the National Socialist revolution, war and Holocaust, collapse of the Third Reich, conflict and accommodation in East and West Germany, and unification and its aftermath. Class format will combine lectures with discussion of readings from political, social, literary, and diplomatic sources.

HIST 30466. Adolf Hitler and Nazi Germany

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32466

An in-depth study of the rise of Adolf Hitler and national socialism from the foundation of the Weimar Republic to the end of World War II. This will include an examination of the origins of Nazi ideology, women and family life under Hitler, adaptation and resistance of the Christian churches, the Holocaust, and World War II and the German home front.

HIST 30470. Medieval and Early Modern Russia

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the history of Russia from its medieval origins until the age of Catherine the Great in the 18th century. We will begin with the genesis of Orthodox Slavic civilization in medieval Kievan Rus and that state's destruction in the Mongol invasion. Then we will study the rise of the tsardom of Muscovy and the fateful developments that nearly doomed it in the 16th–17th century: the reign of Ivan the Terrible, the Time of Troubles, the imposition of serfdom, the schism of the Orthodox Church, and widespread popular revolts. Lastly, we will see how Peter the Great and his 18th-century successors attempted to stabilize the social order, Westernize the upper classes, and make Russia a great European power.

HIST 30471. Early Imperial Russia, 1700 to 1861

(3-0-3)

The course begins in the early 1700s with the reforms of Peter the Great, which made Russia into a highly centralized, powerful, oppressive society whose nobles grew wealthy and Europeanized while its peasants were reduced to poverty and serfdom. Successive tsars made Russia the greatest power of continental Europe while failing to reform its increasingly archaic sociopolitical order. As a result, the regime ultimately faced a restive peasantry, a radicalized intelligentsia, and deepening economic and military backwardness. The course concludes with the final attempt by the monarchy in the 1860s–70s to stave off revolution by dismantling the system that Peter had created.

HIST 30472. Late Imperial Russia

(3-0-3)

This course examines Russian history from the end of serfdom in 1861 to the revolutions of 1917. The instructor will acquaint students not only with the political history of Russia in this turbulent period, but also with topics that are sometimes neglected in broad surveys: the resemblances between Russian serfdom and American slavery; the history of family life, gender relations, and sexuality in Russia; the role of religion in defining Russian identities; the psychological underpinnings of political radicalism and terrorism; and the difficult relationships between various ethnic groups in the “prison of peoples.” Course requirements will include a short essay, a midterm examination, and a final examination. No prior knowledge of Russian history required.

HIST 30473. Early Twentieth-Century Russian History, 1894–1945

(3-0-3)

This course will examine some of the most important ideas, events, and personalities that shaped Russian and Soviet history from the beginning of the last tsar's reign in 1894 to the emergence of the Soviet Empire at the end of the second World War. In particular, we will explore the role of politics and ideology in Russian society, the origins of Leninism and the creation of the first socialist state as well as the experience of Stalinism and the Nazi-Soviet War. Students will be asked to take two examinations and to write a term paper.

HIST 30474. Russian History Since World War II

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the history of Russia and its peoples in the second half of the 20th century, with a particular focus on the role of ideology, politics, and culture in Soviet and contemporary Russian society. We will explore the emergence of the Soviet Empire at the end of WWII, the experience of late Stalinism and post-Stalinist socialism, the collapse of the communist regime, and the disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991, as well as Russia's uneasy transition "out of totalitarianism" during the last decade of the 20th century. Students will be asked to take two exams and to write a 10-page term paper.

HIST 30482. Eastern Europe Since 1945

(3-0-3)

The course surveys the emergence of communist Eastern Europe in the wake of World War II, and then explores the seminal developments that contributed to the collapse of communism. Emphasis will be placed on the Hungarian, Czech, Polish, and Yugoslav experiences. Students in the course will examine the evolution of East European society by reading traditional historical and political writings as well as drawing on literary and film accounts of the period. Although a lecture class, the instructor has reserved Fridays for in-class discussion. Students will read approximately seven books. They will also be expected to sit for a midterm examination and a final examination, and to complete a 10- to 15-page research paper.

HIST 30483. Eastern Europe in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3) Kunicki

This course surveys the history of 20th-century Eastern Europe, the conglomeration of states and nations between Germany and Russia, stretching from the Baltic sea in the north to the Black and Adriatic seas in the south. The class aims to provide students with a basic understanding of the chronology of events and developmental processes in this part of Europe. It also attempts to answer the question whether "Eastern Europe" is or is not a meaningful historical, political, and cultural construct. Themes include nationalism, the creation of nation-states and the influence of great powers, indigenous fascism, the role of the intelligentsia, Nazi occupation, Stalinism, the evolution of communism, and response from society. Finally, by employing participant accounts, novels, and films, the course will introduce students to the cultures, traditions, and leading voices of the lands and peoples under discussion.

HIST 30490. Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Polish History

(3-0-3)

This lecture course explores Polish history from the partitions to the present. Special emphasis will be placed on understanding Poland's changing political, cultural, social, and physical geography. Politically effaced from the map of Europe twice in the two centuries under study, Poland ceased to exist as a political nation between 1797 and 1918 and 1939 to 1945. In the wake of World War II, moreover, Poland's geographies shifted once more as the country changed physical shape and simultaneously came under Soviet rule. Each time independence melted away, the Polish nation grew stronger and experienced social, cultural, and political transformation, ultimately spearheading the drive of all of Eastern Europe to overthrow communist rule. Although basically a lecture course, the instructor will provide ample opportunity for discussion and questions in class. About seven books will be assigned. There will be a mid-semester and final examination, as well as a paper.

HIST 30495. Twentieth-Century Polish History

(3-0-3)

This course surveys Polish history from 1900 to the present. It aims to provide a basic knowledge of the major events and processes that shaped the political, social, and cultural history of Poland in the 20th century. Key themes include nationalism and the rise of independent Poland in 1918; democracy and its failure during the interwar period; Nazi and Soviet occupations, and the impact of World War II on Polish society; the imposition and evolution of communism and response from society; the Polish Solidarity Movement and the collapse of the communist system; and contemporary Poland.

HIST 30500. Italian Renaissance

(2-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32500

This course examines the political, cultural, social, and religious history of Italy from about 1350 to 1550. Starting with an extended study of Florence, its economic foundations, social and political structures, artistic monuments, and key personalities, the course then examines how the culture of the Florentine Renaissance spread to the rest of Italy, especially to the papal court of Rome and the princely courts of northern Italy, and, finally, to the new nation-states of northern Europe. Key topics will include the growth of the Italian city-state; the appearance of new, Renaissance "characters" (the merchant, the prince, the courtier, the mercenary, the learned lady, the self-made man); Renaissance humanism and the classical revival; the relationship between art and politics; and Renaissance ideas of liberty, virtue, historical change, and the individual's relationship to God. The course will not tell a story of steady progress from medieval to modern institutions, societies, and modes of thinking; rather, we will consider the Renaissance as a period in flux, in which established traditions thrived alongside creative innovations and vigorous challenges to authority. Students will write one long paper and take a midterm and a final exam.

HIST 30501. Early Modern Rome

(3-0-3) Meserve

This course traces the interlocking histories of the papacy and the city of Rome from the Renaissance to the birth of the modern Italian state. Topics will include the rise and fall of the papal monarchy; cultural and intellectual life at the Vatican court; the urban fabric of Rome from the Renaissance to the baroque; the peculiar strains of Roman society; and the tumultuous relationship, both political and cultural, between Rome and the rest of Europe from the Reformation to the age of revolution. The course will proceed chronologically, but will pause frequently to examine special topics including the Renaissance cardinal and his household; Michelangelo's Rome; the building of St. Peter's; Jesuit science; the trial of Galileo; archaeology and antiquarianism; the Roman carnival; the Inquisition; Bernini's Rome; the Grand Tour; Rome in the romantic imagination; and Napoleon's Rome. Students will write several short papers in response to readings and visual materials, and take a midterm and a final exam.

HIST 30550. Technology of War and Peace

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the impact of military technologies on world history from the 16th century onward. Topics include the rise of gunpowder weaponry and the fortification revolution in the early modern period, navalism, particularly in the 19th century, the role of military technologies in European colonial expansion, and the science-based military of the 20th-century chemical and biological (and so-called "soft-kill") weapons, leading up to the age of nuclear weapons. The course considers also military technologies as deterrents, military technologies as expressions of culture, and the issue of warfare as a stimulus to technological development.

HIST 30551. Technology in History

(3-0-3)

A thematic survey of the history of technology, from the Neolithic discovery of agriculture to the information age. Topics include the chemistry and metallurgy of antiquity (high-tech ca. 1000 B.C.), technology in Christian theology; the power revolution of 1200; arms races from the 15th century onward; the marriage of art and science; the industrial, agricultural, transport and communications revolutions; the American system of manufactures; the evolution of the engineering profession; and modern efforts to plan the technological future. These topics form the basis for exploring the following themes: How does technology change? How did we get where we are—do we have the technology now that we must have, should have, or need to have? What guides technical creativity? How have social effects of technologies been assessed and dealt with? How have technologies fundamentally changed ordinary life and societal organization?

HIST 30553. History and Cinema in East-Central Europe

(3-0-3) Kunicki

Corequisite: HIST 31553

This course examines the legacy of World War II, Stalinism, and politics of memory in communist and contemporary East Central Europe through the comparison of historical sources with feature and documentary films. We will address the following questions: What was the status of film vis-à-vis communist regimes? How did the making of historical films constitute the making of history?

HIST 30554. European Military History Since 1600

(3-0-3)

This course is a survey of European military history and the relationship between European society and its military institutions, technology, and techniques over the last four centuries. Beginning during what some historians have dubbed the “military revolution,” this course will trace Europe’s military history and its links to political, social, and cultural changes until the contemporary period, and include units on decolonization and European experiences with counter-insurgent warfare in the Middle East and North Africa. This class will focus on exploring how changing “styles” of warfare, the composition of the military establishment, and the transformations in military technology have impacted upon state and society. Conversely, it will also investigate how political and societal changes have influenced the nature of warfare.

HIST 30579. The Individual and Society in Modern European Intellectual History

(3-0-3) Beisswenger

This course provides an introduction to the main ideas that shaped modern Europe since the mid-18th century. Using selected key texts (including not only classics of political and social thought, but also significant pieces of literature), we will explore the main intellectual currents of European thought. We will discuss the historical context within which these ideas emerged, learn about the biographies of their authors, and examine the impact they had on subsequent events and generations. Additionally, we will confront and compare approaches and ideas of different thinkers, tracing continuities and identifying contrasts. The main thematic focus is on the problem of the individual’s relationship vis-à-vis his or her environment, in particular society and the state. We will look at the different ways modern European thinkers conceptualized the human being as an individual endowed with certain qualities, rights, and responsibilities. We will also analyze how different thinkers tried to determine the place and status of the individual within a larger collective, as well as how they dealt with the questions of gender, political and economic participation, religion, and violence in modern European history.

HIST 30586. Youth in Europe Since 1945

(3-0-3) Nowinski

Amidst the social and material devastation of Europe in 1945, youth became a symbol of both the continent’s deterioration and its aspirations. This course will examine how the concept of “youth” was continually redefined in response to rapid social and cultural changes. Students will also study how young men and women became an important cultural, political, and economic force—transforming a culture for youth to a culture by youth. Topics will include the cold war, Americanization and youth consumer culture, the sexual revolution, the protests of 1968, the origins of the environmental movement, punk music in the context of the economic crises of the 1970s, and extremist politics and terrorism in the 1970s and 1980s. In addition to secondary readings, students will analyze primary source texts, films, and music clips. This course is open to all students; no previous knowledge of the topic is necessary.

HIST 30587. Modern Genocide in Historical Context

(3-0-3)

This course explores genocide as both a concept and a phenomenon in the 20th-century world, beginning with Germany and the Holocaust and then moving forward in time and across the globe.

HIST 30601. Colonial America

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32601

This course considers the history of New World exploration and settlement by Europeans from the 15th century to the 18th century. It examines the process of colonization in a wide variety of cultural and geographic settings. It explores the perspectives of Indians, Europeans, and slaves with a particular emphasis on the consequences of interracial contacts. We will discuss the goals and perceptions of different groups and individuals as keys to understanding the violent conflict that became a central part of the American experience. Lectures, class discussions, readings, and films will address gender, racial, class, and geographic variables in the peopling (and de-peopling) of English North America.

HIST 30602. The American Revolution

(3-0-3) Griffin

Corequisite: HIST 32602

When speaking of the American Revolution, many writers reach for a comment made by John Adams in 1818 that, “[T]he Revolution was effected before the war commenced. The Revolution was in the minds and hearts of the people. . . .” Whether this assertion is true historically or not, it still does not adequately describe what that revolution was. The American Revolution obviously had its political elements, primarily the formation of the United States. To reach its political goals, military means were necessary. Without a successful War for Independence, there would have been no revolution. To leave matters there, however, would be insufficient. A fuller understanding of the revolution would need to address how it affected the whole spectrum of American life. It would consider the revolution as a social movement that challenged the political and social hierarchies of the day. It would also ask how the revolution affected those who were not white males, especially women, slaves, and Native Americans. Without considering the possible negative implications of the revolution, any telling would be incomplete. This class will take up these challenges and attempt to make a full-orbed presentation of the events surrounding the American Revolution. It will introduce students both to elites and to those whom the popular narrative glosses over. It will attempt to count the losses, as well as the gains, which flowed from the move to independence from Britain. Finally, it will attempt to describe the many changes through this period, which resulted, not only in a new political nation, but in a new society and culture—changes that in varying degrees are still with us today and of which contemporary Americans are the inheritors.

HIST 30603. The New American Nation, 1787–1848

(3-0-3)

This course examines the social, political, and cultural history of the United States from the ratification of the Constitution to the beginnings of the political crisis over expansion and slavery. It covers the democratization of politics and the problems of national independence in the wake of the Revolution; territorial expansion; economic change; the development of regional, class, religious, racial, ethnic, and gendered subcultures; slavery and resistance to slavery; and the new political and reform movements that responded to the era’s deep and lasting changes.

HIST 30604. U.S. Civil War and Reconstruction, 1848–77

(3-0-3)

Through intensive reading and writing students will explore the social and cultural history of America’s most costly war. We will focus on various topics as they relate to the war: antebellum origins, religion, gender, Lincoln’s reasons for waging war, dead bodies, freedmen’s families, black soldiers, and the uses of war memory. This will not be a guns-and-generals-smell-the-smoke course, though knowledge of military matters can be helpful. We will ask and try to answer who really “won” and “lost” the war.

HIST 30606. U.S. Gilded Age/Progressive Era

(3-0-3)

Through discussion and lectures, students will examine the emergence of a recognizably modern United States. Topics examined will include the emergence of the corporation, progressive reforms, the changing contours of American religion, the character of the New South, the battle for women's suffrage, developments in the arts, and American involvement in the First World War.

HIST 30608. The United States, 1900–45

(3-0-3) Blantz

The purpose of this course is to study the political, diplomatic, economic, social, and cultural development of the United States from 1900 to 1945. Major topics will include the background for progressive reform, the New Nationalism and New Freedom administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson, the diplomacy of the early 20th century, the causes and results of World War I, the Republican administrations of the 1920s, the New Deal administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, isolationism and neutrality in the interwar period, and the American home front during World War II. There will be a required reading list of approximately seven books, two shorter writing assignments, and three major examinations, including the final.

HIST 30609. United States Since World War II

(3-0-3) Blantz

The purpose of this course is to study the political, diplomatic, economic, social, and cultural development of the United States from 1945 through the presidency of George H.W. Bush. Although the military and diplomatic history of World War II will be considered by way of background, the principal topics of investigation will be the Fair Deal Program of President Truman, the cold war, the Korean Conflict, the Eisenhower Presidency, the New Frontier, Vietnam, President Johnson's Great Society, the Civil Rights Movement, the Nixon years, the social and intellectual climate of this post-war era, and the presidencies of Gerald Ford through George H.W. Bush. There will be a required reading list of approximately six books, two smaller writing assignments, and three examinations.

HIST 30610. Irish American History

(3-0-3) Griffin

Corequisite: HIST 32610

This course will explore the Irish American experience from Atlantic, global, and comparative perspectives. We will, of course, cover traditional topics, such as labor, politics, and religion. And we will encounter many colorful characters and fascinating stories. But we will do so by viewing the Irish who came to America as part of a broader, dynamic diaspora that would span the globe. Viewing migration to the American colonies (including the Caribbean) and the United States from this vantage point means that we must consider the changing relationship between Ireland and America, as well as the ways in which both regions were parts of broader economic and cultural systems. As such, we will examine dynamics that occurred within the Atlantic basin, such as movement and adaptation to a New World, within a global context. Needless to say, we will cover the history of both sending and receiving societies in rigorous fashion. Only by doing this sort of work can we understand what defined the Irish American experience.

HIST 30615. Catholics in America

(3-0-3) Cummings

Since 1850, Roman Catholics have constituted the single largest religious denomination in the United States. This course explores what the presence of Catholics has meant for the American experience, focusing on themes of church/state separation, religion and politics, education, and social reform. We will also examine how the American context has transformed the practice of Catholicism, with attention to ethnicity, gender, region, race and class as variables that have shaped the American Catholic experience. Assigned readings range from excerpts of anti-Catholic publications to first-hand accounts written by American Catholics from the colonial period to the present. In addition we will study the representation of Catholics in American film, themes of Catholic fiction, material culture relating to Catholic devotional life and the sacraments, and the shifting position of American Catholics in the universal Roman Catholic Church.

HIST 30617. Gender and American Catholicism

(3-0-3)

This course is a survey of the history of American Catholic women from the colonial period to the present. Through a combination of lectures, reading and discussion, we will explore the following themes and topics: the role of religious belief and practice in shaping Catholics' understanding of gender differences; the experience of women in religious communities and in family life; women's involvement in education and social reform; ethnic and racial diversity among Catholic women; devotional life; the development of feminist theology, and the emergence of the "new feminism" as articulated by Pope John Paul II. We will seek to understand how Catholic women, both lay and religious, contributed to the development of Church and nation, and examine how encounters with the broader American society have shaped Catholic women's relationship to the institutional church over the last three centuries.

HIST 30618. American Labor History: Working for a Living in the USA, 1776—present

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32618

The labor Questions: "Who does the work? Who reaps the rewards? And who makes the decisions?" are central to any society, and this course explores how those questions have been answered throughout the history of the United States of America. This class will introduce you to the major themes, events, organizations, individuals, and scholarly controversies in American labor history, from 1776 to the present. We will study the diversity of the working-class experience in the United States by exploring the past from multiple perspectives, and we will analyze competing interpretations put forth by labor historians over the past half-century. The workers, workplaces, communities, institutions, and issues will range widely over the semester, but we will investigate some core themes for the duration: issues of power, structure, and agency, from the workplace to Washington, D.C.; workers' wide-ranging efforts to forge organizations, namely labor unions, to represent their collective interests; intersections between class, race, and gender at work, at home, at play, and in politics; and tensions between capitalism, industrialization, and democracy in U.S. history.

HIST 30621. Mexican American History

(3-0-3) Rodriguez

Corequisite: HIST 32621

This course is an introductory survey of Mexican American history in the United States. Primarily focused on events after the Texas Revolution, and annexation of the American Southwest, we will consider the problems the Spanish and Mexican settlers faced in their new homeland, as well as the mass migration of Anglo Americans into the region following the annexation. Throughout the course, we will explore the changing nature of Mexican American U.S. citizenship. Other themes and topics examined will include immigration, the growth of agriculture in Texas and California, internal migration, urbanization, discrimination, segregation, language and cultural maintenance, and the development of a U.S.-based Mexican American politics and culture. Although primarily focused on the American Southwest and California, this course also highlights the long history of Mexican American life and work in the Great Lakes and Midwestern United States. We will conclude with the recent history of Mexican and Latin American migration to the United States after 1965, and the changing nature of Mexican American identity and citizenship within this context.

HIST 30626. Medicine and Public Health in U.S. History

(3-0-3)

This course examines health as a unifying concept in American history. It follows several themes: how class, race, and gender, as well as age, lifestyle, and place have manifested themselves in differential health experience; the ongoing conflict between personal liberty and the interests of the state; the remarkable diversity of American medical systems and their close relation to religious and social diversity;

the place of medicine in Americanization campaigns; the changing political economy of American medicine; and finally, the emergence of health as the core concern of the American dream. In short, by the end of the course you should have a good understanding of the uniqueness of American medicine and its central place in America's history. You should have acquired an historical and critical context that will be of use in your own encounters with matters of health and medicine—as intelligent citizens and about issues of public health and questions of medical ethics, and as creative thinkers about more satisfactory modes of medical practice and health improvement and protection. The course will use three to five texts, and require exams, project, and presentation.

HIST 30627. History of the American West

(3-0-3)

Few American regions have generated as many cultural narratives, myths, and icons as the trans-Mississippi West. This course takes both the reality and the romance of the West seriously, asking students to examine how the American conquest of the West inspired storytelling traditions that distorted and shaped the region's history. To get at this interaction, we will read novels, histories, and first-hand accounts as well as view several Hollywood westerns. The class is reading- and discussion-intensive. Students will write several short papers as well as a longer final essay.

HIST 30628. American Legal History

(3-0-3)

This seminar-style course deals with the interaction between the legal system and social change in the United States from the 1600s to the 1980s. Primary emphasis is given to the 19th-century and 20th-century, two periods where American legal culture took on much of its fundamental character and adjusted to significant social change. Main themes include the relationships between law and development; individual rights in the public and private spheres; the development of the legal profession; the post-New Deal state; and the various U.S. "rights" movements. Reading consists of primary sources documents and a short survey text. Grades will be based on a series of short papers and classroom discussion. Prior knowledge of American history is helpful but not required.

HIST 30630. Religion and American Politics

(3-0-3) Noll

Corequisite: HIST 32630

Since the early 1950s, religion has been an obviously major factor in American political life—driven first by the African American leaders of the civil rights movement and then, in more recent decades, by the concerns of the religious right. Especially after the election of John F. Kennedy in 1960, Catholics have also been fully recognized participants in the nation's political uses of religion—as well as in debates over whether and how religion should be used politically. This class tries to show that modern political-religious connections are but new instances of what has always gone on in the American past. The shape of contests over religion and politics may have changed considerably over time, but not the fact of dense connections between the two spheres. Readings for the course include primary and secondary accounts that treat notable incidents, problems, debates, and controversies from the colonial period to the present. Lectures spotlight major issues of historical interpretation, like religion and the Constitution, religion and antebellum debates over slavery, religion and Reconstruction, Catholic versus Protestant understandings of liberty, civil rights and the new Christian right.

HIST 30631. History of American Sport

(3-0-3) Soares

Sport, a major part of American entertainment and culture today, has roots that extend back to the colonial period. This course will provide an introduction to the development of American sport, from the horseracing and games of chance in the colonial period through to the rise of contemporary sport as a highly commercialized entertainment spectacle. Using a variety of primary and secondary sources, we will explore the ways that American sport has influenced and been influenced by economics, politics, popular culture, and society, including issues of race, gender and class. Given Notre Dame's tradition in athletics, we will explore the university's involvement in this historical process.

HIST 30632. U.S. Environmental History

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to the new field of environmental history. While many people think "the environment" suddenly became important with the first "Earth Day" in 1970 (or a few years earlier), environmental issues have in fact long been of central importance. In recent decades historians have begun actively to explore the past sensibilities of various groups toward their surroundings and fellow creatures. They have also increasingly paid attention to the ways environmental factors have affected history. This course will range widely, from world history to the story of a single river, from arguments about climate change to the significance of pink flamingos, and will survey a number of types of history including cultural, demographic, religious, and animal.

HIST 30633. American Religious History

(3-0-3) Swartz

This course will examine religion in American life from the encounter between Europeans and Native Americans in the 16th century to the present. We'll explore the ways in which religion has shaped American society, culture, and politics, and in turn how the U. S. setting has shaped religious expression. Themes will include the rise of religious diversity and ideas of religious freedom; the interactions between the American religious "mainstream" and minority religious traditions; the relationship between religion in the United States and its international setting; and the diversity and persistence of religion in American culture.

HIST 30634. Men, Women, and Work in American History

(3-0-3)

Why do Wal-Mart's current advertising campaigns idealize the "stay-at-home mom"? Conversely, why does Congress require that mothers on welfare be sent out to work? This course will introduce students to a broad view of American social history that foregrounds the gendered aspects of work and asks students to examine the meaning of work in American history from the colonial period to the 21st century. This broad historical perspective is especially crucial to the examination of the construction of current beliefs about work in the United States since changing gender ideologies dictated the work experiences of large race- and class-defined segments of the population. On one level, this approach allows for the recovery of women and girls' contributions to the formal and informal economies, including their work activities within the household. Male work practices will be similarly illuminated through a gender studies approach. Hence, an overarching purpose of the course will be to explore the fluidity and instability of those conceptions of work that were applied alternately to masculine as opposed to feminine occupations, just as they were alternately applied to white versus non-white, free versus enslaved, and public versus domestic activities.

HIST 30638. Women and American Religion

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the impact of women on American religious thought, tradition, and practice in all its variety, and the simultaneous impact of religion on American women throughout American history.

HIST 30639. "Mixed Race" America

(3-0-3)

Despite popular images of America as a "melting" both of races and ethnicities, our institutions, values, and practices have often tried to create or maintain spatial and social distance between groups defined as racially different. This course will explore that ways in which Americans have transgressed those boundaries or found other ways of interacting across cultural lines, primarily in the 19th and 20th centuries. We will examine popular cultural perceptions of people of mixed ancestry, their social experiences, the development of various mixed-ancestry communities, and historical attempts to limit interracial socializing, relationships, and marriage. These issues were and are deeply imbedded in debates over the meaning of race, gender expectations and ideas about sex and sexuality. We will also pay close attention to how minority communities have understood people of mixed ancestry in the United States, and how mixed-race identities intersect with African American, Native American, Asian, White, and Latino identities.

HIST 30640. Law and Religion in U.S. History

(3-0-3) Przybyszewski

This course explores the interconnections between religion and the law as they evolved over the course of the past three centuries of American history.

HIST 30652. Women and Work in Early America

(3-0-3)

This course will introduce students to a broad view of early American social history that foregrounds the gendered aspects of work in Early America—defined loosely as the period from colonial settlement to 1820. On one level, this approach allows for the recovery of women and girls' contributions to the formal and informal economies of pre-industrial early America, including their work activities within the household. This perspective is especially crucial to the examination of the gendered ideologies of white, Native American, and African servitude and/or slavery. These ideologies dictated the work experiences of large race- and class-defined segments of the population. Yet cultural retention also played a part and this course will invite students to investigate the impact of derivative work practices (for example examining African women's dominance of market activities in the New World through the lens of West African work practices). Further, while the course title emphasizes women's experiences, the class and race implications of male work practices in early America will be similarly illuminated by a gender studies approach. Thus, an overarching purpose of the course will be to highlight the fluid and instable conceptions of work that were applied alternately to masculine as opposed to feminine occupations, just as they were alternately applied to European versus non-European, free versus enslaved, and public versus private spheres.

HIST 30654. Fashioning Identities in Colonial America

(3-0-3) White

This course will focus on dress and material/visual culture in colonial North America. It will introduce methodology, and offer an overview of key themes in the history of dress and consumerism within the framework of gender studies. In our focus on the colonial period (especially the 18th century), we will analyze the economics of dress (the production, marketing, and acquisition of cloth and clothing) and will assess the importance of fashion to commerce and politics. We will evaluate the role of dress in the construction of colonial identities, and we will examine the ways that dress operated as a visual locus for racial, class, and ethnic encounters.

HIST 30660. Natives and Newcomers to 1815

(3-0-3) Coleman

Stretching from 1491 (and earlier) to the aftermath of the war of 1812, this course charts the history of early America through the exchanges, misunderstandings, conflicts, and unions between Native Americans and a variety of European newcomers. The course combines methodologies, themes, and questions of both Indian and colonial histories. Through lectures, class discussions, and essay assignments, students will explore early America through the multitudes of nations, peoples, and cultures that staked their claim to the continent.

HIST 30680. Jacksonian America: Politics, Culture, and Society, 1815–48

(3-0-3)

This course explores the early 19th-century history of the United States, from the close of the War of 1812 to the coming of the Civil War (1815–48). Although the era and course take their name from President Andrew Jackson, we will cover much more than national politics and affairs of state. We will explore the birth of mass political parties, conflicts between nationalism and sectionalism, early industrialization and the rise of class conflict, the development of slavery and antislavery, changing gender roles and the rise of feminism, evangelical religion and reform, and Native American resistance and removal.

HIST 30681. Reforming America in the Long Nineteenth Century (1776–1919)

(3-0-3) Turpin

With the recent 2008 presidential election, there is a lot of excitement about the possibility of “change” and “reform” in our country. This class will provide perspective on our present historical moment by examining American reform movements of the past. It will focus on “the long 19th century” from the American Revolution to World War I. During this time optimistic Americans of various stripes set out to reform all sorts of things: religion, sex, eating and drinking, race and gender relations, education, and working and living conditions, to name just a few. As we look at these reform movements, we will ask the questions: What drove certain people to buck convention and seek reform? Why did they choose to focus on these particular reforms at these times? What did they believe would be the ultimate significance of the changes they were seeking? Why were some movements more successful than others?

HIST 30685. Abraham Lincoln's America, 1809–65

(3-0-3) Graff

This course explores the social, economic, intellectual, cultural, and political history of the early to mid-19th-century United States through the prism of Abraham Lincoln's biography. Topics may include trans-Appalachian migration and settlement, U.S.-Native American relations, race and slavery, gender and family, market developments and labor relations, formal and informal politics, the law, and the promise and limits of studying history through singular lives.

HIST 30700. African American History to 1877

(3-0-3)

This African American history survey begins with an examination of West African origins and ends with the Civil War era. We will discuss the Atlantic slave trade, slavery in colonial America, the beginnings of African American cultures in the North and South during and after the revolutionary era, slave resistance and rebellions, the political economy of slavery and resulting sectional disputes. Particular attention will be paid to northern free blacks.

HIST 30701. British American Intellectual History, 1650–1900

(3-0-3)

A survey of the intellectual history of Britain and English-speaking America from around 1600 to the mid-19th century, including European backgrounds and contexts, with an emphasis on writings about religion, government, natural science, education, and human nature. Besides exploring the early-modern Anglophone world on its own terms, the course aims to help us understand better the origins and implications of our own ways of thinking. There will be a midterm examination, a final examination, and a term paper based on primary sources.

HIST 30704. History of American Women I

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the social, cultural, and political developments that shaped American women's lives from the colonial period to 1890. It will analyze both the ways American culture defined women's place during different historical periods and the ways women themselves worked to comply with or to resist those definitions. Topics include pre-industrial society, transformations in work and family life, industrialism and class formation, slavery, women's culture, and the emergence of a women's movement. Throughout, stress will be laid on the importance of class, race, and ethnicity in shaping women's historical experience.

HIST 30705. U.S. Foreign Policy Before 1945

(3-0-3) Brady

This course covers the main developments in American foreign relations from the Spanish American War in 1898 through World War II. It traces the emergence of the United States as a major world power and examines in some detail how the United States became involved in the two world wars. A recurring theme will be the major traditions in American foreign policy and the ways in which these traditions influenced policy makers in the early years of the “American Century.”

HIST 30706. Sex, Sexuality, and Gender in the United States to 1900

(3-0-3)

Sexuality, like other areas of social life, has a history. Yet historians have only written about the history of sex for the last 40 years or so. This course will both introduce students to a variety of current themes in the history of sexuality and invite them to consider how they themselves might research and write that history. The class will survey recent topics in the history of sexuality from first colonial settlement to the end of the Victorian era. Issues we may consider include different religions' attitudes towards sexuality (the Puritans were not anti-sex!); how different cultures' views of sex shaped relations between colonists and Indians; why sex was an important factor in establishing laws about slavery in Virginia; birth control and abortion practices; changing patterns of courtship; men who loved men and women who loved women; and why the average number of children in American families fell by 50 percent between 1790 and 1890. Over the course of the semester, students will also design a small research proposal on some aspect of the history of American sexuality prior to 1890. Written assignments will include a weekly journal, midterm and final examinations; a book review; and a small research project.

HIST 30707. American Intellectual History to 1870

(3-0-3) Turner

This lecture course will survey major developments in American thought from the first English contacts with North America to the mid-19th century. Emphasis will fall on ideas about religion, society, politics, and natural science and on the institutions and social contexts of intellectual life, with an eye toward understanding the roots of our own ways of thinking. Especially in the first weeks of the course, European backgrounds will also receive attention.

HIST 30752. Black Chicago Politics

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the vast, complex and exciting dimensions of black Chicago politics. First, institutional structures, geographic distribution, and population characteristics will inform students about the sociodemographic background of the African American population in the city. Second, the course explores varying types of political expression that have developed over more than a century, including electoral politics, mass movements, partisan politics; it will also examine the impact of the Chicago machine, and of the Washington era on the political and economic status of African Americans in the city. Third, public policy developments in housing, education, and criminal justice will be discussed. Fourth, the course also compares black political standing with other racial and ethnic groups in the city. Finally, the course will introduce students to the long tradition of social science research centered on the city of Chicago.

HIST 30800. African American History II: Since 1865

(3-0-3) Pierce

Corequisite: HIST 32800

This course will survey the history of African Americans from 1865 to 1980. Specifically, this course will focus on the problems of Reconstruction in the South after the Civil War, the adjustments and reactions of African Americans to freedom, the economic exploitation of sharecropping, northern black communities at the end of the 19th century, the migration of black Southerners to northern urban areas, black political leadership, the civil rights movement, current examples of institutional racism, and affirmative action in America.

HIST 30802. U.S. Political Traditions Since 1865

(3-0-3)

Students will investigate the political debates—and simultaneous examinations of democracy's character—that have animated American reformers and intellectuals since the Civil War. The focus will be on these political traditions, not the studies of voter behavior or policy implementation that also constitute an important part of political history. The course will begin with discussion of the debate over slavery and Reconstruction, and move through the "social question" of the late 19th century, Progressive reform in the early 20th century, the New Deal, the origins of modern conservatism, and various post-World War II social reform movements. Readings will include court cases, memoirs, speeches, and a sampling of the philosophical and historical literature.

HIST 30804. History of American Women II

(3-0-3)

This course surveys women's relationships to the social, cultural, and political developments shaping U.S. society from 1890 to the present, concentrating on developments in women's activism, work, and popular culture. Topics include the new woman and progressivism; the transformation of feminism in the 1920s; women's role in the development of the welfare state; women's paid and unpaid labor; women's changing roles in the Depression, World War II, and cold war periods; the women's liberation movement of the 1960s; and the polarized politics of gender in recent decades. Written assignments will include a 10- to 12-page research paper and short weekly journals on the readings and lectures. Readings will include a mix of recent articles and primary sources. Particular attention will be paid to the impact of class, race, ethnicity, and sexuality on issues of gender.

HIST 30805. U.S. Foreign Policy Since 1945

(3-0-3)

This course offers an overview of U.S. foreign policy since World War II, focusing on the major crises and conflicts that have occurred since then—U.S. and Soviet Union, Korea, Vietnam, Gulf War, and Kosovo.

HIST 30806. Sex, Sexuality, and Gender in U.S. History Since 1880

(3-0-3)

Topics may include representations of sexuality in movies and advertising; new courtship practices among unmarried heterosexuals (from courting to dating to hooking up); changing concepts of same-sex love (from inversion to homosexuality to gay liberation to LGBTQ); the demographic shift to smaller families; the 20th-century movements for and against birth control and legal abortion; and the late-20th-century politicization of sexual issues.

HIST 30807. American Intellectual History II

(3-0-3)

This lecture course will survey major developments in American thought from the later 19th century to the end of the 20th century. Emphasis will fall on ideas about religion, society, politics, and natural science and on the institutions and social contexts of intellectual life, with an eye toward understanding the roots of our present ways of thinking.

HIST 30854. U.S. Presidents: FDR to Clinton

(3-0-3) DeSantis

A study of the personalities, style, policies, and performances of American presidents from Franklin D. Roosevelt to Bill Clinton as they developed the modern American presidency and made it the most important elective office in the world.

HIST 30855. Catholicism in Twentieth-Century America

(3-0-3)

The course examines the patterns of Catholic intellectual life, religious culture, social engagement, and public presence in the United States throughout the 20th century. Themes receiving special attention in the lectures and class discussions will include U.S. Catholic response to the theory of evolution and to the social sciences; the rise and decline of Thomism as the philosophical framework of Catholic thought and education; Catholic participation in the labor movement and the civil rights movement; the new theologies and social ethics of the '60s; the impact of the Second Vatican Council; shifting modes of public Catholicism; and the Catholic culture wars of the 1980s and 1990s.

HIST 30856. Labor and America Since 1945

(3-0-3)

This course explores the relationship between workers and the labor movement to American politics and culture since 1945. The United States emerged from World War II as the strongest global power, and its citizens subsequently enjoyed a long postwar economic boom that created what we might call the first truly middle-class society in world history. At the heart of that new society was the American labor movement, those unions like the United Auto Workers and the United Steel Workers who ensured that at least some of the postwar profits made it into the wallets of workers and their families. Today, however, unions represent only 8 percent of workers in the private sector. What accounts for the decline of organized labor since the 1950s? What has the decline of the labor movement meant for workers specifically, and the American economy and politics more broadly? How and why have popular perceptions of unions changed over time? What has been the relationship of organized labor to the civil rights movement, feminism, and modern conservatism? What is “globalization,” and what has been its impact upon American workers and their unions? Through an exploration of historical scholarship, memoirs, polemical writings, and Hollywood films, this course will try to answer these questions. Students interested in politics, economic development, international relations, social justice, human rights, peace studies, or mass culture are particularly welcome.

HIST 30857. The United States During the 1960s

(3-0-3)

Few periods in American history have been as controversial as the 1960s. Sometimes called the “Long Sixties,” it runs conceptually from the mid-1950s to the early 1970s, and was a turbulent time. Concentrating on politics and society, this course explores the major personalities and events, including Martin Luther King, John F. Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, Richard Nixon, the New Frontier, the Great Society, the Vietnam War, the breakdown of the liberal consensus, the rebirth of the conservative movement, and national movements led by youths, women, and African Americans. Although the emphasis is on the United States, the course also visits several major international issues. There are two goals for students: acquiring knowledge about the period and developing analytical tools to form their own judgments about it. Toward the first goal, students will encounter a combination of readings, videos, mini-lectures, and class discussions. Toward the second, they will be exposed to four different approaches: (1) discussing primary documents and writing a paper on some of them; (2) studying three small-scale case studies; (3) examining the large-scale phenomenon of protest; and (4) reading the memoirs of a Cabinet member, hence gaining an insider’s view of the life and activities in the White House.

HIST 30859. Reagan’s America: The United States in the 1980s

(3-0-3) Strauss

In his campaign for re-election to the presidency in 1984, Ronald Reagan released a television commercial that began with the line, “It’s morning in America again.” The ad suggested the many ways in which President Reagan and the Republican Party were improving the economy and bringing optimism back to America. “Under the leadership of President Reagan,” the commercial concluded, “our country is prouder and stronger and better.” Reagan’s campaigns for the nation’s highest office stressed the themes of patriotism and individual responsibility, while his presidential administrations oversaw an economic agenda that privileged corporate America and wealth production and a foreign policy that justified extreme measures by citing the dangers posed by the Soviet Union and communism. The United States in the 1980s was dominated by the presidency and personality of Ronald Reagan. His aggressive economic and foreign policies influenced the major events of the decade, while his politics helped to shape the wider culture, a period often characterized as “the me decade” (and one Madonna called “a material world” in a hit song). In this course, students will explore the 1980s and assess the conventional wisdom about Reagan and the decade he dominated. Were Americans too blinded by greed to confront the nation’s social problems, or was there a serious debate going on about individual conscience and social responsibility? Students will debate these and other questions as they explore several of the major themes of 1980s America: the cold war, the Christian right, progressivism, conservatism, popular culture, and the media. In addition to probing political speeches, congressional testimony, the Reagan diaries, pop music, and sitcoms, students will also examine some of the new books by historians, who are just now beginning to come to grips with this pivotal recent time in American history.

HIST 30860. Images of Science and Technology in American Film

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 31860; HIST 32860

From Star Trek and Star Wars to Metropolis and Wall-E, Americans have been fascinated with images of science at the movies for a century. This is not that surprising: Through the last hundred years, film has been one of the most popular forms of entertainment in America. When a movie is well-done, it transports us to another time or place, often with our full consent. And, at least if we listen to our politicians, the progress of America itself hinges on the performance of American scientists. For many Americans, movies and science go together like popcorn and Coke. Despite their escapist packaging, however, movies are rarely message-neutral. Through subtle and not-so-subtle plots, dialog, music, and images, movies both reflect back ideas we already hold and show images to us that might be uncomfortable if simply “told” to us. They play on the hopes and fears that the audience brings in with them, and sometimes can subvert these beliefs and expectations. In this course, we will study the entanglement of American history and science as portrayed in film through the 20th century. Though we can’t pretend that films influence the doing of science in any meaningful way, we will assert that the cultural product of film both illustrates and exploits the concerns of a given period. On the one hand, movies are just entertainment; on the other, they offer us a window into our greatest hopes and fears and how science was and is thought to deliver both.

HIST 30885. Popular Culture

(3-0-3)

This is the first of a two-semester senior seminar in oral history theory and methods. By surveying the current field, students will learn how oral history is uniquely suited to both contribute to historical knowledge and challenge dominant narratives. The final project will prepare students to engage in collecting oral histories during the spring semester if they register in Oral History II: Practicum.

HIST 30886. American Men, American Women

(3-0-3) Ardizzone

What does it mean to be male or female in America? How different are our ideas about gender from those of other cultures? This course will focus on the 20th century and look at the origins and development of masculine and feminine roles in the United States. How much have they changed over time and what aspects have been retained? We will explore the ways that cultural images, political changes, and economic needs have shaped the definition of acceptable behavior and life choices based on gender. Topics will range from Victorian ideals through the Jazz Age and war literature to movie Westerns, ‘50s television families, and ‘60s youth culture; and into recent shifts with women’s rights, extreme sports, and talk shows.

HIST 30890. Civil Rights and Protest Movements

(3-0-3) Ardizzone

This course will look at protest movements for civil rights and other related issues, focusing on the 20th century, especially the second half. One central theme will be the African American civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. How did race, gender, class, religion, and region impact the strategies, goals, and reception of various threads of black struggles for full citizenship? In addition, we will explore previous and later generations of African American activism, as well as other protest movements in the post-WWII period. How did the civil rights movement that emerged in the 1950s draw on early 20th-century activism and leadership? What directions did African American protest movements take after the late 1960s? How did other civil rights, racial and ethnic consciousness, and social reform movements in the 1960s, ‘70s, and ‘80s develop from their own historical experiences and in relationship to other protest movements?

HIST 30892. American Utopias

(3-0-3)

From our colonial roots to the present day, from the Puritans’ “City Upon a Hill” to the Branch Davidians and the Waco compound, Americans have been trying to create ideal communities based on their particular version of the truth. In this course, we will survey a wide variety of utopian communities, some based on protection from the world, others based on free love and/or perfection of human relations, some now considered cults, and others mainstream religions. We will examine how they were supposed to work versus how they worked in reality, and the dreams and beliefs upon which they were based. We will explore the ways these experiments in living were created by American culture and have, in turn, transformed it.

HIST 30893. The U.S.-Mexico Border in the American Imagination

(3-0-3) Ruiz

The United States-Mexico border has been a hotly contested social and political space since it took its current shape in the mid-19th century. Today, the border remains the source of contentious debates in the United States—from proposed amnesty for undocumented workers and unprecedented activism for migrants' rights to those who argue for a 700-mile fence to physically divide the two nations—even as Latinos have become America's largest minority group. This course will unpack these varied (and often contradictory) meanings of the border, paying particular attention to the history of representations of Mexico and "Mexican-ness" in the United States and their impact upon foreign policy, political organizing, and cultural relations. Our approach will be interdisciplinary, drawing on methods and texts from history, sociology, film studies, critical race theory, cultural studies, and ethnic studies. Together we will read texts as varied as Gloria Anzaldúa's Borderlands/La Frontera and Steven Soderberg's Traffic.

HIST 30895. Race and American Popular Culture

(3-0-3) Ruiz

While "race" is a notoriously difficult concept to define, it is undoubtedly a powerful force in American life. But how do we know what we know about race? Where do these ideas come from? How will matters of race and representation change in the era of Barack Obama? Focusing on the late 19th century to the present, this course explores the ways in which ideas about race are formed, negotiated, and resisted in the arena of American popular culture. From blackface minstrelsy on the Vaudeville stage to contemporary comedy, television, and music, this course will ask how popular culture actively shapes—rather than merely reflects—American ideas about race and ethnicity. Rather than emphasizing on a particular racial or ethnic group, we will more broadly examine the politics and practices of representing difference in the United States. By engaging with a diverse set of theoretical, historical, and primary texts, students will learn to approach and analyze popular culture with a critical eye.

HIST 30897. Home Fronts During War

(3-0-3)

In the wake of the events of September 11 and the current uncertainty of their effects on our military actions and international relations, this course turns to look within the United States. How have Americans responded at home to war and threats of war throughout the 20th century and into the 21st? What internal divisions and shared identities has war inspired or revealed? In other words, we will examine not the battles and factors that determined the military outcomes, but the domestic struggles that have defined our national experience and informed many of our responses to current events. Topics will include critiques of democracy and civil rights inclusion during WWI; treatment of Japanese Americans during WWII; development of peace movements, anti-nuclear movements; cold war politics and fears of American communism; debates over the draft, just-war, racism at home, and U.S. policies abroad in the wake of Vietnam. The final unit will focus on the Gulf War, terrorism, and developments since September 11, 2001.

HIST 30898. Latinos in American Film

(3-0-3) Ruiz

This course will survey the history of representations of Latinos in American cinema from the silent era to the present. We will examine how stereotypes associated with Latinos have been produced, reinforced, and challenged in American films—from "greasers" and "Latin lovers" to gangsters, kingpins, and border crossers. We will explore the fascinating contradiction that, despite a long history of misrepresentation and underrepresentation, Latinos have made significant contributions to Hollywood and independent cinema. We will also examine the rise of Latino directors in recent years and their drive to reframe the Latino image for American audiences. Screenings will range from the silent epic Martys of the Alamo (1915) to more recent films such as Maria Full of Grace (2004). Our interdisciplinary approach to the subject will draw upon readings from history, film theory and criticism, and ethnic/American studies.

HIST 30899. American Social Movements

(3-0-3)

Where does social protest fit in the history of American politics? What counts as activism? This interdisciplinary survey of civil rights and social protest movements in the United States examines 19th- and 20th-century movements, as well as several contemporary protest movements. These movements certainly question selected American ideologies, but they also draw on American values and practices. We will use history, film, fiction, journalism, and autobiographies to trace several traditions of protest that both depend on and offer challenges to a democratic society.

HIST 30901. Colonial Latin America

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32901

This course provides an introduction to the major themes of Latin American colonial history, including the discovery, conquest, and settlement of the New World; the institutional framework established by the Iberian countries to advance their economic, political, and religious interests in the region; and various aspects of Latin American society and culture until independence in the early 19th century.

HIST 30902. The Emergence of Nationalism in Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course provides an introduction to the major themes of 19th-century Latin American history. It provides an overview of the colonial background to the independence struggle that engulfed the region in the early part of the century, describes the motivations, and in many cases reluctance, of the colonies to disengage from the Spanish empire, and the legacies and opportunities for the construction of a new social, political, and economic order in the region. The course examines the influence of regionalism in the emergence of the new nations, and pays particular attention to the impact of liberalism on social, political, and economic structures in the region. Course requirements include reading assigned chapters and essays for each class, a midterm exam, a book review essay, and a final exam.

HIST 30903. Modern Latin America

(3-0-3)

From Patagonia at the extreme southern tip of South America to Ciudad Juárez on the U.S. border, the Latin American region encompasses a great diversity of nations, peoples, and cultures. This course examines central trends and problems in the study of Latin American history from the mid-19th century to the present, including Revolutions in Mexico, Guatemala, Cuba, Nicaragua, Chile and Peru; the Catholic Church in both its progressive and conservative faces; the pervasive influence of the United States; and the changing welfare of most Latin Americans through a century of economic development from the export boom to neoliberalism. We will use readings, film, news accounts, and lectures to examine this history. No previous exposure to Latin American history is necessary.

HIST 30911. Indigenous and Colonial Mexico

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the history of Mesoamerica from the Olmec, Mayan, and Aztec societies to Mexico's independence from Spain after 1800. We will examine the nature of several indigenous societies; their conquest and domination by Europeans; post-conquest debates concerning Indians' nature and colonial Indian policy; the structure of colonial society, including relations between Indians, Africans, and Europeans; Catholic conversions and the role of the Church; and finally, the causes of independence. We will use readings, lectures, discussions, archeological evidence, film, and literature throughout the course. Students need not have any background in Latin American history.

HIST 30912. History of Modern Mexico

(3-0-3) Pensado

This course examines Mexico from the late 19th century to the present. Through readings, lecture, discussion, film, and research, we will visit the major themes of modern Mexico. Our studies range from the country's economic growth at the turn of the century to NAFTA; from the violent years of revolution after 1910 to the gradual emergence of democracy in the 1990s; and from the many who have struggled with poverty to those few who have wielded economic and political power. One of the paradoxes of 20th-century Mexico is the juxtaposition of one of Latin America's most politically stable nations in a society filled with divisions and frequently with conflict. The ways in which the Mexican Revolution, the nation's unique agrarian reform project, and late-century neo-liberalism have shaped Mexico over the last century will receive particular attention.

HIST 30929. Andean History and Ethnohistory

(3-0-3) Graubart

Corequisite: HIST 32929

This course looks at the history of the peoples who live in the Andean region of South America (modern-day Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia) from some of the earliest recorded settlements through the end of Spanish colonization. Using ethnohistoric—archaeological and anthropological—as well as historic—written texts—materials, we will look at how Andean peoples adapted to and contributed to the formation of their societies, under arduous geographic and climatic conditions. Topics will include the formation of early imperial civilizations such as the Moche and Wari; the development of an Inca empire out of the remnants of these earlier cultures; Spanish conquest and colonization; the adaptation of Andean religiosity to Catholicism; the rebellions of the 18th century. The course will include a visit to the Snite Museum in order to work first-hand with objects from ancient Andean cultures.

HIST 30930. Chronicles of the Conquest of Latin America

(3-0-3)

This seminar examines key aspects of the conquest of Latin America through readings of chronicles and other texts written by Spaniards and Amerindians in the 15th–17th centuries. We will focus upon the ways in which Spaniards and Amerindians theorized and explained their experiences, and their representations of themselves and their “others.” In particular, we will pay attention to the beginnings of modern notions of race and ethnicity through discussions of barbarians, wildmen and cannibals, among other “types” important to the colonial encounter.

HIST 30940. U.S. Operations in Central America

(3-0-3) Pensado

As European countries furthered their economic penetration of Africa and Asia during the 19th century, the United States continued its westward expansion by extending its borders to the Pacific and securing its economic and political dominance throughout the Latin American Hemisphere. This course examines the social, cultural and political repercussions a broad range of U.S operations had in Central America since the writing of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823 until the “fall of communism” in the late 1980s, including “Dollar Diplomacy,” CIA-sponsored coups, paramilitary training of “death squads,” and overt military occupations.

HIST 30952. Inequalities in Latin American History

(3-0-3)

Any quick survey of contemporary Latin America quickly uncovers a glaring range of social inequalities. Sharp divides and diverging conditions separate individuals and groups along economic, political, ethnic, educational, and gender lines, to name a few. Although nearly all the earth's societies exhibit social inequalities, Latin America's have proved particularly endemic, enduring, and intractable; they have fundamentally shaped the region's potential for democratic governance and economic development; they are also deeply rooted in the region's past. This course will begin by examining manifestations of social inequalities in the region today. We will then spend most of the semester tracing the roots of today's conditions through the region's history. Students need not have any background in Latin American history.

HIST 30975. Making Australia

(3-0-3) Miscamble

The struggle to “make” Australia, as opposed to replicating Britain, got under way early on after European settlement, and it has been in process ever since. This course will seek to understand and illuminate this nation-building process. Approximately two-thirds of the course will be devoted to examining the major issues in Australia's history, beginning with an appropriate treatment of Aboriginal history through to the present debates over Australian identity and the nation's political structure. The final third of the course will explore important issues in contemporary society and culture. This course will have special interest for students who either have studied or plan to study in the Notre Dame Australia program. In addition to reading five or six books, students will view a number of important Australian documentary and feature films. A willingness to participate in extracurricular activities is a prerequisite for the course. (Please keep Wednesday evening clear in your schedule.) The course will involve lecture, discussion, and class presentations. Students will write a 10-page research paper and take mid-semester and final examinations.

HIST 30985. World History of Christianity Since 1900

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32985

A survey of the dramatic changes that have recently altered the face of Christianity in the world. For Catholics, Protestants, Eastern Orthodox, and the rapidly growing number of “independent” churches, the last century witnessed changes on a scale not seen since the first centuries of Christian history. The long-time Christian heartlands of Europe and North America have undergone unprecedented secularization. The once-missionary regions of Africa, Asia, and Latin America have developed larger communities of active believers than now exist in “the Christian West.” All over the world, Christian interactions with war (and peace), poverty (and affluence), disease (and health) have multiplied with increasing complexity. The course concentrates on Asia, Africa, and Latin America, with developments in Europe and North America in the background. Throughout, a primary aim is to link Christian events with major international developments like the world wars, the cold war, economic globalization, and colonization-decolonization.

HIST 30986. History and Photography

(3-0-3)

Both history and photography were practices invented and developed in the 19th century, and they share a capacity to illuminate events in the past. Both history and photography can depict human suffering and point to political practices that might alleviate that suffering. Both must grapple with the nature of time. Both, in odd ways, transcend, but also cement, the finality of death. Both promise a form of truthfulness which they to not always achieve. Given these similarities, it is no wonder that so many writers have considered them together. Often however, when compared, the distinctive qualities of each come to the fore. By reading about photography and history and by looking at images, students in this course will explore the limits and possibilities of each modern pursuit.

HIST 30987. The Canadian Alternative

(3-0-3) Noll

Corequisite: HIST 32987

This course offers an introduction to Canadian history that is designed especially for American students. While serious attention is devoted to the important phases, problems, personalities, and prospects of Canadian history considered as subjects in their own right, the question of comparison with the United States is always in view. Why, as examples of differences with the United States, has Canada possessed a national system of universal health care for at least two generations? What difference did it make for Canada to have two founding peoples (French, English) and two founding religions (Catholic, Protestant)? How did Canada's evolution into modern nationhood make it different from the United States with its revolutionary origins? Why does every Canadian province provide some kind of financial support for private schools, including religious schools? What are the advantages and disadvantages of Canada's parliamentary democracy compared with the United States' democratic republic?

HIST 30988. Slavery in the Atlantic World

(3-0-3) Challenger

This survey course explores the role of coerced African labor in the birth of the Atlantic World. What do we mean by Atlantic World? What do we mean by slavery? What varied and nuanced claims to humanity did Africans make against a dehumanizing labor system? How did sexuality and gender norms shape the experiences of slavery for men and women? Together, we will examine slave autobiographies, travel diaries, and pictorial sources to address these questions. We will focus on the peoples of West Africa, Brazil, and the Caribbean who were enslaved from the 15th to the 19th century. This course fulfills the degree requirements of history, gender studies, American studies, and Africana studies majors and minors.

HIST 33000. History Workshop

(3-0-3) Coleman; Kselman; Meserve

This course introduces students to how historians study the past. Students will gain insight into the nature of historical inquiry through discussion of exemplary works of history, analysis of primary source documents from various time periods and places, and, most important, their own efforts to write history. Readings will include important secondary historical works as well as discussions of how historians actually do history. Writing assignments will include at least two 10-page histories written by each student from primary source documents. This course is a requirement for—and open only to—history majors pursuing the standard major in history (not the supplementary major).

HIST 33005. Exploring History Beyond the Classroom

(1-0-1) Graff

In this special course designed for inquisitive history majors, students will attend a number of lectures, panels, and seminars on campus during the semester—and then have a follow-up discussion for each led by a historian (either a visitor or a member of the history faculty). Before each session, students will be expected to complete a short reading assignment. At each follow-up session, the students will submit a 1- to 2-page summary and analysis of the talk, with a critical question for discussion. The goal is to encourage students to enrich their major experience by participating in the intellectual discussions that occur amongst ND and visiting scholars across the campus.

HIST 35000. History Internship

(V-V-V)

History internship credit is designed for students who undertake unpaid internships with organizations dedicated to the discipline of history, whether through preservation, exhibition, public education, or scholarship. Please see the director of undergraduate studies for more information about this opportunity.

HIST 37050. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

Independent study of special topics under the direction of a faculty member. Requires permission of the faculty member as well as the director of undergraduate studies.

HIST 40123. American Occupation of Japan

(3-0-3)

After years of fierce fighting in the Pacific, the victorious Allies occupied Japan from August 1945 until 1952. The “Basic Initial Post-Surrender Directive” charged military occupiers and their civilian auxiliaries with democratizing the former enemy empire. This course examines three aspects of this effort, namely the political, economic, and cultural restructuring of Japan. We will explore the goals, methods, and mix-ups of the (mostly) American attempt to recast Japanese society in a democratic mold and the Japanese response. The Big Question—one that we will return to again and again in our discussions—is what is democracy and how is it created and sustained?

HIST 40180. Gandhi’s India

(3-0-3) Sengupta

The dominant figure in India’s nationalist movement for nearly thirty years, M.K. “Mahatma” Gandhi has also been the 20th-century’s most famous pacifist, and a figure of inspiration for peace and civil rights movements throughout the world. This course offers an examination of Gandhi and the nature of his unconventional and often controversial politics. It charts Gandhi’s career against the background of events in London, South Africa, and India. Examines the evolution and practical application of his ideas and techniques of nonviolent resistance, and his attitudes toward the economy, society, and state. Gandhi’s influence on Indian politics and society is critically assessed and his reputation as the “apostle of nonviolent revolution” examined in the light of developments since his death in 1948. Some of the questions that will be discussed are: How far did the distinctive character of Gandhian politics derive from his absolute commitment to India’s nationalist struggle? Was his success due to the force and originality of his political ideas and his advocacy of nonviolent action? Can his achievements be explained by political willness and pragmatism, or by willingness to embark on new experiments with the truth? Though helpful, a prior knowledge of Indian history is not required for this course.

HIST 40231. Cicero and Political Tradition

(3-0-3)

The life and writings of Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 B.C.) have been studied in light of the different aspects of his eventful career as a lawyer and advocate, orator, politician, statesman, and philosopher. His surviving writings—political and judicial speeches, treatises on religion, law, ethics, political philosophy and rhetoric, and also many personal letters—shed light on the diverse successes and reversals of his public and private life. Those who study Cicero tend to focus on one or two aspects of his achievement to the exclusion of the others. In this course, we will try to understand how the different branches of Cicero’s life and work fit together, why he thought that philosophy, law, and religion were relevant to politics, and why and how ethical considerations should condition one’s private and public life. In pursuing these issues, we will think about Cicero’s intellectual and political predecessors, both Greek and Roman, before reading a selection of his own writings. By way of understanding some aspect of Cicero’s enormous influence we will conclude with reading part of The Federalist Papers.

HIST 40232. Romans and Christians

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the early development of the Christian religion in its historical Roman context. It will begin with a survey of the political, social, and administrative structures of the Roman Empire in the period from Augustus to Constantine, move to a study of the complexity and diversity of Roman religious life and culture (with special attention to Mystery Cults, e.g., that of Isis), and then examine the development of the Jesus movement and Rome’s reaction to it. Particular topics to be studied will include miracle-working and the practice of magic, the problem of the historical Jesus, the sectarian and subversive character of early Christianity, the issue of how persecution and martyrdom are to be historically understood, and the meaning of religious conversion in the polytheistic Roman world. Above all, the course will concentrate on the questions of how and why, in historical terms, a new religious system came to have such appeal that Constantine chose to make himself the first Christian emperor of Rome.

HIST 40233. The Romans and Their Gods

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the way in which the Romans conceived of, worshipped, and communicated with the myriad gods of their pantheon. The course will focus first on conventional religious rituals and their cultural value, and secondly on the success of Roman polytheism in adapting to changing historical and social conditions. Particular attention will be paid to the so-called “Mystery Religions,” including Christianity, and their relationship to conventional forms of religious behavior.

HIST 40234. Family/Household in Roman World

(3-0-3)

A survey of the life-course in Roman antiquity. Topics studied will include marriage, divorce, child-rearing, old age, the way in which family and household were conceptualized by the Romans, and the demography of the Roman world.

HIST 40235. Rome, the Christians, and Early Europe

(3-0-3)

The course studies continuity and discontinuity in the Mediterranean world during a formative period, the transition from Roman Empire to early medieval European kingdoms. Christianity played a vital role during this transformation, but not the only one. Beginning with a review of Roman institutions, law, culture, and religion, we will observe the changes they underwent between c. 150 C.E. and c. 750 C.E. At this latter point in time, some people were still thinking of themselves as living within the Roman empire, even though the local potentate was a non-Roman king. Also, Roman law had become Christian law, and Latin was beginning to generate the languages now collectively described as “Romance.” On the fringes of Europe, in England and Ireland, meanwhile, missionaries shared with their converts not just Christianity but also the Latin language and Latin literature along with certain Roman concepts of culture and political organization.

HIST 40236. The Roman Empire

(3-0-3)

This advanced course in ancient history examines the Roman Empire from Augustus to Constantine. It deals with the establishment of the Augustan Principate and the progression of autocracy at Rome in the first two centuries of the imperial age, leading to discussion of what is generally called the third-century crisis and the new monarchy of Diocletian and Constantine. It investigates how the Roman Empire as a geopolitical unit was governed and administered (paying particular attention to the all-powerful figure of the Roman emperor), and how the diverse regional cultures of the greater Mediterranean world were affected by Roman rule. Among topics studied are contemporary debates on Roman society, economy, demography, and culture.

HIST 40237. The Roman World of Apuleius

(3-0-3)

An advanced course in Roman history and literature that investigates the Latin author Apuleius in his socio-cultural context. The course begins with the Romano-African setting into which Apuleius was born, recreates the educational travels to Carthage, Athens, and Rome that occupied his early life, and focuses especially on his trial for magic in Sabratha in Tripolitania before following him back to Carthage where he spent the remainder of his life. Notice will be taken of all Apuleius's writings, but special attention will be paid to the Apology, a version of the speech of defense made at his trial, and to the socio-cultural significance of his work of imaginative fiction, the Metamorphoses. The course is open to students with or without Latin.

HIST 40238. Creation, Time, and City of God in Augustine of Hippo

(3-0-3)

In his youth, Augustine (A.D. 354–430) received an excellent education in the Latin classics, the benefits of which remained with him throughout his life. Later, he also read philosophical writings, and, after his conversion, works by Christian authors. The book he quoted most frequently was the Bible. From his childhood, Augustine was endowed with a most unusual ability to ask awkward questions. Initially targeting his teachers, he later addressed his questions to the authors whose books he read, and to God. His writings, therefore, tend to take a dialogic form where the interlocutors include not only the reader but God, and—among human beings—Cicero, Vergil, and other Romans, and also Augustine's Christian contemporaries, including Jerome, Paulinus of Nola, and Count Marcellinus. To whom he addressed the City of God. In following these dialogues, we will read not just Augustine's best known writings (Confessions and City of God) but also his commentaries on Genesis, and some of his letters and sermons. The purpose is to arrive at an understanding of Augustine's ideas about creation and time, and about the nature of human society and its goals. We will also ask what can be learnt from Augustine's dialogic and sometimes disputatious way of thinking, explaining and debating. Almost all of Augustine's writings have been translated into English, but obviously, an ability to read Latin will be most useful.

HIST 40239. Augustine and the City of God

(3-0-3)

The aim of the course is to gain a detailed understanding of one of the world's important works of historical and political theology. Writing in response to the destruction of the City of Rome by Visigothic invaders in A.D. 410, Augustine devoted the first half of this “long and difficult work” to a refutation of Roman religion and ancient philosophy (Books I–X). In the second half (Books XI–XXII) he explained what he meant by City of God and Terrestrial City and traced the evolution through time of the two cities in relation to each other. We will study the City of God in light of the sources Augustine engaged with. For the first part, these include the philosophers Plato, Apuleius, Plotinus and Porphyry, the historians Sallust and Livy, and also the statesman Cicero and the poet Vergil. In the second part, Augustine builds on biblical theology, history, and chronology. To conclude, we will devote some time to the influence of this very long book. It will be studied in English, but those with viable Latin will be encouraged to use it.

HIST 40240. Constantine and Julian

(3-0-3) Bradley

This advanced seminar in ancient history and literature examines the lives and reigns of the fourth-century Roman emperors Constantine and Julian. Constantine was a pivotal figure in world history, the founder of a new dynasty of rulers in a centuries-old empire facing many challenges, and the first Roman emperor to embrace and promote Christianity. His rule changed the complexion of the ancient world. His descendant Julian reigned only for a short time, but he is remembered above all for the concerted effort he made to return Rome to its traditional religious orientation. He failed in his attempt, in part because of his premature death, but as the last pagan emperor of Rome, he remains a figure of almost mythological status. The course investigates the principal features of the history of these two rulers, political, military, socio-economic, and religious. A principal theme is the question of how historical experience can be recovered. Readings from original sources (in English translation) are studied in conjunction with documentary and iconographic evidence. The course also considers how modern historians, biographers, and novelists have recreated these compelling figures.

HIST 40252. Medieval Nobilities

(3-0-3) Boulton

This course will introduce students to one of the major areas of historical investigation in Europe since 1945: the evolution and function of the hereditary élites now generally called “nobilities.” Although alien to the culture and legal system of the United States, an élite social category of this general type dominated the economic, political, social, and cultural life of every major European people and state throughout and often somewhat beyond the agricultural or pre-industrial era of its history—most commonly to about 1918—and may be seen as a characteristic feature of politics on the levels of chiefdom and agricultural state throughout the world. Thus some understanding of the phenomenon of nobility and its many variant forms is essential to an understanding of the history not only of Europe, but of the civilized world in general before the 20th century. The course will begin with an examination of both medieval and modern ideas of “nobility” (which designated at once an inherent condition, a legal status, and a social category), the words employed to express those ideas, the ways in which noble status could be acquired and lost, the attributes that might be used to express it (including heraldic emblems), and the approaches taken to the whole phenomenon by social, political, constitutional, and cultural historians of various schools. It will then examine the history of a few of the numerous different nobilities that developed in the countries of Catholic Europe between 400 and 1500, and finally examine what is currently known about such themes as noble privilege, power, wealth, and influence.

HIST 40294. Thought and Culture in the High Middle Ages

(3-0-3)

This is a course about the thought and culture of Medieval Europe in the years 1100 to 1350. The course takes seriously the notion of “mind,” that all people, whatever their gender or social class, were gifted with powers of understanding and decision making amidst life's dilemmas. It asks what we know about how these people thought about, perceived, and experienced their world; what ideals they set for themselves, what they hoped to achieve; and how they set about the task of living. The course will proceed with lectures on specific topics and introductions to texts or authors, but in good part by way of a careful reading and discussion of assigned primary sources. Those sources will range from medieval romances to mystical poems, from political philosophy to devotional meditations.

HIST 40297. Knighthood and Chivalry in Medieval Europe, 750–1625

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the history of knighthood (the status of noble heavy cavalryman) and chivalry (the distinctive ethos and code of the knightly class) from their emergence in Western Europe between 950 and 1180 through their apogee between 1180 and 1380 to their slow decline between 1380 and 1625 (and their revival in the 19th century). It will deal first with the knight as warrior, vassal, and monk (in the religious orders of knighthood), then with the knight as nobleman and landowner, and finally with the knight as courtier and civil servant in the emerging state. It will next proceed to an examination of knightly games, festivals, and iconography, and conclude with a look at the survival and revival of chivalry in the post-Gothic period.

HIST 40475. Modern Russian Society and Politics I

(3-0-3)

This course examines selected critical issues in the foundations of modern Russian society and culture from the late 19th through the first half of the 20th century. Lectures and discussions include such topics as late Imperial politics and society, cultural innovation of the "Silver Age," World War I, Revolutions of 1917, creation of socialist society and culture, and the experience of the Stalinist terror. There will be a term paper, a midterm, and a final exam.

HIST 40476. Modern Russian Society and Politics II

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the history of Russia and its peoples in the second half of the 20th century, with a particular focus on the role of politics and ideology in Soviet (1941–91) and contemporary Russian society (1991–2000). We will explore the experience of the Great Patriotic War, late Stalinism and post-Stalinist socialism, the emergence of the Soviet Empire at the end of the Second World War, the collapse of the communist regime, and the disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991, as well as Russia's uneasy transition out of totalitarianism during the last decade of the 20th century. Students will be asked to take midterm and final examinations and to write a term paper.

HIST 40502. Family and Society in Early Modern Italy

(3-0-3)

A dialogue intensive class focusing on the family and society in early modern Italy.

HIST 40551. History of Modern Astronomy

(3-0-3)

Traces the development of astronomy and cosmology from the late 17th century to the 1930s. Attention is given to the interactions of astronomy with other areas of science and with philosophical, religious, and social factors.

HIST 40580. Enlightenment in Europe

(3-0-3)

By intensively studying diverse works we shall first try to map the sheer variety of the cultural achievements of Europeans, from Dublin to Naples and Koenigsberg to Madrid, during the long 18th century (ca. 1687–1807). Then we shall critically analyze some of the major scholarly efforts to reduce and organize it all into some unitary movement, usually called "the enlightenment." Requirements include actively participating in class meetings, which will center on our discussions of particular works, two examinations, and writing a 15- to 20-page integrative essay on one of the major themes (freedom, power, knowledge, faith, emotions, history, and progress) of the works we study together.

HIST 40628. African American Resistance

(3-0-3)

Through a close examination of 12 historical events, we will study African American resistance in the United States from the 17th century through the 20th century. We will employ a case study method and seek to categorize and characterize the wide variety of African American resistance. Our study will include the politics of confrontation and civil disobedience, polarization of arts, transformation of race relations, the tragedies and triumphs of Reconstruction, interracial violence, black political and institutional responses to racism and violence, the Harlem Renaissance, jazz, blues, and the civil rights and black power movements. Students will be confronted with conflicting bodies of evidence and challenged to analyze these issues and arrive at conclusions. Music and film will supplement classroom discussions.

HIST 40630. Crime, Heredity, and Insanity in American History

(3-0-3)

The 19th century witnessed a transformation in the understanding of the origins of criminal behavior in the United States. For many, a religious emphasis on humankind as sinful gave way to a belief in its inherent goodness. But if humans were naturally good, how could their evil actions be explained? Drawing on studies done here and abroad, American doctors, preachers, and lawyers debated whether environment, heredity, or free will determined the actions of the criminal. By the early 20th century, lawyers and doctors had largely succeeded in medicalizing criminality. Psychiatrists treated criminals as patients; judges invoked hereditary eugenics in sentencing criminals. Science, not sin, had apparently become the preferred mode of explanation for the origins of crime. But was this a better explanation than what had come before? Discussion will be the primary form of instruction.

HIST 40851. African American Civil Rights Movement

(3-0-3)

There may not be a term in American society as recognized, and yet as misunderstood, as "civil rights." Often civil rights are conflated with human rights, even though each are distinct of the other. During the semester, we will trace the African American civil rights movement in the United States during the 20th century, as well as its lasting impact on American society. We will do so using as many media as possible. Fortunately, we will have the opportunity to study an important part of American history in significant detail. The time span we cover will not be that great, but the issues we investigate challenge the founding principles of American society to its core.

HIST 40853. United States and the Vietnam War

(3-0-3) Brady

This course examines the participation of the United States in its "longest war"—the conflict in Vietnam. The course is taught primarily from an "American" as opposed to a "Vietnamese" perspective. Broad topics to be covered include: Vietnamese background (land, people, history, culture); American political and diplomatic decision making; 1950-75: how the war was fought; debating the war; the war at home; the aftermath of war; and lessons of the war. This is a lecture AND a discussion course.

HIST 40855. Labor Movements in Twentieth-Century United States

(3-0-3)

This course explores American workers' collective efforts as workers in their search for economic security, political power, and social and cultural autonomy from the 1890s to the near present. For the most part, this course will focus on the unions and related organizations forged by workers throughout the past century—from major umbrella groups like the American Federation of Labor, the Industrial Workers of the World, and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, to important sectoral actors like the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, the United Automobile Workers, the American Federation of Teachers, and the United Farm Workers. The central questions of the course will be: When, where, and why have U.S. workers organized collectively in the 20th century—and how successful have they been? What has been the response of employers, the government, and the public at large to these collective efforts of workers, and how and why have those responses changed over time? What has been the relationship between organized labor and racial and gender discrimination, as well as the causes of racial and gender equality? And how have Americans generally, and workers in particular, understood the labor movement in relation to capitalism, freedom, and democracy?

HIST 40857. History of Sport and the Cold War

(3-0-3) Soares

This course will explore the ways that sport reflected the political, ideological, social, economic and military struggle known as the cold war. Sport permitted opportunities to defeat hated rivals or to develop competition more peacefully. It reflected the internal politics and societies in nations, and also illuminated relations among allies. Using a variety of readings, media accounts, and film clips, this course will look at a number of crucial teams, athletes, and events from the cold war, including the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team, the controversial 1972 Olympic basketball final, “ping pong diplomacy,” Olympic boycotts, Martina Navratilova and other Eastern European tennis stars, East German figure skater Katarina Witt, Romanian gymnast Nadia Comaneci, the ferocious Soviet-Czechoslovakian hockey rivalry following the Soviet invasion of 1968, and more.

HIST 40858. Nebraska v. Fields: Death by Abortion, 1920

(3-0-3)

Students who have not taken the prerequisite courses but have a background and/or particular interest in the study of gender in history are welcome to appeal to the department for permission to register for this course. In 1921, Dr. Leslie S. Fields of Omaha, Neb., was sentenced to one-to-10 years in prison for performing an illegal abortion resulting in the death of 20-year-old Miss Ruth Ayer. Although the case has long been forgotten, a complete, word-for-word transcript of Fields's five-day trial recently surfaced on Ebay. This hitherto-unknown, and never-before-analyzed document opens a window into the histories of gender, law, medicine, society, and culture in the American heartland at the end of the Progressive Era. Students in this class will begin the work of unpacking and analyzing the history and context of the story told by that trial transcript. The first half of the class will be devoted to understanding the broader historical context of the law, medicine, politics, women, and abortion during the early 20th century; to that end, a number of secondary source books and articles will be read and students may be asked to locate and read a variety of relevant primary and secondary sources to help us understand the larger historical context. During the last half of the class, each student will research and write an in-depth report on one person, aspect or issue raised by the case of the State of Nebraska vs. Leslie S. Fields.

HIST 40859. Jim Crow America

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (HIST 30800 OR AFAM 30202 OR AMST 30341 OR HESB 30458)

“Jim Crow” laws barred African Americans from access to employment and to public places such as restaurants, hotels, and other facilities. In the South especially, blacks lived in fear of racially motivated violence. The history of Jim Crow encompassed every part of American life, from politics to education to sports. The emergence of segregation in the South began immediately after the Civil War when the formerly enslaved people acted to establish their own churches and schools separate from whites. Many southern states tried to limit the economic and physical freedom of the formerly enslaved by adopting laws known as Black Codes. In Jim Crow America, we will study the vast literature that encompasses the origination, sustenance, resistance, and eventual defeat of Jim Crow, along with the lingering effects of the organized infrastructure of inequality in America.

HIST 40884. Oral History I: Memory and Truth

(3-0-3)

This is the first of a two-semester senior seminar in oral history theory and methods. By surveying the current field, students will learn how oral history is uniquely suited to both contribute to historical knowledge and challenge dominant narratives. The final project will prepare students to engage in collecting oral histories during the spring semester if they register in Oral History II: Practicum.

HIST 40885. The Meaning of Things

(3-0-3)

“The Meaning of Things:” asks how objects as diverse as a ND class ring, a pair of jeans, a lava lamp, or an iPod acquire meaning and value. This seminar will introduce students to a range of practices relating to consumption in American history. We will investigate the gendered aspects of production, marketing, buying, and using goods as these impact not only on gender, but also on the construction of a range of identities. This will lay the foundation for students to write substantive individual research papers on a “thing” of their choice.

HIST 40891. Race, Gender, and Women of Color

(3-0-3)

This seminar analyses dominant American beliefs about the significance of race and gender primarily through the focusing lens of the experiences of women of color in the United States. How did intersecting ideologies of race and gender attempt to define and limit the lives of women of color as well as other American? How have women of color responded to and reinterpreted white American ideas about their identity to develop their own self-defenses and ideologies?

HIST 40893. Media and the Presidency

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41501

As the brouhaha over Howard Dean's “yell” illustrates, media have come to play a key role in the coverage of presidential elections. This course examines how print and broadcast media have functioned in U.S. elections since the way we choose a President was first established. After a brief overview of changing relationships between journalists and presidential candidates in the 19th century, we will focus on elections since the 1920s, when radio first broadcast election updates. We will analyze how candidates have used radio, television, and the Internet to construct images of themselves and their platforms, and how journalists have become an active force in representing the political process. Rather than see electronic media as neutral or “objective,” we will assess the narrative strategies and visual and verbal codes by which media present politics to us, the voters.

HIST 40896. Presidency in American Culture

(3-0-3)

This course examines the interactions among journalists, media companies, and Presidents in the United States since the Great Depression. Throughout the term, we will emphasize several general principles or trends. We will explore how new forms of technology have triggered changes in political practice, a trend that becomes clear when we analyze the role the Internet has taken in this year's campaign. During the semester we will look at representations of Presidents and the presidency that are embodied in films and television programs.

HIST 40909. Gender, Sexuality, and Colonization in Latin America

(3-0-3) Graubart

In this course, we will examine the historical construction of gendered roles in the Spanish colonial world. This will entail thinking about gender in the societies that “encountered” each other in the New World, and also thinking about how that encounter produced new forms of gendered relations. Among the questions we will consider: How was the conquest gendered? How did colonial society produce masculinity as well as femininity? What gendered forms of power were available to women? How did ethnicity and caste, as well as gender, determine people's sense of themselves and their “others”? The course will look at a mixture of primary and secondary materials, including letters and chronicles written by men and women, testimony before the Spanish Inquisition, poetry, and novels. While there are no prerequisites for this seminar, some familiarity with colonial Latin American history will be helpful.

HIST 40910. Experience of Conquest: Native Perceptions of Relations with Spaniards in 16th-C. Mesoamerica

(3-0-3) Fernandez-Armesto

Experience of Conquest explores Native American perceptions of and relations with Spaniards in 16th-C. Mesoamerica.

HIST 40950. Global Development in Historical Perspective

(3-0-3)

The difference between rich and poor nations is not, as Ernest Hemingway once said, that the rich have more money than the poor, but is in part because the rich produce more goods and services. Industrialization, in other words, has often brought wealth (as well as social dislocation and protest) to those who have succeeded. This course examines the process of industrialization from a comparative perspective and integrates the history of industrialization and its social consequences for Western Europe (Britain and Germany), the United States, Latin America (Mexico), and East Asia (Japan and South Korea). We will concentrate on these countries' transition from agriculture-based societies to industrial societies. We will analyze the process of industrialization on two levels from above the role of political authority and from below a view of factory life, industrial relations, and protest from the perspective of workers and the working classes. No specific prerequisites in history or economics are necessary.

HIST 40951. Technology and Development in History

(3-0-3)

Technologies are often seen as either the product of human genius and achievement, or as an alienating, inhuman, and sometimes destructive force. Both perspectives argue that technological change has been one of the most important forces shaping world history over recent centuries. This course examines technological developments and theories of technological change in world history. It focuses on the relationship between new technologies, social change, and economic development since 1750, surveying cases from Britain, the United States, China, Japan, and Latin America. We will pay special attention to technology transfers: the movement of new machines and processes and knowledge from one society to another, and the ways that social, cultural, and political forces have shaped technological change in different parts of the world.

HIST 40952. Slavery and Human Bondage

(3-0-3) Hauser

For many Americans, the history of slavery is synonymous with plantations in the Atlantic world. This course seeks to expand our view of Atlantic slavery by looking to the ancient world, Africa, Asia, and Europe in historic and contemporary contexts. This course examines slavery as a labor system and a social form intimately connected with the political economies and cultural groups within which it arose. It will also examine debates about contemporary forms of bonded labor and slavery emerging from global encounters today. By examining different types of bonded and unfree labor, such as chattel, domestic, and wage slavery, we will form an inquiry about slavery's relationship to the following: personhood and social death; the emergence of market economies; systems of differentiation used to maintain the social condition of the enslaved; and power and violence. This course will take an interdisciplinary approach relying on archaeology, anthropology, and history for our case studies in understanding this particular social form.

HIST 40973. Archives and Empires: Inca/Spaniards

(3-0-3)

Traditionally, scholars have highlighted the differences between the Inca Empire and that of its Spanish conquerors. These differences are indeed striking, and will be explored in this course. But there are also similarities between the two imperial polities, which we will likewise study. Attention will focus on the production, collection, ordering, and storage of information by both imperial and local authorities, and on how this information was used. The Incas recorded administrative and narrative information on quipus (knotted cords) and with reference to indigenous Andean languages. The Spanish in the Andes briefly used this system before switching to alphabetic writing and the Spanish language. Questions we will address include: Did this change affect the kind of information that was preserved, and if so, how? And also, what role did culture and religion (as documented in imperial records) play in the creation and maintenance of imperial power?

HIST 40974. de las Casas: Context/Resonance

(3-0-3)

The Spanish conquest of Central and South America generated a crisis of conscience in Spanish universities and in Spain at large. People wanted to know: Was the conquest justified, and if not, seeing that it could not be undone, what were the invaders to do? In this prolonged and often bitter debate, Bartolome de las Casas (1484–1566), Dominican friar and bishop of Chiapa in Mexico, formulated what still are among the most moving and intellectually incisive arguments for the equality of all human beings. He also wrote one of the earliest comparative histories of civilization (the Apologetica Historia). The task of the course is to understand the thought of Las Casas and his followers in its 16th-century context, and then to enquire into the connections between the ideas of Las Casas and contemporary theologians of liberation, in particular Gustavo Gutierrez.

HIST 40985. Historical Archaeology

(3-0-3) Rotman

This course examines the methodological and theoretical foundations for the archaeology of European colonization and the post-colonial material world. Course materials focus on material life and the diversity of sociocultural experiences in North America since 1492. The class examines how historical archaeologists have interpreted life in the world of global capitalism and colonization over the last half millennium and how archaeological insights can be used to understand and critique our own world. The distinctive analytical techniques of historical archaeology will be studied, including documentary research, artifact analysis methods, and field excavation techniques. The course will probe the interdisciplinary nature of historical archaeology, assess the social significance of archaeological knowledge, and scrutinize cultural, class, and gendered influences on archaeological interpretation.

HIST 40986. Space, Place, and Landscape

(3-0-3) Rotman

In this course, we will explore human relationships to the built environment and the complex ways in which people consciously and unconsciously shape the world around them. Cultural landscapes are not empty spaces, but rather places we imbue with meaning and significance. We are particularly interested in the ways in which the built environment has worked as an agent of cultural power as well as how social relations (notably class, gender, and ethnicity) have been codified and reproduced through landscapes. We will examine how people perceive, experience, and contextualize social spaces at the intersection of symbolic processes, senses of place, memory, and identity formation, as well as how these change through time and across space. As an interdisciplinary endeavor, we will draw from history, geography, art, environmental science, architecture, landscape studies, anthropology, and urban planning, among other disciplines. Students will undertake a significant original research project that investigates the human experience through space, place, and landscape.

HIST 43075. Seminar: Jerusalem

(3-0-3)

This research seminar provides an in-depth examination of the city of Jerusalem and its diverse historical experiences from the rise of Islam to the present (ca. 600–2000). Although the instructor will provide background information and feedback, this course is primarily student-driven: You will lead portions of discussions, present your research, and constructively critique the work of your peers. In addition to certain common readings, discussions will center on certain "hot topics" in the historical image of Jerusalem. Students will be assigned specific, usually "classic" studies of the topic at hand. Specific topics include the meaning of the Dome of the Rock; pilgrimage; the origin(s) of the Crusades; cross-cultural notions of sanctity; the Ottoman context, and the divided city. Rather than a simple chronological "biography" of a city, this course will provide a nuanced introduction to one of the most enduring symbols in Western, Jewish, and Islamic civilization.

HIST 43130. Seminar: Occupation of Japan

(3-0-3)

After years of fierce fighting in the Pacific, the victorious Allies occupied Japan from August 1945 until 1952. The “Basic Initial Post-Surrender Directive” charged military occupiers and their civilian auxiliaries with democratizing the former enemy empire. This course examines three aspects of this effort, namely the political, economic, and cultural restructuring of Japan. We will explore the goals, methods, and mix-ups of the (mostly) American attempt to recast Japanese society in a democratic mold and the Japanese response. The Big Question—one that we will return to again and again in our discussions—is what is democracy and how is it created and sustained?

HIST 43230. The Age of Hadrian

(3-0-3)

This advanced seminar in ancient history and literature examines the life and reign of the Roman emperor Hadrian, who is remembered as one of the most complex and enigmatic of Roman rulers: the builder of the Wall in Britain and the Pantheon and Castel Sant’Angelo in Rome, an inveterate traveler across the ancient Mediterranean world, a devotee of Greek culture, a reformer of Roman law, a poet who mused about his soul on his death-bed, a creator of new gods, the first Roman emperor to wear a beard. A principal theme of the course is the question of how historical experience can be recovered, and readings from original sources (in English translation) are studied in conjunction with documentary and iconographic evidence. The course also considers how modern historians, biographers, and novelists have recreated this mysterious figure, Ronald Syme and Marguerite Yourcenar included.

HIST 43250. Seminar: Travel in the Middle Ages and Beyond

(3-0-3)

Many familiar events (from Exodus, to the voyages of Columbus, the Crusades, or the American Gold Rush) can be seen as examples of travel in history. This seminar will examine the phenomenon of travel, and will look at different types of travelers, including soldiers, pilgrims, explorers, missionaries, adventurers, and merchants. We will concentrate on the medieval period (500–1500 C.E.), but will also consider travel in other periods. The chronological scope of the course will be broad in order to trace changing perceptions of the world from the early Middle Ages up through the voyages of Marco Polo and Christopher Columbus. We will read the writings of Christian, Jewish, and Muslim travelers, and will discuss the differing motives, interests, and concerns of these itinerant men and women. We will also discuss the evolution of cartography, and shifting views of the world as revealed in early maps. The course will cover the technical aspects of medieval travel, with a discussion of roads, bridges, inns, overland transport, and shipping. We will also consider less physical aspects of travel and the ways in which medieval writers employed the metaphor of travel in different genres of literature such as the epic quest and accounts of spiritual journeys. Students will write a research paper based on primary sources broadly concerned with issues of travel in a historical period of their choice.

HIST 43252. Heretics and Friars, Mystics and Nuns

(3-0-3)

From about 1100 until about 1400, European society witnessed wave after wave of new religious movements. These energies yielded groups and teachers of all stripes, men and women regarded as heretics and as saints. This course will treat the most important of these, from the Cistercian monks who rejected the established ways of their fellow Benedictines around 1100, to Francis of Assisi’s lay penitents and preachers, to suspect beguines in the Lowlands and the Rhineland mystics. The emphasis will fall upon studying texts from these religious teachers and actors that will help us get at the aspirations of these new religious, while setting them in their social and cultural environments.

HIST 43410. Seminar: Victorian Revolution in Government

Prior to the 19th century, government—particularly in the British Isles—was expected to be minimal, occasional, amateur (and cheap), concerned only with maintaining property and religion, and, when unavoidable, with the defense of the realm. Modern governments (including the British) are large, permanent, professional (and costly), complex bureaucracies, concerned with how much you can load on a ship, what colors you can put in margarine, what you must learn in school, and with the regulation of the economy; the welfare of all citizens; and the quality of the environment, social and natural. We know that this revolutionary change in government happened during the 19th century, primarily in response to the great social changes of urbanization and industrialization, but historians disagree as to how it came about. Early in the semester, our meetings will be devoted to a critical reading of the state of the historical literature on this question; in the middle, we will be learning to use the archives; and toward the end, we will be meeting together to discuss our interpretations of the evidence. This seminar will meet the research seminar requirement for history majors, who have priority in enrollment. The seminar is also recommended to any student with an interest in public service or public policy.

HIST 43435. Irish Memoir and Autobiography

(3-0-3) Smyth

This seminar has four basic objectives: to explore different ways in which to read texts, to explore the different ways in which memoir and autobiography can be read, to introduce modern Irish social and political history to students through the lives of the authors, and to introduce students to different human experiences. Key texts may include Frank McCourt’s Angela’s Ashes, Brendan Behan’s Borstal Boy, and Maurice O’Sullivan’s Twenty Years Agrowing. In addition, we may study extracts from other books, by writers such as William Carlton, Elizabeth Bowen, and Robert Harbinson.

HIST 43440. Northern Ireland Troubles

(3-0-3)

This discussion-based seminar explores the history of the six northeastern counties of Ireland that became “Northern Ireland” in 1920/1. Northern Ireland remained part of the United Kingdom and had a built-in Protestant unionist majority. The Catholic minority, alienated from the state from the outset, looked across the new border and to Dublin, capital of the Irish Free State, as the true site of their allegiance. Northern Ireland was thus, from the beginning, dysfunctional, scarred by sectarian violence and systematic discrimination in housing and employment. After examining the origins of the state and the early decades of its existence, the seminar will turn to its main concern “the Troubles,” which broke out in the late 1960s. The major episodes under scrutiny include the civil rights movement, Bloody Sunday, the hunger strikes, and the Good Friday Peace Agreement. Students are obliged to produce a 25-page essay based on original research, and many are expected to draw on the rich microfilm archive of “the troubles,” the Linenhall Collection, held in the Hesburgh Library.

HIST 43470. Seminar: The Russian Revolution

(3-0-3)

This research seminar is designed to familiarize history majors with main categories of primary sources (e.g., official documents, diaries, memoirs, correspondence), major historical interpretations, and historical method through study of selected events of the Russian Revolution. Students are expected to write a major research paper.

HIST 43550. Research Seminar: The Cold War

(3-0-3) Soares

This course will explore the cold war as a cultural phenomenon. We will consider the cold war’s impact on American art and popular culture, and culture as a venue of cold war confrontation. We also will treat international sport as a form of cold war cultural competition and sometimes cooperation. The course will be structured around American society and U.S.-Russian cultural rivalry, but the cold war was not limited to the United States and students’ interests in other nations will be encouraged. The main work in the course will be a research paper on a topic each student will devise in consultation with the instructor.

HIST 43552. Seminar: Nationalism in Europe

(3-0-3)

This course will begin with several joint sessions devoted to an examination of the role nationalism has played in shaping modern European history. Given the broad nature of the course, emphasis will be placed on the theoretical underpinnings of nationalism, and on how national mythology influences historiography. The second portion of the course offers students an opportunity to conduct research on topics approved by the instructor. Research can focus on any European national experience in either the 19th or the 20th century. The instructor will consider topics touching on any aspect of diplomatic, social, religious, intellectual, or political history as long as the inquiry helps to enlarge our understanding of European nationalism. Students will be expected to present the results of their research at the end of the semester. Course requirements include submission of a bibliography, a thesis statement, a first draft, and a 25-page research paper at the end of the term. No prior knowledge of European history is required, though some basic knowledge of historical events will provide a firmer foundation to select a research topic. Students with even a rudimentary knowledge of a European foreign language will be expected to test their linguistic abilities in the final research project.

HIST 43553. Seminar: Republicanism

(3-0-3)

“Republicanism” refers principally, but not exclusively, to republican ideas in the English-speaking Atlantic world in the period 1600 to 1800. After looking briefly at republican ideology in the ancient world and in renaissance Europe, the seminar will move to the substance of the course: the English “classical” republicans of the 17th century, such as Marchamont Nedham, John Milton, and James Harrington; the transmission of their ideas to 18th-century America; and, finally, the particular version of republicanism as it developed in Ireland in the same period. This seminar course is discussion-based. Members of the seminar are expected to research topics, which will at first be stipulated by the instructor, and will subsequently be of the student’s own choice. Students will present the findings of their research as the basis for leading a class discussion. The semester’s work will conclude with a 20-page essay on a subject negotiated between the student and the instructor.

HIST 43554. Major Research Seminar: Europe in the Two World Wars

(3-0-3)

Students in this seminar will devote much of their time to producing a major research paper on some aspect of European history in the age of the world wars. Substantial work with primary sources is required. As a group we will also read and discuss some important studies by scholars of World Wars I and II.

HIST 43555. Seminar: Europe in the Nazi Era

(3-0-3)

This research seminar will address issues related to the rise, expansion, and defeat of Nazism between 1933 and 1945. Although Germany occupies a central place in this history, we will focus on the Europe-wide impacts of Nazi ideas and aggression. Students will read and discuss key works in the field dealing with topics such as Hitler’s rise to power, European diplomacy in the 1930s; the course of World War II; Nazi occupation practices; the Holocaust and other programs of mass killing; women and the war effort; popular consensus, collaboration, and resistance; and the immediate postwar period. At the same time, each student will write a major research paper, based on primary sources, that explores in depth some aspect of this crucial period of European history. Class time will be divided approximately equally between discussing common readings and developing the skills necessary to produce a research paper.

HIST 43557. Seminar: Modern European Revolutions

(3-0-3)

This research seminar is designed to familiarize history majors with main categories of primary and secondary sources, major historical interpretations, and historical method through study of selected events and personalities of Modern European Revolutions, including the Russian Revolutions of 1905, 1917, and 1991; Eastern European Revolutions of 1989; the Orange Revolution in Kiev in November and

December 2004 (as well as the Velvet Revolution in Tbilisi in the fall of 2003). Students are required to write a major research paper based largely on primary sources.

HIST 43558. Major Seminar: European Enlightenment

(3-0-3) Sullivan

The course will establish that enlightenment (not THE Enlightenment) brought into being the modern Atlantic world. Because European enlightenment was various and contradictory, our own world is various, tense, and contradictory. It is impossible to understand the formative long 18th century (ca. 1687–1807) as a game of either capture the flag or follow the leader. Sampling some of the variety of the cultural achievement of Europeans, from Ireland to Italy and from Prussia to Spain, will locate everyone on a level playing field. (No prior knowledge of European history is expected.) You will devote the rest of the semester to researching and writing of seminar papers on one or another major theme of or contributor to enlightenment in Europe. You will present your seminar papers for class discussion over the last four meetings of the semester. Students who possess even an elementary reading knowledge of a non-English European language will apply their knowledge in their seminar papers.

HIST 43559. The Age of Democratic Revolutions, 1770–1850

(3-0-3)

Between 1770 and 1850 North America, South America, and Europe were swept by waves of revolutionary unrest, a period that marks the beginnings of the modern world across several dimensions—political, social, and cultural. This seminar will begin with some common readings, looking at this period in comparative perspective through works by R.R. Palmer, Eric Hobsbawm, and others, in order to define both the common and distinctive features of the revolutions as they affected the different nations. Students will write research papers of about 25 pages based on their interests in particular topics and regions.

HIST 43560. Communist Europe: The Soviet Bloc, 1945–91

(3-0-3)

This research seminar examines the rise, progression, and fall of communist regimes in East Central Europe, the conglomeration of states that by 1948 had fallen under the Soviet political and military domination. The left and the right are elusive concepts in Eastern Europe. Therefore, we will begin by analyzing communism against the backdrop of the political and historical traditions in the region. We will examine how the communists conformed to domestic realities, in order to identify commonalities and differences between members of the Soviet bloc. Primary issues include: communist takeovers and the founding of people’s democracies; the cold war rivalry and its impact on the communist regimes; Stalinism and de-Stalinization; the pattern of relationship between the Moscow center and its Eastern European peripheries; the entanglement of nationalism and communism; pluralism within communism; détente and the democratic opposition; the dynamics of the revolutionary and reforming processes that led to the collapse of the communist system. Students will research and write a 25-page paper based upon primary and secondary sources.

HIST 43561. Seminar: Religion, Politics, and Society in Modern Europe

(3-0-3)

This seminar will deal with some of the key problems in the history of religion in modern Europe. Students are expected to write a major research paper for the course, based on a topic and a set of primary sources chosen in consultation with the instructor. For the purposes of this course modern Europe begins with the French Revolution and concludes with the present, a period of just over 200 years that witnessed enormous and significant changes in the relationship between church and state, in the cultural status of religion, and the ways in which individuals defined and enacted religious identities. The course will deal with key events and institutions, starting with the religious conflicts sparked by the French Revolution. We will then consider religious responses to the Industrial Revolution, and the ways in which churches and religious practice have been shaped by urbanization, the growth of the working class, and changes in family life and gender relations. The relationship between religion and modern political ideologies constitutes another major topic of the course, which will deal with the responses of Christians and Christian churches to liberalism, nationalism, and socialism, and to the totalitarian regimes of the 20th century. We will conclude with some readings and discussion of the contemporary religious scene in Europe, looking particularly at the issues of secularization and the status of Islam. Students will spend the first half of the course reading works that will introduce them to the historical literature on the history of religion in modern Europe, defining a topic that they will pursue for their essays, and identifying relevant primary and secondary sources. In the second half of the course students will concentrate on research and writing. They will meet individually with the instructor several times, and periodically with the class to discuss progress and findings.

HIST 43610. Seminar: Notre Dame History

(3-0-3)

This seminar will offer the student the opportunity to research an aspect of Notre Dame history of his or her particular interest—academic program, student life, administrative decision, etc. Research topics might include Father Sorin's rebuilding of the Main Building after the fire of 1879; priest-chaplains serving in the Civil War; Notre Dame during World War I or World War II; Rev. Julius Nieuwland, C.S.C., and the discovery of synthetic rubber; Notre Dame's Minims Department (grade school); Notre Dame's Preparatory School (high school); Notre Dame's Manual Labor School; immigrant scholars on the Notre Dame faculty in the 1930s; Holy Cross religious as Japanese prisoners of war in World War II; the inauguration of the Great Books Program; Rev. John J. Cavanaugh, C.S.C., and the Kennedy Family; Rev. Theodore Hesburgh, C.S.C., and the Civil Rights Commission; etc. After some introductory readings on the history of the University, the principal work of the course will be the research, in primary and secondary sources, and the writing of a paper of approximately 30 pages, and a presentation of the paper for class discussion.

HIST 43612. Seminar: U.S. Catholic History

(3-0-3)

This seminar is designed with two goals in mind: to introduce students to the major events and themes in the history of American Catholicism, and to help students organize, research, and write an original work of historical scholarship. During the first half of the semester, we will read and discuss a variety of primary and secondary sources concerning the following topics: immigrant and ethnic Catholicism; the experience of Catholic women, especially women religious; Catholic devotional life; Catholic social movements; and the relationship between Catholics and the broader American society. We will explore some of the major historical interpretations of the Catholic experience, and become familiar with methods of historical research. During the second half of the semester, students will work independently (in consultation with the instructor) to prepare their research papers. At the end of the semester, they will share their findings with other participants in the seminar through an oral presentation.

HIST 43613. Seminar: U.S. Legal History

(3-0-3)

This course examines the role of law in the history of the United States from its origins as a British colony to the late 20th century. It looks at law not only as a functional response to social transformation, but also as both a powerful force shaping daily life and as a key component of American political mythology. The course will examine constitutional, common, and statute laws, as well as legal culture and institutions. Key subjects include the market revolution, slavery, the Civil War amendments, laissez-faire constitutionalism, legal realism, the New Deal, and civil rights. This course combines lecture and discussion. To that end, the instructor will pick three to five students each week to be responsible for the reading, and will call on those students during class. Each student will be on-call at least twice during the semester, it is advisable for you to read for every session, as it will be difficult to follow the lecture without adequate preparation.

HIST 43615. The Right to Vote in American History, 1607–present

(3-0-3)

This research seminar focuses on the right to vote in American history. Students will explore the right to vote as it evolved over the course of American history, beginning with the colonial experiments in Virginia in the 17th century and ending with the contested presidential elections of 2000 and 2004. Alex Keyssar's The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States will provide the central text, and we will investigate case studies centering on age, property, religion, race, gender, naturalization, and other issues throughout four centuries of American history. Each student will explore one particular case study from any period in American history and produce a 25-page paper based on primary source research.

HIST 43617. Seminar: Race and Religion in North America

(3-0-3)

This course aims at preparing students to write a substantial paper on a topic involving the interconnection of race and religion. While a few assignments will touch on Latin America and the Caribbean, the main focus is on North America. The first half of the course will be devoted to intensive readings in major works and anthologies of primary sources, and in selection of a topic for research. Readings will come from books like Colin Kidd, The Forging of Race: Race and Scripture in the Protestant Atlantic World, 1600-2000; David Brion Davis, Inhuman Bondage: The Rise and Fall of Slavery in the New World; Jon Sensbach, Rebecca's Revival: Creating Black Christianity in the Atlantic World; Mason Lowance, ed., A House Divided: The Antebellum Slavery Debates in America, 1776–1865; David Chappell, A Stone of Hope: Prophetic Religion and the Death of Jim Crow; and D.D. Collum, Black and Catholic in the Jim Crow South. During the second half of the course, students will be coached on bibliography, research strategies, writing, and rewriting, and they will take part in ongoing discussion of the individual projects that class members are researching.

HIST 43618. Research Seminar: American Environmental History

(3-0-3) Coleman

This seminar will give students the chance to research and write a substantial historical essay. The topic is environmental history, and students are free to mold the topic to the time periods and subjects they are interested in. From depictions of nature in popular culture to the role of global warming in international relations, environmental history can serve as a doorway into almost any historical field. We will also spend a good portion of the course learning to write clear and compelling prose.

HIST 43651. Women and Gender in the United States, 1929–84

(3-0-3)

This research seminar will cover changing gender relations in the United States between the Great Depression and the end of the Reagan era. Students will read and discuss recent books and articles covering a variety of topics which may include: gender relations during the Great Depression; whether WWII was a turning point for women's work; the feminine mystique; women in the civil rights movement; the women's liberation movement of the 1960s and 1970s; changes in masculinities and their relation (or lack of relation) to the women's movement; the gay rights movement; and changes in women's work force participation and family life. During the latter half of the semester, students will concentrate on producing a substantial paper, based on original primary source research, on a topic of their choice selected in consultation with the instructor.

HIST 43750. Seminar: United States in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is twofold. First, it should permit the student to gain a greater familiarity with several of the major topics in 20th-century American history—the Progressive Period of Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson; the Wall Street Crash of 1929 and the Great Depression; the New Deal legislation of Franklin Roosevelt; World Wars I and II; the cold war; the Fair Deal Program of Harry Truman; Dwight Eisenhower's Modern Republicanism; John Kennedy's

New Frontier; the Great Society of Lyndon Johnson; the civil rights movement and the feminist movement; Richard Nixon and Watergate; aspects of 20th-century American culture; and the presidency of Ronald Reagan. Second, and more importantly, the course will offer each student the opportunity to research and produce a major paper on a topic of his or her own choosing in 20th-century American history. Approximately one-fourth of the semester will be devoted to reading and discussion of several of the above topics, and the rest of the semester to research and writing the seminar paper. The papers will be summarized for class discussion in the last four meetings of the semester.

HIST 43751. Seminar: Religion and Politics in Twentieth-Century U.S.

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the relationship between religion and political violence in the 20th century, focusing on the United States in comparative perspective. The course will be divided into three parts; students may write their seminar paper on a topic in any one of these three thematic areas. Part one will examine the writings and cultural influence of major thinkers in the U.S. Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish communities who addressed the questions of war, peace, and America's role in the world (e.g., Reinhold Niebuhr, Thomas Merton, Abraham Joshua Heschel, and John Courtney Murray, S.J.). The second part will examine cases of religiously inspired violence in the United States (e.g., the Ku Klux Klan, the militias, and Oklahoma City), Egypt, Iran, Palestine/Israel, Lebanon, and India in the 20th century. The third part will examine the concept of "American exceptionalism" and whether, to what extent, and why it applies to the question of religious violence. Each student will be required to write brief reviews of weekly assignments during the first part of the semester and to prepare a seminar paper, to be presented at later meetings.

HIST 43753. Seminar: Urban Oral Histories

(3-0-3)

For years, historians rejected oral sources, claiming that they were unverifiable utterances from respondents who were often equally unreliable. In the recent past, however, oral history has become an accepted form of research and a staple of certain historical fields. In the seminar, participants will devise, construct, and implement an urban history research project that draws extensively on oral sources. We will examine the methodology, practices, and pitfalls of oral history in classroom discussion and secondary sources.

HIST 43754. Seminar: African American Civil Rights in the United States

(3-0-3)

The primary goals of the class are to introduce the participants to the major scholarly works and developments related to African American civil rights and to facilitate the development of a research strategy for the production of an article-length scholarly treatment of a selected aspect of civil rights history. Projects should reflect the evolving interpretive synthesis of the history of the civil rights movement and its relationship to the major social, political, economic, and cultural trends of the 20th century. Students may also examine the ways in which the history and achievements of the civil rights movement have been represented and interpreted.

HIST 43755. Major Seminar: U.S. Presidents and Presidencies, FDR to Clinton

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is essentially twofold. First, it should permit the student to gain a greater familiarity with American history from the New Deal through to the end of the century using the prism of the American presidency. Second, and more importantly, the course will offer each student the opportunity to research and produce a major paper on a topic of his or her own choosing in this broad area. Approximately one-third of the semester will be devoted to reading and discussion of the various presidential administrations, and the rest of the semester to research and writing of the seminar paper. The papers will be presented for class discussion in the last four meetings of the semester.

HIST 43756. Era of Franklin D. Roosevelt

(3-0-3) Blantz

The purpose of this course is threefold: first, through readings and discussions to give the student a good understanding of United States history during the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt, 1933–45, the critical years of the Great Depression and World War II; second, to enable the student to research and produce a scholarly research paper of approximately 25 or 30 pages on a topic of his or her choice during this period; and third, to improve writing skills by producing a paper unified and coherent in structure and persuasive in argumentation. Possible areas of discussion and research are President Roosevelt's New Deal efforts of raise the country from the Depression; various public works programs; the growth of labor and rise of the CIO; conservative opposition to the Roosevelt program; the status of Black Americans; the role of women; the coming of World War II; the Roosevelt-Churchill collaboration; the home front during World War II; the Atlantic Charter and the Yalta Conference; and the place of Roosevelt in the ranking of presidents.

HIST 43901. Seminar: Coffee/Sugar/Other Goods

(3-0-3)

Between their origin in the earth and their ultimate destination in our bodies, coffee, sugar, and other addictive commodities (such as tobacco, cacao, tea, opium, cocaine, and perhaps oil) have had profound effects on world history. In all cases, their production, processing, distribution, and consumption have been intertwined with the historical development of individuals, peoples, nations, and international relations. Growing consumption has profoundly altered the social, economic, and environmental history of producing countries, with especially profound impact on those individuals whose labor brings them from the earth. And in all cases, most of the world's supply of such commodities comes from relatively poor regions while consumption is centered in the relatively wealthy, industrialized nations. The course introduces students to the broad outlines of the history of comparative commodities through class readings and discussions. Students will then conduct research on an approved topic related to a specific commodity or theme that examines one aspect of the role of a commodity in world history. Course requirements include the submission of a bibliography, a thesis statement, a first draft, and a 25-page research paper.

HIST 43902. Latin American Research Seminar

(3-0-3)

After briefly examining different models of research and writing, students will undertake a major, semester-long primary source research project on a topic within Latin American history (which could include foreign relations with the United States or European nations, immigration to or from the region, etc.). I anticipate that most students will use research materials available at Notre Dame. Interested students are encouraged to see the instructor prior to the beginning of the semester in order to begin exploring possible topics and available research materials.

HIST 43975. Student Politics and Movements

(3-0-3) Pensado

This is a history seminar for undergraduate majors on student protests and activism during the 20th century. While assignments will attempt to cover most of the century, the seminar will concentrate the discussion on the "long sixties" (1956–77) in Europe, the United States, and Latin America. In particular, students will be asked to explore a "student movement" of their choice during this (or another) period in history and write a 25-page research paper based on primary sources.

HIST 47050. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Independent study, writing, and research under the direction of a faculty member.

HIST 53001. Honors Methodology

(3-0-3) Rodriguez

This course is open only to students in the Department of History honors program. It has two agendas: (1) to introduce students to theoretical and practical foundations of historical method; and (2) to help get you started on your honors research. During the first half of the semester, we will discuss and practice key aspects of historical method, providing a structure for you to start your own research. You will work on multiple drafts of a research proposal, develop a bibliography, and begin your research in primary sources. By the end of the semester, you should be close to completing your research and beginning to write the first draft of your honors essay. This course will try to assist you in planning and budgeting your time toward the goal of minimizing the stress and maximizing the intellectual rewards of participating in the honors program.

HIST 53002. Honors Colloquium

(3-0-3) Lyandres

This course, open only to students in the history honors program, introduces students to the ways in which history is conceptualized, written, and argued about. Students approach these issues by reading and discussing the historiography of the instructor's chosen field or fields. The emphasis of the class will be on understanding how historians have framed their questions for research, in conversation with one another and with their own interests, and how their work, collectively and individually, has shaped the development and the research agendas of the larger discipline of history.

HIST 53657. Catholics and Protestants in American History

(3-0-3) Noll

This seminar will concentrate on books featuring American Protestants who engaged with Catholics and books on Catholics who were responding to their situation in America, especially the Protestant influences in American life. The reading list will include older classics like Ray Allen Billington, The Protestant Crusade, 1800-1860 (1938) and Jenny Franchot, Roads to Rome: The Antebellum Protestant Encounter with Catholicism (1994) as well as more recent classics like John McGreevy, Catholicism and American Freedom (2003) and Michael Hochgeschwender, Wahrheit, Einheit, Ordnung: Die Sklavenfrage und der amerikanische Katholizismus, 1835–1870 (2006). Student writing will include brief responses week-by-week to assigned texts and a more extensive historiographical or research paper.

HIST 56050. Directed Readings

(0-0-V)

Independent study of special topics under the direction of a faculty member. Agreement by the faculty member and approval by the director of graduate studies required. (Annual)

HIST 58003. Honors Thesis

(3-0-3)

History Honors Program students only. In the fall and spring of the senior year, the history honors student will work on a thesis (40 to 80 pages) under the supervision of a specific faculty member.

Irish Languages and Literatures

IRLL 10101. Beginning Irish I

(4-0-4) MacLeod; Ó Meara

No prior knowledge of the Irish language required. This course provides an enjoyable introduction to modern Irish. Energetic teachers in small classes teach basic language skills and prepare students to conduct conversations and read authentic texts. Extensive use is made of role-play and interactive teaching methods. IRLL 10101 is a superb opportunity to learn a new language, explore Irish/Celtic culture, and investigate the linguistic politics of the only minority language offered at Notre Dame. In addition to satisfying the language requirement of the College of Arts and Letters and the College of Science, Irish satisfies the popular Irish Studies minor's requirements, and selected students will have an opportunity to study in Dublin, Ireland.

IRLL 10102. Beginning Irish II

(4-0-4) MacLeod; Ni Bheaglaoich

Prerequisite: (IRLL 10101 OR IRLL 101) OR (IRST 10101 OR IRST 101) OR (CLIR 10101 OR CLIR 101)

Second semester of instruction in the Irish language. More emphasis will be placed on reading simple texts in Irish.

IRLL 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3) Nic Dhiarmada

This course offers an introduction to modern and contemporary Irish language literature. We will begin by tracing the influence of the revival and cultural nationalism on the development of a modern literature in the Irish language. We will read key texts in the light of the national narrative, taking note of cultural change and contested identities in considering the specificities of a literature that can trace an unbroken line to what is often described as the oldest vernacular literature in Europe. Among the texts discussed will be work by Pearse, Ó Conaire, the Blasket autobiographies, Ó Cadhain, Ó Riordáin, Ní Dhomhnaill, and Mac Lochlainn, among others. All texts will be read in translation. Relevant documentaries will also be used and shown in class to further illustrate and elucidate the work of particular authors.

IRLL 20103. Intermediate Irish

(3-0-3) McKibben

Prerequisite: (IRLL 10102 OR IRLL 102) OR (IRST 10102 OR IRST 102) OR (CLIR 10102 OR CLIR 102)

Continuation of the study of the Irish language with increased emphasis on the ability to read 20th-century literary work in the original Irish.

IRLL 20105. Old Irish

(3-0-3)

The aim of this course is to enable students with no previous knowledge of Irish, medieval or modern, to take the first steps toward acquiring a reading knowledge of Old Irish. "Old Irish" is meant conventionally the language of the seventh and eighth centuries AD. The emphasis will be on reading texts in the original language by means of a detailed examination of the grammatical structure of the language. We will also, however, give some consideration to aspects of the literary and cultural contexts in which our texts were composed. The texts we will use have yet to be decided.

IRLL 20109. Celtic Heroic Literature

(3-0-3) Fogarty

An exciting introduction to Celtic literature and culture, this course introduces the thrilling sagas, breathtaking legends, and prose tales of Ireland and Wales. Readings include battles, heroic deeds, and feats of strength and daring and dilemma faced by the warrior heroes of the Celts. Celtic Heroic Literature, which requires no previous knowledge of Irish or Welsh, studies the ideology, belief system, and concerns of the ancient Celtic peoples as revealed in their saga literature. By examining the hero's function in society, students investigate the ideological concerns of a society undergoing profound social transformation and religious conversion to Christianity and the hero's role as a conduit for emotional and social distress. Among the heroes to be studied in depth are Cu Chulainn, Lug, St. Patrick, and the king-heroes. Wisdom literature and archaeological and historical evidence will also be considered in this course. No prior knowledge of Irish required. All texts provided in English.

IRLL 20120. The Irish Short Story

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

This course introduces students to the themes, motifs, approaches, and various forms common to the Irish short story as well as the critical debates associated with the genre. We begin with a survey of the literary history and cultural politics of Ireland in the 19th century and the emergence of the Irish short story and compare it to the American and French story, before considering the relationship between folklore and literature and the origins of the modern short story form. Having discussed various theories of the short story, we proceed to examine the interactive relationship between orality and print culture, tradition and modernity, native and foreign, and natural/authentic and artificial/other. Among the authors we read in detail are George Moore, P.H. Pearse, James Joyce, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Máirtín Ó Cadhain, Frank O'Connor, Sean O'Faolain, Liam Ó Flaithearta/Liam O'Flaherty, Seamus Ó Grianna, Seosamh Mac Grianna, Angela Bourke, Samuel Beckett, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Pádraic Breathnach, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Alan Titley, Dara Ó Conaola, and Eilís Ní Dhuibhne. Stories are read primarily as literary texts that shed light on evolving cultural, political, and social conditions and provide incisive insights into the Irish literary and cultural tradition. This course is an ideal introduction to literary criticism and cultural studies. No prior knowledge of Irish or Ireland is required. All texts will be available in English.

IRLL 20203. Advanced Readings in Irish Culture

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

Prerequisite: (IRLL 20103 OR IRLL 103) OR (IRST 20103 OR IRST 103) OR (IRLL 60103 OR IRLL 503)

An advanced course focusing on reading and translating a variety of texts in the Irish language. We concentrate on further development of reading, interpretive, and technical skills mastered in previous language courses (IRLL 10101, IRLL 10102, IRLL 20103). Texts from various authors and historical periods allow students to taste different writing styles: contemporary fiction, journalism, literary criticism, and historical and cultural texts. Emphasis will be on sentence structure, stylistics, and syntax. Students are required to have earned a high grade in IRLL 20103 in order to take this class. At the conclusion of this course, students will be able to conduct independent research with Irish texts.

IRLL 23511. Irish Heroic Literature in Modern Adaptation

(3-0-3)

Beginning with a study of the ethos of Irish/Celtic heroic literature in its historic and cultural context, this course examines the ideological, aesthetic, and personal uses to which that material has been put by Irish writers of the past two centuries (19th and 20th centuries) writing in English and Irish. Among the authors to be studied are Seamus Heaney, Flann O'Brien/Myles na Gopaleen, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, and Eugene Watters/Eoghan Ó Tuairisc. Particular attention will be paid to shifting concepts of "authenticity" and the degree to which various creative artists have retained, reinterpreted, or reinvented what they perceived to be the essence of their originals. This course will interest English majors, modernists, and medievalists.

IRLL 26311. Directed Readings

(3-0-3)

Undergraduate directed readings in Irish literature.

IRLL 30107. The Hidden Ireland

(3-0-3) McQuillan

The Hidden Ireland denotes both a book and a concept. The book was written by Daniel Corkery in 1924 and was an immediate success as it encapsulated a version of Irish history that had not hitherto been available to the general public; it is still considered to be a classic of its kind. The concept promoted the notion that history should emanate from "below" and should not be confined to the elites and governing classes. Both book and concept have had a profound impact on our understanding of Irish identity, Irish history, and Irish literature. This course will examine the book in depth and utilize it to open a window on the hidden Ireland of the 18th century. The cultural, historical, and literary issues that are raised by the book will be studied in the context of the poetry of the period. Poetry will be read in translation.

IRLL 30108. Twentieth-Century Literature in Irish (in Translation)

(3-0-3)

This course will introduce you to the vibrant contemporary literature in Irish (Gaelic) from the Gaelic Revival, which sought to rescue the language from extinction, right up to the present. This course will focus on developing your ability to read, analyze, and write about literature with care and precision. You will do a LOT of writing, both graded and ungraded, to become a stronger reader and writer. In the process, we will consider the particular excitement and difficulty of writing in (and about!) a minority language that also happens to be the first official language of Ireland, as well as debates about identity, belonging, symbolization, history, Anglicization, assimilation, and hybridity, the new prominence of women writers, and ongoing challenges to stereotypes about Irish as tradition-bound (rather than, say, tradition-enabled), puritanical or premodern.

IRLL 30109. Introduction to Irish Writers

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

Corequisite: IRLL 32109

This course introduces undergraduate students to Irish literature, explores its dominant themes and motifs, and surveys canonical texts and major authors from the 18th century to the present day. A broad range of texts and genres—poetry, novels, short stories, folklore and drama—are studied from a historical and cultural perspective and in relation to transnational literary trends and movements. Attention is also paid to modernization and tradition as well as post-colonialism, feminism, and censorship. No prior knowledge of Ireland or the Irish language is required. Irish-language texts will be available in translation.

IRLL 30110. The Hidden Ulster

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the literature, language, culture, and history of Ulster in Ireland and confronts the stereotypes of binary opposition that commonly mark the region. Through close textual readings of literary texts from the 17th century onward, we discuss and interrogate the literary, religious, cultural, and linguistic forces that shaped identity in Ulster from the colonial period onwards and explore the shared heritage of both communities—Irish/English, Catholic/Protestant, and Native/Planter. This course will suit English majors and those interested in the study of identity formation and competing cultural ideologies. No prior knowledge of Irish is required for this course. All texts will be in translation.

IRLL 30111. The Celtic Otherworld in Early Irish Sources

(3-0-3)

In early Irish tradition, the everyday world (of men, women, kings, warriors, and cattle) and the Otherworld stand in unstable and uneasy relation to one another. The Otherworld has several aspects: it can be positive and beneficial—indeed, it is viewed as the legitimating source of rule in this world—but also baleful and destructive. In this course, we will study a range of Otherworld encounters, seeking to understand the vast range of contacts between the human world and the other world (or worlds) of early Irish tradition.

IRLL 30112. Irish Folk Custom and Belief: Popular Religion and Rural Ireland

(3-0-3) Gillan

Irish Folk Custom and Belief is both the title of a popular work from 1967 by Seán Ó Súilleabháin (1903–96), archivist of the Irish Folklore Commission, and an approach to the study of rural Irish popular religion. That approach was long dominant among Irish folklorists. It tended to frame rural popular religion historically and to fudge the issue of its relationship to specific social groups. At the same time, it led to the recording of extraordinarily rich data, mostly from the Irish-speaking population of the West. Concentrating on the work of 19th-century antiquarians and 20th-century folklorists and anthropologists, the course will examine the study of rural popular religion in Ireland. It will contextualize it both in terms of historical, sociological, and anthropological knowledge of Irish rural society and specifically of Irish peasant society, and in terms of the scientific study of religion. Specific topics often identified under the headings of “folk custom and belief” will be discussed, in particular ritual, festival, magic, supernatural beings, sacred places, and the oral narratives that deal with them. Specific scholarly texts, including texts by leading contemporary scholars of Irish rural popular religion, will be discussed, as well as ethnographic texts recorded by the Irish Folklore Commission

(3-0-3)

This course studies the Irish short story as a literary genre that reflects the changing political and cultural forces at play in Ireland. We begin the course by surveying various critical theories that can be applied to the genre before reading and discussing a wide selection of short stories. The course considers Irish writing in the broader sense literature written in either Irish or English. Among the authors included are Patrick Pearse, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Séamus Mac Grianna, James Joyce, Liam O’Flaherty, Elizabeth Bowen, Frank O’Connor, Sean O’Faolain, Éilís Ní Dhuibhne, Angeal Bourke, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Eithne Strong, Pádraic Breathnach, Alan Titley, Mary Lavin, William Trevor, Gerry Adams, and Bernard MacLaverty.

IRLL 30123. Advanced Irish Conversation

(3-0-3) O’Conchubhair

This is an advanced Irish language course, designed for students who have successfully completed Intermediate Irish and who plan to attend a language immersion program this summer or to take courses through Irish during Junior Year abroad (UCD/Trinity). This course expands on the language’s grammatical structures, with emphasis on communication and acquisition of advanced language skills: reading and listening comprehension, and oral and written expression. A study of contemporary Irish-language culture and literature supports the language study. The conversational component of the course requires student-teacher and student-student interaction to exchange information, clarify meanings, express opinions, argue points of view, and engage in any other communicative function for which native speakers use language.

IRLL 30203. Advanced Readings in Irish Culture

(3-0-3)

Reading on culture, literature, sport, current affairs, and politics form the basis of this course. Each week we read and contextualize a prearranged text. Students are encouraged to suggest readings/texts that relate to their studies or research topics, and every reasonable effort is made to incorporate such material into the syllabus. Examples of texts studied in this class include interviews with contemporary Irish writers Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill & Alan Titley; essays by political figures (Sinn Féin/SDLP), journalism/opinion pieces from the Irish Times, Foinse, Feasta, and Beo; and literature criticism by Breandan O Buachalla, and Diarmuid O Giollain. This course suits students returning from a semester/year in Dublin, eager to keep in touch with current affairs and to stay in touch with the political and cultural landscape in Ireland. A solid command of the language is required for this course. All texts are in Irish. This course is required for the minor in Irish language and literature

IRLL 30210. Transculturation in Irish Literature

(3-0-3) McKibben

This course considers the vexed topic of cultural change in the context of colonialism by examining key texts originally written in Irish (or a mixture of Irish and English) from a range of time periods, including works of comedy, satire, lament, and protest. We will consider the critical literature on transculturation and examine primary texts and consider how they change over time and what they seem to suggest about how people negotiate competing sociocultural and economic imperatives. Knowledge of Irish is helpful, but not necessary; translations will be provided along with original texts. Requirements: enthusiastic participation, several short and one long term paper.

IRLL 30223. Introduction to Irish Folklore

(3-0-3)

This course will discuss the 19th-century concept of folklore and its application in Ireland. “Irish folklore” is usually understood in terms of three main and related domains: “folk narrative” (or oral literature), “folk belief” (or popular religion), and “material folk culture.” These will be examined with special emphasis placed on narrative. Representative oral narrative texts from the Gaelic tradition will be studied in translation.

IRLL 30301. Women in Irish Oral Tradition

(3-0-3)

Oral tradition offers individuals and communities ways of constructing and maintaining identity, often against considerable external pressure. This course will explore oral verbal art in Irish and English through transcribed texts, sound recordings, and film, paying particular attention to depiction of and performances by women and offering gendered readings of the material studied.

IRLL 30306. Saints and Kings in Celtic Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on a series of encounters (in early Irish and Hiberno-Latin) between saints and kings or other royal characters. Through these stories and characters, tensions between the domains of spiritual and secular, the local and the “national,” the native and the external, are raised, explored and (sometimes, though by no means always) resolved. Saints such as Patrick, Colmcille, Brigit, Ciarán, and Cainnech, together with kings such as Lóegaire Mac Néill, Diarmuid Mac Cerbaill, and Muirchertach Mac Erca will be studied.

IRLL 30307. The Irish Tradition I

(3-0-3)

Ireland possesses the oldest vernacular literary tradition in Europe, spanning over 1,500 years to the present day. This course will provide a survey of the origins and development of that literary tradition through more than a millennium from its beginnings until the 17th century, when political circumstances led to the collapse of the highly developed native system of learning, poetry and patronage. The development of the Irish literary tradition will be traced against this background of political and cultural upheavals from approximately 500 to 1650.

IRLL 30308. Irish in Their Own Words II: A Survey of Early-Modern Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

This course will investigate the literature of the early modern period (1500–1800) in Irish, both prose and poetry. This period is one of cumulative social, cultural, and political crisis for Irish-speaking Ireland. Students read closely a selection of texts representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them in their own language (all texts are read in English translation). Many of the English translations are accompanied by facing original text so that students gain some working knowledge of the Irish language, which will assist them in evaluating the translations they are reading and in appreciating the sensuous beauty of much of the poetry in particular. We will also consider aspects of the relationship between literature and history. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature and it will also be of interest to students of modern Irish history.

IRLL 30309. Great Irish Writers

The early modern period (16th to late-18th centuries) is a time of English conquest in Ireland. It is, therefore, a period of cumulative crisis for the Irish and is important in the formation of their identity. We will read closely a selection of texts, both prose and poetry, representative of various facets of this crisis, and of Irish responses to them. All texts, originally written in Irish, will be read in English translation. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature (we will, in fact, read some English writing on Ireland in this period), and it will also be of interest to students of Irish history. We will supplement the material with readings from the work of historians on early-modern European nationalism in order to place it in its wider context. In addition, we will examine some recent work on the interface between language, literature, and anthropology in order to deepen our cultural understanding of the texts we are studying.

IRLL 30320. Contemporary Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to contemporary literature written in Irish. No prior knowledge of Irish is required, and all texts are in translation. We read a selection of texts from a variety of genres, including novels, short stories, poetry, short films, plays, and autobiographies. In the course, we examine the politics of writing in a less frequently spoken language and discuss the issue of translation. We interrogate text from a variety of perspectives: literary, cultural, political, and ideological and consider the relevance of biographical detail as well.

IRLL 32109. Introduction to Irish Writers Discussion

(0-1-0)

Prerequisite: (IRLL 30109 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR IRST 30372 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR ENGL 20513 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY))

This course is the discussion section associated with IRLL 30109 Introduction to Irish Writers and its cross-lists.

IRLL 40103. Irish Heroic Literature in Modern Adaptation

(3-0-3)

Beginning with a study of the ethos of Irish/Celtic heroic literature in its historic and cultural context, this course examines the ideological, aesthetic, and personal uses to which that material has been put by Irish writers of the past two centuries (19th and 20th centuries) writing in English and Irish. Among the authors to be studied are Seamus Heaney, Flann O'Brien/Myles na Gopaleen, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, and Eugene Watters/Eoghan ÓTuairisc. Particular attention will be paid to shifting concepts of "authenticity" and the degree to which various creative artists have retained, reinterpreted, or reinvented what they perceived to be the essence of their originals. This course will interest English majors, modernists, and medievalists.

IRLL 40109. The West of Ireland: An Imagined Space

(3-0-3) Nic Dhiarmada

This course will interrogate and examine representations of the West of Ireland in various 20th-century texts focusing, in particular, on the role of "the West of Ireland" in state formation and legitimization during the early decades of independent Ireland and its role in the construction of an Irish identity. We will look at how images of the West of Ireland were constructed in various utopian or romanticized formulations as well as examining more dystopian versions. This course will take an interdisciplinary approach, drawing on the visual arts and film, as well as on literary texts in both Irish and English. (Irish language texts will be read in translation).

IRLL 40110. A Gendered Voice—The Poetry of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3) Nic Dhiarmada

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, the foremost contemporary poet writing in Irish. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ní Dhomhnaill's poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

IRLL 40304. Poetry and Politics in Early Modern Ireland, 1541–1688

(3-0-3)

The political poetry of the period 1541–1688 will be discussed and analyzed against the historical background. The primary focus will be the mentalité of the native intelligentsia as it is reflected in the poetry and as it responded to the momentous changes of the period. The origins and rise of the cult of the Stuarts will be examined and the historiography of the period will be assessed.

IRLL 40305. The Poetry of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ní Dhomhnaill's poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

IRLL 40306. The Irish in Their Own Words: Identities in Early Modern Ireland

(3-0-3)

The topic to be covered in this course is the formation of individual and collective identity through language, literature, and history in this period. In addition to the works of the great early-modern poets (16th–18th centuries) such as Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn, Dáibhí Ó Bruadair, and Aogán Ó Rathaille, we will focus on such important prose works as Foras Feasa ar Éirinn, the foundation history of the "new" Irish nation of the 17th century. Important secondary works here will include those of Anthony D. Smith and Adrian Hastings on pre-modern forms of nationalism, as well as Stephen Greenblatt on identity formation in 16th-century England and Paul Friedrich on linguistic relativism and the poetic in language.

IRLL 40307. Gender, Politics, and the Poetic Tradition in Irish

(3-0-3)

This course begins with the fundamental feminist assumption that gender matters, and that gender is one of the central terms through which people both understand and critique their world. Our particular area of inquiry will be the role of gender in the Irish poetic tradition from the 16th-century onward, something that has only recently begun to receive attention from critics such as Angela Bourke, Mairín Nic Eoin, and Briona Nic Dhiarmada. The class will focus on how gendered representations of masculinity and femininity underwrite political appeals, particularly regarding Ireland's colonial relationship to England. We'll also look at how gender is used to represent and to resist related social changes, such as shifting class relations, unstable power relations between men and women, and contested notions of sexuality. We will read a variety of poetic texts, some serious and formal, some funny and popular; genres will include formal bardic poetry, the aising (or vision poem), oral lament, song poetry, and comic verse. The methodology will be historically informed close reading, meaning that we will read texts closely, rather than generalize abstractly, so that we have a sound basis for our analysis. No knowledge of Irish language is required or necessary, though original texts will be provided alongside translations. This class is discussion-based and will ask for your engaged participation at all times. Students will be responsible for presentations and will write several shorter papers and a longer term paper.

IRLL 40308. Modern Irish Poetry

(3-0-3)

An introduction to modern Irish literature and the Irish poetic tradition, this course is a magnificent opportunity to study modern Irish poetry with the foremost Irish-language critic. Visiting Notre Dame for this academic year, Prof. Briona Nic Dhiarmada, as the Fulbright Professor-in-Residence, will teach a course on modern and contemporary Irish poetry in the Department of Irish Language and Literature. This course focuses on key canonical texts by Irish-language poets and students will conduct close textual readings, examine the social and political context, consider various theoretical applications, and deconstruct the mechanics of individual poems. Among the texts to be studied are Cathal Ó Searcaigh, Gearóid Mac Lochlainn, Biddy Jenkinson, Michael Hartnett, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Michael Davitt, Gabriel Rosenstock, Liam Ó Muirlithe, Pearse Hutchinson, Seán Ó Riordáin, Máirtín Ó Direáin, and Áine Ní Ghlinn. Particular attention will be paid to the poetry of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill and the politics of translation.

IRLL 40309. Gender and Identity in Contemporary Irish Language Texts

(3-0-3)

This course will interrogate issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish language writers. We will examine the ways in which contemporary writers in Irish writing from a constellation of identities, sexual, cultural, and linguistic, exploring these issues as they articulate them in specific cultural forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies and postcolonial studies the course will look at texts that question and analyze essentialist notions of cultural identity. It will explore, in particular, some of the tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary writing in Irish. We will read, among others, texts from writers such as Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Biddy Jenkinson, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Pearse Hutchinson, Cathal Ó Searcaigh, Seán Mac Mathúna, and Micheál Ó Conghaile.

IRLL 40310. Ideology, Poetry, and Politics in Jacobite Ireland

(3-0-3)

Jacobitism, or allegiance to the course of the House of Stuart (from Latin Jacobus James, the deposed James II), was the common voice of political dissent in 18th-century Ireland, Scotland, and England. Irish Catholic advocacy of the Stuart cause had already become a political orthodoxy in the course of the 17th century, and when the Stuarts were deposed by William of Orange (King Billy) later succeeded by the Hanoverians (1714), the culture of dispossession and displacement and the rhetoric of return and restoration became firmly entrenched in the political ideology of Catholic Ireland. This course will examine the development of Irish Jacobitism in its various literary, historical, and ideological aspects in addition to placing it within its wider British and European context in the 18th century.

IRLL 40312. Identity and Gender in Modern Irish Women's Poetry

(3-0-3)

This course interrogates issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish women poets. We examine the ways in which contemporary poets write from a constellation of identities—sexual, cultural, and linguistic—and will focus in particular on the ways how question as they articulate versions of identity in specific cultural and literary forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies, feminist theory, and postcolonial studies, among others, this course examines texts that question and problematize essentialist notions of cultural and gender identity. We will also explore tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary Irish-language writing. We read, among others, poets such as Eavan Boland, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Maedhbh McGuckian, Paula Meehan, and Eiléan Ní Chuilleanáin.

IRLL 40313. The Celtic Otherworld in Early Irish Sources

(3-0-3)

In early Irish tradition, the everyday world (of men, women, kings, warriors, and cattle) and the Otherworld stand in unstable and uneasy relation to one another. The Otherworld has several aspects: it can be positive and beneficial—indeed it is viewed as the legitimating source of rule in this world—but also baleful and destructive. In this course, we will study a range of Otherworld encounters, seeking to understand the vast range of contacts between the human world and the other world (or worlds) of early Irish tradition.

IRLL 40316. Folklore, Literature, and Irish National Culture

(3-0-3)

The ideological character of the 19th-century concept of folklore allowed it to transcend the social category of peasants from whom it was largely recorded. This course will look at the role of folklore in the building of an Irish national culture from the time of the Gaelic Revival. Programmatic texts in Irish and in English by Douglas Hyde, first president of the Gaelic League, and by Séamus Delargy, director of the Irish Folklore Commission, will be discussed. It will also look at a later polemical text of the Gaelic writer Máirtín Ó Cadhain directed at what he perceived as the essentialism of Irish folklorists.

IRLL 50110. A Gendered Voice—The Poetry of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, the foremost contemporary poet writing in Irish. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ní Dhomhnaill's poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

IRLL 50318. The Feminine in Irish Literary and Oral-Vernacular Tradition

(3-0-3) O'Crualaoich

This course addresses issues concerning the representation of the feminine in Irish literary and oral-vernacular tradition. It treats of the historical displacement and re-interpretation of the figure of the autonomous “otherworld” female in literature and oral narrative. In particular, it examines a series of texts from pre-modern oral narrative tradition featuring the figures of cailleach/hag and bean feasa/wise woman with a view to understanding their significance for the “native” ear. The potential significance of such texts as therapeutic resources for the modern reader is also considered.

IRLL 57001. Special Studies

(3-0-3)

Special studies course with instructor.

Irish Studies Program

IRST 10101. Beginning Irish I

(4-0-4) MacLeod; Ó Meara

An introduction to modern spoken and written Irish: basic principles of grammar and sentence structure, as well as core vocabulary. Emphasis is placed on the application of these principles in everyday situations.

IRST 10102. Beginning Irish II

(4-0-4) MacLeod; Ni Bheaglaioich

Prerequisite: (CLIR 10101 OR CLIR 101) OR (IRST 10101 OR IRST 101) OR (IRLL 10101 OR IRLL 101)

The second of three courses in Irish; see preceding for description of program.

IRST 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3)

Medieval Ireland witnesses a political and military struggle between England and Ireland, Protestantism and Catholicism, colonists and natives. This course introduces students to the literature of medieval Ireland. Students read literary texts and explore how and why these texts shed light on the bloody and turbulent political and military life of medieval Ireland. No prior knowledge of Irish required.

IRST 20020. Ireland in Transition: Emigration to Immigration and Beyond

(3-0-3)

Throughout the 20th century, Ireland was characterized by a relatively high rate of emigration. Over the century, however, the nature, type, and destination of Irish emigrants changed. Whereas, Irish emigrants were once drawn almost exclusively from the agricultural and laborer classes, in the closing decades of the 20th century emigration came to permeate the entire social system. Thus, Irish migrants were to be found not just among the ranks of skilled and semi-skilled labor, but also among the trans-national professional elite that criss-crosses the globe. Current migration trends suggest a radical departure from the pattern that has characterized Irish demography for more than two centuries. Nowadays, more people are entering Ireland than leaving, bringing the country's migratory profile more into line with its European partners. Apart from a high rate of return migration, there has been an enormous increase in the numbers of immigrants coming to Ireland, particularly, after several Eastern European countries entered the EU in 2004. Just over 10 percent of the population is now foreign-born, and up to 200 different languages are spoken on the island. The study of migration and its meaning in the context of the unprecedented buoyancy of the Irish economy directs us to new concerns about multiculturalism, immigration policy and practices, Ireland's position in the global economy, and the relationship between the Irish diaspora and the homeland. This course will focus on four key themes in particular: (1) The socio-historical context of Irish emigration; (2) case studies of the lived experience of Irish emigrants in the late-20th century; (3) the phenomenon of return migration; and (4) immigration into Ireland and the multicultural challenge.

IRST 20103. Intermediate Irish

(3-0-3) McKibben

Prerequisite: (CLIR 10102 OR CLIR 102) OR (IRST 10102 OR IRST 102) OR (IRLL 10102)

Continuation of the study of the Irish language with increased emphasis on the ability to read 20th-century literary work in the original Irish.

IRST 20105. Old Irish

(3-0-3)

The aim of this course is to enable students with no previous knowledge of Irish, medieval or modern, to take the first steps towards acquiring a reading knowledge of Old Irish. By "Old Irish" is meant conventionally the language of the seventh and eighth centuries AD. The emphasis will be on reading texts in the original language by means of a detailed examination of the grammatical structure of the language. We will also, however, give some consideration to aspects of the literary and cultural contexts in which our texts were composed. The texts we will use have yet to be decided.

IRST 20109. Celtic Heroic Literature

(3-0-3) Fogarty

An exciting introduction to Celtic literature and culture, this course introduces the thrilling sagas, breathtaking legends, and prose tales of Ireland and Wales. Readings include battles, heroic deeds, and feats of strength and daring and dilemma faced by the warrior heroes of the Celts. Celtic Heroic Literature, which requires no previous knowledge of Irish or Welsh, studies the ideology, belief system, and concerns of the ancient Celtic peoples as revealed in their saga literature. By examining the hero's function in society, students investigate the ideological concerns of a society undergoing profound social transformation and religious conversion to Christianity and the hero's role as a conduit for emotional and social distress. Among the heroes to be studied in depth are Cu Chulainn, Lug, St. Patrick, and the king-heroes. Wisdom literature and archaeological and historical evidence will also be considered in this course. No prior knowledge of Irish required. All texts provided in English.

IRST 20120. The Irish Short Story

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

This course introduces students to the themes, motifs, approaches, and various forms common to the Irish short story as well as the critical debates associated with the genre. We begin with a survey of the literary history and cultural politics of Ireland in the 19th century and the emergence of the Irish short story and compare it to the American and French story, before considering the relationship between folklore and literature and the origins of the modern short story form. Having discussed various theories of the short story, we proceed to examine the interactive relationship between orality and print culture, tradition and modernity, native and foreign, and natural/authentic and artificial/other. Among the authors we read in detail are George Moore, P.H. Pearse, James Joyce, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Máirtín Ó Cadhain, Frank O'Connor, Sean O'Faolain, Liam Ó Flaithearta/Liam O'Flaherty, Seamus Ó Grianna, Seosamh Mac Grianna, Angela Bourke, Samuel Beckett, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Pádraic Breathnach, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Alan Titley, Dara Ó Conaola, and Eilís Ní Dhuibhne. Stories are read primarily as literary texts that shed light on evolving cultural, political, and social conditions and provide incisive insights into the Irish literary and cultural tradition. This course is an ideal introduction to literary criticism and cultural studies. No prior knowledge of Irish or Ireland is required. All texts will be available in English.

IRST 20201. Stage Irish: The Irish in Plays

(3-0-3)

A study of representations of the Irish drama in the 19th and 20th centuries.

IRST 20203. Advanced Readings in Irish Culture

(3-0-3) O'Conchubhair

Prerequisite: (IRLL 20103 OR IRL 103) OR (IRST 20103 OR IRST 103) OR (IRLL 60103 OR IRL 503)

An advanced course focusing on reading and translating a variety of texts in the Irish language. We concentrate on further development of reading, interpretive, and technical skills mastered in previous language courses (IRLL 10101, IRL 10102, IRL 20103). Texts from various authors and historical periods allow students to taste different writing styles: contemporary fiction, journalism, literary criticism, and historical and cultural texts. Emphasis will be on sentence structure, stylistics, and syntax. Students are required to have earned a high grade in IRL 20103 in order to take this class. At the conclusion of this course, students will be able to conduct independent research with Irish texts.

IRST 20229. Twentieth-Century Irish and Native-American Literature: When We Were Noble Savages

(3-0-3)

From the outset of colonization in both Ireland and North America, literature was employed in similar fashion to romanticize, demonize and, more often than not, silence Irish and Native American cultures. Today, with the surge in post-colonial literatures, Irish and Native American literatures have found new voices that look to the past in order to explore the present. Instead of romanticizing cultural memories, these authors subvert and challenge heroic representations while dispelling stereotypes. Together these separate literary traditions intersect and diverge, challenging accepted perspectives of history and culture while blending stories with oral tradition, popular history, and pop culture. With these intersections in mind, we will explore an array of literature from both Irish and Native American traditions, from novels to poetry to film. We will look at a variety of authors, including Flann O'Brien, Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill, Eilis Ni Dhuibhne, Leslie Marmon Silko, Sherman Alexie, and Simon Ortiz. Requirements include a midterm exam, one short paper (3–5 pages), one longer paper (8–10 pages), and a presentation.

IRST 20230. City Streets, City Beats: Belfast, Dublin, London, and Paris from Baudelaire to Bono

(3-0-3)

As one of the most dominant themes of modernity, the city figures as a poster child of trendsetters, go-getters, floozies, and philanderers. It is the embodiment of shabby chic. Wherever there is couture there are cutthroats, and if there is a ballroom there is bound to be a bordello. Baudelaire's Paris sets the tone for the modern city's fast-paced but staggering tempo, and 150 years later, it can still be heard in Bono's gravelly tones and nostalgic lyrics. This course focuses on four cities intimately connected through literature, art, music, and film. It will study both their tense political and social relationships with one another and their idiosyncratic cultures and geographies (including their landmarks, streets, transportation and water systems, etc.), and will think about the resonance of these cities histories on global, contemporary culture. Readings include selections from Baudelaire and Apollinaire; works by Padraic O Conaire, Joseph Conrad, James Joyce, Liam O'Flaherty, Samuel Beckett, Virginia Woolf, Elizabeth Bowen, John Banville, and Michael McLaverty; and selected poems from Seamus Heaney, John Montague, Derek Mahon, and Ciaran Carson. Photos, paintings, and song lyrics will supplement the readings, and there will also be a few movie showings. Course requirements include class participation, weekly quizzes, one 10- to 12-page paper, and a midterm.

IRST 20401. The Irish Military Tradition

(2-0-3)

Corequisite: IRST 22401

A study of the history and culture of "Fighting Irish" military tradition from medieval through modern times.

IRST 20403. The Irish American Experience

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 22610

For sophomores only. This course will examine the history of the Irish in the United States.

IRST 20512. Culture and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course explores the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century. Using a multiplicity of genres—drama, fiction, poetry, film, painting, and documentary material—we will unravel the history behind partition, the causes of the Troubles, and the nature of the conflict. Among the key moments or events upon which we will concentrate are the Somme, the sinking of the Titanic, Bloody Sunday, the hunger strikes, Drumcree, the Anglo-Irish Agreement, and the Shankill Butchers. Certain key themes will stretch through our semester's work. Among these are sectarianism; the relationship between violence and culture; the role of religion in the state; borders; hatred; identity; and issues of social and political justice. Some of the writers whose work we will read are Seamus Heaney, Frank McGuinness, Sam Thompson, John Montague, Seamus Deane, Eoin MacNamee, Bernard MacLaverty, Bernadette Devlin, and Thomas Kinsella. This class is discussion-based, and will involve student presentations and engaged participation.

IRST 20515. Celtic Mythology

(3-0-3)

A review of the legends and myths of the Celtic world, along with some of their contemporary adaptations.

IRST 20518. Anglo-Irish Literature: The Cultured Misrule of Dissolute Lords and Rebel Countesses

(3-0-3)

An examination of Irish identity through an introduction to the literature, both historical and contemporary, of Anglo Ireland.

IRST 20520. Modern British and Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The 20th century arrived to a world altered by industry and the metropolis, by scientific theory and psychoanalysis, by mechanical transportation and communication devices. Such a climate challenged traditional values, social mores, class distinctions, gender roles, and conceptions of nation, propriety, and home. The literature from the first half of the century suggests that the increasingly alienating world forces interpersonal connection to take place under new circumstances, often outside of the traditional settings regulated by marital, social, and religious convention. Through close reading, students in this course will examine how the literature presents colonialism, The Great War, the deterioration of aristocratic class values and privilege in both Britain and Ireland, the destruction of the metropolis and the home during the London air raids of World War II, and the shift in personal values vis-à-vis alcohol consumption and marital infidelity. The course will look at these modernist works in light not only of the alienating circumstances they represent, but also of the effect that alienation has on the interpersonal connections between individuals.

IRST 20522. Mapping Ireland

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will read modern Irish history, film, poetry, drama, short fiction, and the novel to explore the various ways Irish artists and writers have sought to give shape to national identity and the political geography of Irish life. Our primary intention will be to read and appreciate the individual works, but over the course of the semester, we shall seek to compare the different visions of nation and culture those works present. Because of Ireland's exceptional history, we may in fact discover that the central element of so much of its best art is precisely to imagine what it means to be Irish. In consequence, Irish works provide us a window through which to examine the relation between art and politics, imagination, and the nation. Readings will range from John Ford's The Quiet Man, to poems by Seamus Heaney, W.B. Yeats, and Eavan Boland, to fiction by Edna O'Brien, John McGahern, and James Joyce. Assignments include four short essays, several in-class presentations, and a final exam.

IRST 20528. Folklore in Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

A close reading of traditional Irish myths, tales, songs, customs, rituals, and beliefs.

IRST 20530. Contemporary Irish and Native American Literature

(3-0-3)

From the outset of colonization in both Ireland and North America literature was employed in similar fashion to romanticize, demonize, and, more often than not, silence Irish and Native American cultures. Today, with the surge in post-colonial literatures, Irish and Native American literatures have found new voices that look to the past in order to explore the present. Instead of romanticizing cultural memories, these authors subvert and challenge heroic representations while dispelling stereotypes. Together these separate literary traditions intersect and diverge, challenging accepted perspectives of history and culture while blending stories with oral tradition, popular history, and pop culture. With these intersections in mind, we will explore an array of literature from both Irish and Native American traditions, from novels to poetry to film. We will look at a variety of authors including Flann O'Brien, Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill, Eilis Ni Dhuibhne, Leslie Marmon Silko, Sherman Alexie, and Simon Ortiz. Requirements include a midterm exam, one short paper (3–5 pages), one longer paper (8–10 pages), and a presentation.

IRST 20538. Irish Prison Literature

(3-0-3) O'Brien

Along with the church, the university and the army, the prison is one of the central institutions in Ireland, and literature has traditionally been the way prisoners protest, resist, and critique their harrowing experiences. In this course, we will examine work written by men and women during and after their incarceration, including major literary figures (Brendan Behan and Oscar Wilde), key figures in Irish history (Jeremiah O'Donovan Rossa and Tom Clarke), and revolutionary women (Maude Gonne and Kathleen Clarke). Course requirements include response papers, presentations, and a research paper.

IRST 20539. British and Irish Gothic

(3-0-3) Edwards

Although the Gothic is most often associated with the Romantic period, the Victorian period was marked by a revival in interest in Gothic themes and literary strategies. This course explores how Victorian writers refashioned the Gothic to reflect the anxieties of their own period, creating in particular distinct domestic and urban versions of the Gothic. Texts will include Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights, Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu's Carmilla, Mary Elizabeth Braddon's Lady Audley's Secret, Bram Stoker's Dracula, Robert Louis Stevenson's Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, and Oscar Wilde's The Portrait of Dorian Gray, among others. Students will become familiar with Gothic influences in the art and architecture of the period.

IRST 21601. Irish and American Tap Dance

(1-0-1)

This course will teach a range of fundamental steps.

IRST 22401. The Irish Military Tradition—Tutorial

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: IRST 20401

Corequisite tutorial for The Irish Military Tradition.

IRST 30105. Irish Folk Custom and Belief: Popular Religion and Rural Ireland

(3-0-3) Gillan

Irish Folk Custom and Belief is both the title of a popular work from 1967 by Seán Ó Súilleabháin (1903–96), archivist of the Irish Folklore Commission, and an approach to the study of rural Irish popular religion. That approach was long dominant among Irish folklorists. It tended to frame rural popular religion historically and to fudge the issue of its relationship to specific social groups. At the same time, it led to the recording of extraordinarily rich data, mostly from the Irish-speaking population of the West. Concentrating on the work of 19th-century antiquarians and 20th-century folklorists and anthropologists, the course will examine the study of rural popular religion in Ireland. It will contextualize it both in terms of historical, sociological, and anthropological knowledge of Irish rural society, and specifically of Irish peasant society, and in terms of the scientific study of religion. Specific topics often identified under the headings of “folk custom and belief” will be discussed—in particular ritual, festival, magic, supernatural beings, sacred places, and the oral narratives that deal with them. Specific scholarly texts, including texts by leading contemporary scholars of Irish rural popular religion, will be discussed, as well as ethnographic texts recorded by the Irish Folklore Commission.

IRST 30106. Irish Poetry in Translation: 1880–2000

(3-0-3)

This course will examine poetry written in Irish from the early days of the Gaelic Revival up to the very recent past. No previous knowledge of Irish is required.

IRST 30107. The Hidden Ireland: Themes and Issues in Eighteenth-Century Irish Poetry

(3-0-3) McQuillan

The Hidden Ireland denotes both a book and a concept. The book was written by Daniel Corkery in 1924 and was an immediate success as it encapsulated a version of Irish history that had not hitherto been available to the general public; it is still considered to be a classic of its kind. The concept promoted the notion that history should emanate from “below” and should not be confined to the elites and governing classes. Both book and concept have had a profound impact on our understanding of Irish identity, Irish history and Irish literature. This course will examine the book in depth and utilize it to open a window on the hidden Ireland of the 18th century. The cultural, historical, and literary issues raised by the book will be studied in the context of the poetry of the period. Poetry will be read in translation.

IRST 30108. Twentieth-Century Literature in Irish (in Translation)

(3-0-3)

This course will introduce you to the vibrant contemporary literature in Irish (Gaelic) from the Gaelic Revival, which sought to rescue the language from extinction, right up to the present. This course will focus on developing your ability to read, analyze and write about literature with care and precision. You will do a LOT of writing, both graded and ungraded, to become a stronger reader and writer. In the process, we'll consider the particular excitement and difficulty of writing in (and about!) a minority language that also happens to be the first official language of Ireland, as well as debates about identity, belonging, symbolization, history, Anglicization, assimilation and hybridity, the new prominence of women writers, and ongoing challenges to stereotypes about Irish as tradition-bound (rather than, say, tradition-enabled), puritanical or premodern.

IRST 30109. Migration and Identity in the New Ireland

(3-0-3) O'Brien

In less than two decades, the Republic of Ireland has shifted from a relatively poor country with a high level of national, racial, and ethnic homogeneity to a country with the world's fourth highest per capita income experiencing an exponential expansion of cultural diversity. One of the names used to describe this shift is “New Ireland,” and this course will discuss the cultural dimensions of this term. We will examine selections from contemporary Irish literature and film that contribute to this analysis and contextualize our discussions with legal, political, and economic approaches to Irish social issues. Class work will include several short papers, a long research paper, and an exam.

IRST 30110. The Hidden Ulster

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the literature, language, culture, and history of Ulster in Ireland and confronts the stereotypes of binary opposition that commonly mark the region. Through close textual readings of literary texts from the 17th century onwards, we discuss and interrogate the literary, religious, cultural, and linguistic forces that shaped identity in Ulster from the colonial period onward and explore the shared heritage of both communities—Irish/English, Catholic/Protestant, and Native/Planter. This course will suit English majors and those interested in the study of identity formation and competing cultural ideologies. No prior knowledge of Irish is required for this course. All texts will be in translation.

IRST 30111. Archaeology of Ireland

(3-0-3) Kuijt

Prerequisite: ANTH 30102

This course examines the cultural and historical trajectory of the archaeology of Ireland through a series of richly illustrated lectures, organized chronologically, that trace cultural, social, and technological developments from the Neolithic through the Viking period. Integrated with this lecture series, and running concurrently on alternate days, will be a series of seminar and discussion classes focused upon a number of anthropological and archaeological issues related to each of these periods of time. This includes the emergence of the unique systems of communities, and the development of systems of metallurgy in the Iron Age. Other classes will touch upon the topics of regionalism and identity and contact at different periods of time, mortuary practices and ritual, and discussion of village life in ring forts during the Bronze Age.

IRST 30120. The Celtic Otherworld in Early Irish Sources:

(3-0-3)

In early Irish tradition, the everyday world (of men, women, kings, warriors, and cattle) and the Otherworld stand in unstable and uneasy relation to one another. The Otherworld has several aspects: it can be positive and beneficial—indeed, it is viewed as the legitimating source of rule in this world—but also baleful and destructive. In this course, we will study a range of Otherworld encounters, seeking to understand the vast range of contacts between the human world and the other world (or worlds) of early Irish tradition.

IRST 30125. The Irish Short Story

(3-0-3)

This course studies the Irish short story as a literary genre that reflects the changing political and cultural forces at play in Ireland. We begin the course by surveying various critical theories that can be applied to the genre before reading and discussing a wide selection of short stories. The course considers Irish writing in the broader sense literature written in either Irish or English. Among the authors included are Patrick Pearse, Pádraic Ó Conaire, Séamus Mac Grianna, James Joyce, Liam O'Flaherty, Elizabeth Bowen, Frank O'Connor, Sean O'Faolain, Éilís Ní Dhuibhne, Angeal Bourke, Seán Mac Mathúna, Micheál Ó Conghaile, Eithne Strong, Pádraic Breathnach, Alan Titley, Mary Lavin, William Trevor, Gerry Adams, and Bernard MacLaverty.

IRST 30202. Crime and Progress in the Nineteenth-Century British Novel

(3-0-3)

Violence and social change, sexuality, economics, and politics in novels written in Ireland and Britain during the last half of the 19th century.

IRST 30203. Victorian Empire Writing 1868–1901

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the empire as theme in selected Irish writers of the late-19th century.

IRST 30204. Northern Irish Writing and Politics

(3-0-3)

A study of Irish writers in the North since the Troubles began in the 1960s.

IRST 30205. Modern British and Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

Dramatic representations of the Irish “character” and the Irish nation from the end of the 19th century through the 20th. Includes Yeats, Lady Gregory, O'Casey, Shaw, and Synge.

IRST 30206. Writing in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course explores the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

IRST 30207. Anglo-Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

An examination of Irish Identity through an introduction to the literature, both historical and contemporary, of Anglo-Ireland.

IRST 30208. Writing and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course explores the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

IRST 30209. Irish Fiction, 1945–2001

(3-0-3)

A study of major Irish writers since World War II.

IRST 30210. Transculturation in Irish Literature

(3-0-3) McKibben

This course considers the vexed topic of cultural change in the context of colonialism by examining key texts originally written in Irish (or a mixture of Irish and English) from a range of time periods, including works of comedy, satire, lament, and protest. We will consider the critical literature on transculturation and examine primary texts and consider how they change over time and what they seem to suggest about how people negotiate competing sociocultural and economic imperatives. Knowledge of Irish is helpful but not necessary; translations will be provided along with original texts. Requirements: enthusiastic participation, several short and one long term paper.

IRST 30211. Irish Gothic/Union to Troubles

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the ways in which Irish literature, both historical and contemporary, uses ghosts, vampires, demons, and rebels to grapple with threats facing Irish society.

IRST 30213. Imprisonment in Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The theme of imprisonment in 19th-century Irish writing.

IRST 30214. Twentieth-Century Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The cultural and political factors that have shaped Ireland's extraordinary literary achievement, paying particular attention to Irish Decolonization and the Northern Troubles. Readings from Shaw, Yeats, Joyce, Bowen, Friel, Heaney, and Deane.

IRST 30215. Exile in the Irish Literary Tradition

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to meet the University's literature requirement and will explore the centrality of emigration and immigration in the literary production of Irish fiction and drama by both writers in Ireland and abroad. The course will range from the nationalist movements of the early-20th century and their demand for a stop to emigration from Ireland to the early-21st century, which has seen a tremendous influx of immigrants, refugees, and asylum seekers into Ireland. Special attention will be paid to the homeless Irish woman and the immigrant Irish woman, domestic violence, the concept of emigration as librationary or as exile, the problems of the returnee, and fantasies of gender and ethnic essentialism and of a threatened “authentic” home and nation. The course will be reading-intensive, and will emphasize close reading skills, cultural analysis, and historical contexts for each text. Students will write weekly short papers (3 pages) that perform literary analysis and incorporate historical readings and/or literary theory from library reserves. Course texts will include W.B. Yeats's and Lady Gregory's Cathleen ni Houlihan, Joyce's Dubliners, Brian Friel's Philadelphia, Here I Come, Maeve Brennan's The Rose Garden, Betty Smith's A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, Eugene O'Neill, Long Day's Journey Into Night, Edna O'Brien, Down by the River, Marina Carr's By the Bog of Cats and Roddy Doyle's The Woman Who Walked into Doors.

IRST 30216. Victorian Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The 19th century was a dynamic period for Ireland, and writers from a many different backgrounds offer a range of perspectives on these changes. The central works of the class reflect diverse ideas on Irish and British history and literature and will provide a frame for debate and discussion of violence and social change, sexuality, economics, and politics during the Victorian period. Readings will include works from a variety of genres including Somerville & Ross, Oscar Wilde, Robert Louis Stevenson, W.B. Yeats, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Matthew Arnold, and James Clarence Mangan. Coursework will include several brief essays and a research paper.

IRST 30219. Reading the “Unwritten story”: Mother-Daughter Relationships in Twentieth-Century Irish Fiction

(3-0-3)

While the role of father-son relationships (and their attendant conflict) in contemporary Irish literature has been well established, the Irish mother-daughter relationship is, as Anne Fogarty notes, “an unwritten story in Ireland,” not because it really is unwritten, but because it has not been well-charted in literary studies. The dilemmas that the family poses and that daughters face are fruitful topics for exploration; Declan Kiberd notes that “for some women writers the family was a trap, for others it remained a zone of resistance.” This course will engage in a chronological reading of 20th-century Irish women writers, tracing the developing mode(s) of representation employed to depict Irish maternity and analyzing their place in the Irish literary canon; it will also explore the relationships between these images and other pertinent themes, such as political and social issues, expressions of sexuality, the role of religion in Ireland, and images of nationhood. Authors to be read include Elizabeth Bowen, Maeve Brennan, Jennifer Johnston, Molly Keane, Mary Lavin, Dorothy Macardle, Edna O’Brien, and Kate O’Brien. Course requirements include 1-page response papers, two short papers, and midterm/final exams.

IRST 30220. Reading the Irish Revival

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the Irish Revival (1891–1939) as a dynamic moment in modern Irish literature in which key literary figures such as W.B. Yeats, Lady Gregory, John Millington Synge, and James Joyce worked to make Ireland a center of cultural innovation once again. This significance of this period to Ireland’s decolonization and to related debates over the appropriate forms and language for an Irish national literature will provide a central focus. Texts to be considered will include the drama of J.M. Synge and Lady Gregory, the poetry of W.B. Yeats and Joyce’s Dubliners.

IRST 30222. Culture and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course discusses the literature of Northern Ireland and how it reveals the culture and politics of Northern Ireland.

IRST 30223. Introduction to Irish Folklore

(3-0-3)

This course will discuss the 19th-century concept of folklore and its application in Ireland. “Irish folklore” is usually understood in terms of three main and related domains: “folk narrative” (or oral literature), “folk belief” (or popular religion) and “material folk culture.” These will be examined with special emphasis placed on narrative. Representative oral narrative texts from the Gaelic tradition will be studied in translation.

IRST 30226. Writing Nations: Defining Englishness and Irishness in Victorian-Era Literature

(3-0-3)

This course seeks to counter the view of English and Irish literature as unrelated during the Victorian period by exploring how both Irish and English writers of the period engage in the process of defining their respective countries and cultures. Certainly, in the Victorian Era defining Ireland’s relationship to England was anything but simple. What becomes apparent by exploring Irish and English attempts to write about their respective “nations” is not only the divergence in ways Irish and English writers characterized the relationship between the two countries, but also how the process of defining Irish and English realities ultimately took different forms. Therefore, this course will not only explore how individual writers go about writing “nations,” but also how the forms these writings take also reveal certain intersections and divergences between what characterizes Irish-ness and English-ness.

IRST 30274. Violence in Late-Medieval and Renaissance Europe

(3-0-3) Rapple

During the late-medieval and early-modern period Western Europe was a particularly violent place, but Europeans did not conceive of themselves as living in a state of unmitigated and continuous chaos. This course will examine the ways in which violence manifested itself during the period, with particular attention to the theoretical justifications that underpinned it, the rituals that surrounded it, and the calculation with which it was used. The centrality of violence in upholding personal honor as well as the persistent notions that its employment lay at the heart of government and the legal system will also be scrutinized. The benediction that the cult of the knight as Christian professional gave to much violence, and the opportunities for financial advancement that mercy could offer those capable of devastating action will be of special interest. Using contemporary accounts, the course will bring the student from the streets of 16th-century Rome to the fields of war-torn France, from the western seaboard of Ireland to the contested waters of the Mediterranean in a world where life was often cheap and mercy was generally expensive.

IRST 30301. Women in Irish Oral Tradition

(3-0-3)

This course will explore oral verbal art in Irish and English, through transcribed texts, sound recordings, and film, paying particular attention to depiction of and performances by women and offering gendered readings of the material studied.

IRST 30306. Saints and Kings in Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on a series of encounters (in early Irish and Hiberno-Latin) between saints and kings or other royal characters. Through these stories and characters, tensions between the domains of spiritual and secular, the local and the “national,” the native and the external, are raised, explored, and (sometimes, though by no means always) resolved. Saints such as Patrick, Colmcille, Brigit, Ciarán, and Cainnech, together with kings such as Lóegaire Mac Néill, Diarmuid Mac Cerbaill, and Muirchertach Mac Erca will be studied.

IRST 30307. The Irish Tradition I

(3-0-3)

Ireland possesses the oldest vernacular literary tradition in Europe, spanning over 1,500 years to the present day. This course will provide a survey of the origins and development of that literary tradition through more than a millennium from its beginnings until the 17th century, when political circumstances led to the collapse of the highly developed native system of learning, poetry, and patronage. The development of the Irish literary tradition will be traced against this background of political and cultural upheavals from approximately 500 to 1650.

IRST 30308. Irish in Their Own Words II: A Survey of Early-Modern Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

This course will investigate the literature of the early modern period (1500–1800) in Irish, both prose and poetry. This period is one of cumulative social, cultural, and political crisis for Irish-speaking Ireland. Students read closely a selection of texts representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them in their own language (all texts are read in English translation). Many of the English translations are accompanied by facing original text so that students gain some working knowledge of the Irish language, which will assist them in evaluating the translations they are reading and in appreciating the sensuous beauty of much of the poetry, in particular. We will also consider aspects of the relationship between literature and history. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature, and it will also be of interest to students of modern Irish history.

IRST 30309. Great Irish Writers

The early modern period (16th to late-18th centuries) is a time of English conquest in Ireland. It is, therefore, a period of cumulative crisis for the Irish and is important in the formation of their identity. We will read closely a selection of texts, both prose and poetry, representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them. All texts, originally written in Irish, will be read in English translation. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature (we will, in fact, read some English writing on Ireland in this period), and it will also be of interest to students of Irish history. We will supplement the material with readings from the work of historians on early modern European nationalism in order to place it in its wider context. In addition, we will examine some recent work on the interface between language, literature, and anthropology in order to deepen our cultural understanding of the texts we are studying.

IRST 30310. Contemporary Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to contemporary literature written in Irish. No prior knowledge of Irish is required, and all texts are in translation. We read a selection of texts from a variety of genres, including novels, short stories, poetry, short films, plays, and autobiographies. In the course we examine the politics of writing in a less frequently spoken language and discuss the issue of translation. We interrogate text from a variety of perspectives: literary, cultural, political, and ideological and consider the relevance of biographical detail as well.

IRST 30320. Screening the Irish Troubles

(3-0-3)

This course will look at how political conflict in Ireland from the 1916 Rebellion and the War of Independence up to and including what became known as “The Troubles” in the North of Ireland has been represented on the screen. Students will analyze a wide variety of cinematic texts, mainstream commercial Hollywood features, as well as independent Irish and British films. Documentary film will also be analyzed. Certain seminal events such as Bloody Sunday and the 1981 Hunger Strikes, which have a diverse representational history on screen, will be given particular attention. Among the films discussed will be Mise Eire, Saoirse, Michael Collins, The Wind that Shakes the Barley, Some Mother’s Son, In the Name of the Father, and Bloody Sunday.

IRST 30321. Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3)

Consideration of the period between 950 and 1400 is of crucial importance in understanding Irish history. This course not only covers the range of continuities and radical discontinuities that marked Ireland’s development during this time, but also charts the attempted conquest of the entire country by the English Crown. The lecture series also seeks to answer a number of questions. Why did the papacy give the English Crown sovereignty over Ireland? Why did a country like Ireland, on the verge of attaining political and economic centralization, not organize better resistance to English attempts to subdue it? Why did the English colony fail to prove more successful in exerting its will over indigenous Irish potentates? Culturally the period also witnessed the growing assimilation of English invaders to the norms of Gaelic Irish politics and society. Lastly, events in Ireland had a serious influence on developments in England, Wales, and Scotland, provoking, amongst other things, the fall of the Plantagenet Dynasty and an attempted invasion by King Robert I of Scotland.

IRST 30371. Introduction to Irish Writers

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: IRST 32371

As the visit to campus of the most recent Irish winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature suggests, this small island has produced a disproportionate number of great writers. Designed as a general literature course, the class will introduce the student to a broad range of Irish writers in English from the 18th century to the present. Writers will include Jonathan Swift, Maria Edgeworth, Oscar Wilde, James Joyce, William Butler Yeats, Elizabeth Bowen, Brian Friel, and John McGahern. We will also look at recent film versions of several of these writers’ works, including Wilde’s Importance of Being Earnest. Themes to be explored include representations of “national character” and the relationships between religion and national identity, gender and nationalism, Ireland and England, and “Irish-ness” and “English-ness.” Students can expect a midterm, a paper (5–6 pages typed) and a final.

IRST 30372. Introduction to Irish Writers

(3-0-3) O’Conchubhair

Corequisite: IRL 32109

This course introduces undergraduate students to Irish literature, explores its dominant themes and motifs, and surveys canonical texts and major authors from the 18th century to the present day. A broad range of texts and genres—poetry, novels, short stories, folklore, and drama—are studied from a historical and cultural perspective and in relation to transnational literary trends and movements. Attention is also paid to modernization and tradition as well as post-colonialism, feminism, and censorship. No prior knowledge of Ireland or the Irish language is required. Irish-language texts will be available in translation.

IRST 30404. Irish History I

(3-0-3)

Irish political history from the beginning of the Tudor Reconquest to the enactment of the legislative union in 1801. Attention is given to colonization, religious conflict, the Ulster Plantation, political and constitutional reactions to British government policies, and the rise of Protestant patriotism.

IRST 30405. Irish History II

(3-0-3)

Irish political history and Anglo-Irish relations from 1801 up to and including the current conflict in contemporary Northern Ireland. Attention will be given to religious conflict, the development of romantic and revolutionary nationalism, the changing nature of Anglo-Irish relations, the Irish-American dimension, and the special problems of the North.

IRST 30406. Northern Ireland Since 1920

(3-0-3)

This course examines society and politics in Northern Ireland from the partition of Ireland to the current, increasingly unstable peace process.

IRST 30407. The Fighting Irish Since 1534

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the cult of the “Fighting Irish” in history, literature, art, iconography, film, and media. Lectures and readings will deal primarily with the period between the Reformation (1534) and the Irish Civil War (1922–23).

IRST 30408. Ireland: From Famine to Independence

(3-0-3)

This course explores Irish politics and society from the Great Famine (1845–49) to the establishment of the independent Irish Free State amidst civil war (1922–23). It examines the causes of the famine and its legacies of mass emigration, nationalism, and rapid linguistic, devotional, and demographic change; the political and social origins of the “Land War”; the politics of Parnell and Home Rule; “New Nationalism” and Ulster Unionism; and the WW I-era “revolution” that undermined British authority in Ireland and led to the establishment of two new states. Particular attention is given to the “Irish Revolution” (1913–23): its longer-term origins; how and why the British Government lost legitimacy in Ireland; the nature of revolutionary violence; who joined the IRA and other nationalist organizations; and what changed and what remained the same with the achievement of independence.

IRST 30409. Late-Medieval and Early-Modern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course is intended as a broad survey of Irish political, cultural, and social history in the medieval and early modern periods. Starting with an examination of Gaelic-Irish world prior to the 12th-century Anglo-Norman invasion, we will emphasize a vibrant and viable society and its interaction with its neighbors throughout the British Isles. The Anglo-Norman invasion and the Gaelic response will be the next major theme. Norman perceptions of the Irish as “Other” will be studied through the work of Giraldus Cambrensis. The development of a feudal society in the Norman-controlled portions and its interaction with Gaelic Ireland and the subsequent development of two interacting societies, Gaelic and the other, English, yet significantly Gaelicized, will receive special attention. The 16th-century Tudor conquest will be the next major topic with a focus on the development of colonizing schemes. Elizabethan representations of the Irish will follow, with an emphasis on the work of the poet and settler Edmund Spenser. Seventeenth-century developments including plantations, the rebellion of 1641, and the interaction of languages will be tracked to 1690.

IRST 30411. Tudor England: Politics and Honor

(3-0-3)

England underwent profound changes between the death of King Henry VIII and the death of Elizabeth I, including its establishment as an international economic force and an empire in the making. Social consequences included assertiveness mixed with anxiety, desires for change tinged by fears of disorder, and a new sense of freedom haunted by fears of isolation. Such anxieties found public expression through two contradictory issues: (1) England’s role of principal defender of the Protestant Reformation in a Europe increasingly under the influence of an ascendant Counter-Reformation, and in a world now dominated by Hapsburg Spain; and (2) the accident of England’s rule by a female monarch, Elizabeth, who dominated domestic and foreign politics, asserting her right as a true king and supreme governor of the English church while refusing either to produce an heir through marriage or to name a successor. In this turmoil, great literary and artistic flowering took place. This course aims to set the work of the great figures of the “Elizabethan Renaissance”—Shakespeare, Spenser, and Sidney—in their larger cultural and intellectual context, such as political commentaries, social polemics, historical works, crime writing, religious exhortations, ballads, engravings, and maps, which made up the Elizabethans’ attempts to comprehend and control their perilously changing world.

IRST 30412. British History: 1660–1800

(3-0-3)

This course of lectures and readings concentrates on British (that is, Scottish as well as English) history from the restoration of monarchy in 1660 to the great crisis detonated by the French Revolution and war in the 1790s. Themes include the politics of Protestant dissent, political ideologies, the role of parliament, Jacobitism, and the rise of the radical parliamentary reform movement.

IRST 30413. British History, 1660–1800

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course of lectures and readings concentrates on British (that is, Scottish as well as English) history from the restoration of monarchy in 1660 to the great crisis detonated by the French Revolution and war in the 1790s. Themes include the politics of Protestant dissent, political ideologies, the role of parliament, Jacobitism, and the rise of the radical parliamentary reform movement.

IRST 30415. Irish History, 1600–1800

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course explores the main themes in Irish histories from the plantation of Ulster, after 1603, to the rebellion of 1798 and the Act of Union with Great Britain in 1800. Attention focuses on plantation, colonization, and religious conflict; the Cromwellian reconquest and the Williamite wars in the 17th century, and the anti-Catholic penal laws and rise of Protestant Ascendancy in the 19th century. This dramatic and formative period witnessed the emergence of many of the forces and rivalries that shaped modern Irish politics and society and continues to generate lively disagreement among historians today.

IRST 30416. Tudor England: Politics and Honor

(3-0-3) Rappale

A thematic survey of Great Britain during the long 19th century, from the impact of the French revolution in 1789 to the first World War I in 1914. The period saw the emergence of many of the most characteristic and most controversial features of the modern world, such as industrialism, capitalism, the welfare state, the expansion of civil and political rights, and the colonial development of the non-Western world. The course uses the three themes of introspection, innovation, and inquiry to understand these changes. Nineteenth-century Britain is known for its earnestness, the intensity with which its elites scrutinized their souls on everything from the foundations of faith to social responsibility to their own sexuality. It is known also for an enormous amount of social-technical innovation, planned and unplanned, of steam engines, sewers, and slums, of new ways of organizing work and handling money, of new aspirations, of new classes and class relations, and of new modes of social organization and social control. Finally it is known as a time of passionate spirit of inquiry, a time of a massive increase in literacy and of hunger for knowledge, a time of immense confidence when it was felt that new knowledge from economics, sociology, biology, geography, and would provide true, rational, and fair answers to all political problems and conflicts.

IRST 30420. The Logics and Politics of International Migration

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the primary economic, humanitarian, and political forces that are driving and sustaining the complex phenomenon of contemporary transnational migration. Within this context, three core questions are addressed. First, have the forces of globalization and the entanglements of international commitments and treaty obligations significantly diminished the policy-making autonomy of the traditional nation-state? Second, what are the significant benefits and costs of transnational migration for the immigration-receiving countries? Finally, is a liberal immigration regime desirable and, if so, can it be politically sustained?

IRST 30432. Irish History II: Irish History Since 1800

(3-0-3)

This course examines political history and Anglo-Irish relations from the Act of Union (1801) up to and including the Northern Ireland “Troubles” and the peace process. It focuses on religious conflict, Catholic emancipation, famine, the development of romantic and revolutionary nationalism, unionism, rebellion, the changing nature of Anglo-Irish relations, modernization, and the special problems of the North.

IRST 30433. Ireland Since 1800

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32432

This course will consist of lectures and readings examining Irish political history and Anglo-Irish relations from 1801 up to and including the current conflict in Northern Ireland. Attention will be given to religious conflict, the development of romantic and revolutionary nationalism, the changing nature of Anglo-Irish relations, and the special problems of the North. A midsemester examination, a paper/essay, and a final will be required.

IRST 30434. Early Modern Ireland

(3-0-3) Rappale

This course offers new perspectives on the struggle for mastery in Ireland from 1470 to 1660. Though keeping in mind the traditional view of the “English reconquest” (decades of rebellion, dispossession, and plantation until, in the aftermath of Cromwell, all Ireland was finally subjected to English rule) this course will take a different approach. By investigating a range of primary sources from the period, students will explore the interactions between the three different models of conquest: (1) descendants of the old Norman colonists (e.g., Fitzgeralds and Butlers) seeking to finish the job; (2) Tudor reform (inspired by Renaissance optimism), by which the English attempted to establish rule by means of legal, social, and cultural assimilation; and (3) unabashed exploitation by English private entrepreneurs on the make. The most important effect of these “contending conquests” was the way they shaped the diverse responses of the native Irish, ranging from accommodation and assimilation to outright rebellion and national war.

IRST 30435. Nineteenth-Century Ireland

(3-0-3)

Drawing on monographs and general studies, this course invites students to consider how different social groups experienced the profound changes that transformed 19th-century Ireland. Although the course traces political developments, it pays equal attention to socioeconomic and cultural issues, including the shift from high fertility to sexual restraint; patterns of emigration, consumption, and social unrest; improvements in education and literacy; linguistic change; changing devotional practices and cultural “revival” in the late-1800s.

IRST 30436. Irish History Since 1800

(3-0-3)

This course will consist of lectures and readings examining Irish political history and Anglo-Irish relations from 1801 up to and including the current conflict in Northern Ireland. Attention will be given to religious conflict, the development of romantic and revolutionary nationalism, the changing nature of Anglo-Irish relations, and the special problems of the North. A midsemester examination, a paper/essay, and a final will be required.

IRST 30438. Science and Medicine in Ireland, 1600–1900

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the history of science and medicine in Ireland from the 17th to the 19th centuries. The course will consider the role of science and medicine in Irish social and political life and will offer a fresh dimension to the cultural and intellectual history of Ireland. Lectures will situate scientists and doctors within their historical contexts, showing how intellectual history intersects with political history. Topics will include science as an instrument of colonialism in Cromwellian Ireland, the scientific satires of Jonathan Swift, the role of the medical community during the Great Famine, women in Irish science, and the role of science in the Cultural Revival. Note that no scientific knowledge is assumed or required.

IRST 30439. Debating Irish History

(3-0-3)

There has long been disagreement between academic historians about how best to conceptualize Ireland’s troubled past. This course analyzes the approaches attempted in the 19th, 20th and 21st centuries to explain Ireland’s history and addresses a host of questions relevant to the history of any country. To what degree do influences like religious adherence, state loyalty, and political commitment affect history writing? How can an historian best deal with the fact of human suffering? What is the difference between a terrorist and a freedom fighter? What effect do the constraints involved in the very process of writing history have on intelligent expression? Can a good history book ever be entirely satisfying to an ethnicity, a nation, or a religious grouping?

IRST 30442. Medicine and Disease in Modern Ireland

(3-0-3) Grimsley-Smith

Ireland is among a handful of modern nations whose histories have been thoroughly transformed by disease events. These events, and the Great Famine in particular, are never simple “visitations of providence” that afflict an undifferentiated populace. They are, rather, inextricably linked with existing social structures and the exercise of power. Changes in government and society from the 1801 Act of Union with Great Britain through the relief of the penal laws against Catholics, emigration, electoral and land reform, and independence in the 20th century are reflected in the health (or lack thereof) of the Irish people. This course, therefore, is intended to introduce students to the social and political history of modern Ireland as seen through the lens of health and disease. While focusing on Irish conditions, we will discuss issues that remain especially relevant in our own time, including: Who is responsible for health? Is health a universal right? Who is the “public” in public health? Where are the boundaries of medical expertise, and how are they determined?

IRST 30501. Folklore, National Culture, Irish History

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the idea of folklore within the history of ideas and will examine the relationships between folklore and popular culture and between folklore and modernity in Ireland.

IRST 30502. Irish Traditional Culture

(3-0-3)

To examine Irish peasant culture, this course will focus on the materials accumulated by folklorists since the late-19th century.

IRST 30602. Irish Traditional Music

(0-0-3)

This course examines the historical background of the instrumental and song traditions; musical style and its relationship to specific musicians and regional traditions; performance practice; and the social and cultural context of “the music.”

IRST 30603. National Cinema: Irish Cinema/Culture

(3-2-3)

Corequisite: FTT 31232

This course examines the films of Ireland and other countries to reveal their distinctive styles, stories, and visual and narrative techniques.

IRST 30610. Irish-American History

(3-0-3) Griffin

Corequisite: HIST 32610

This course explores the history, politics, and culture of Irish-Americans from the colonial era to the near present.

IRST 31603. National Cinema: Irish Cinema/Culture Lab

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: IRT 30603

Corequisite for IRT 30603.

IRST 32371. Introduction to Irish Writers/Discuss

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: IRT 30371

Corequisite discussion section for IRT 30371.

IRST 40014. Anglo-Irish Theatre, 1700–1990

(3-0-3) Pilkinton

Students of English theatre and drama often ignore both the overt and covert contributions made by Ireland, its people, and its culture. Many of the greatest English playwrights since the Restoration have, in fact, been Irish, Anglo-Irish, or heavily influenced by Ireland, and this discussion-oriented course will examine and explore this important symbiosis in terms of theatre, history, and society. Both in terms of internal aspects and external relations, the course will examine a dozen significant Anglo-Irish playwrights writing in English including Congreve, Goldsmith, Sheridan, O’Keeffe, Boucicault, Yeats, Lady Gregory, Synge, O’Casey, Shaw, Wilde, Beckett, Behan, and Friel. We will relate a play (the drama) to the production history of that play (the theatre) while exploring both the larger societal issues of the times, internally to Ireland and externally to England, France, and the United States while also looking at the important World Drama component (as seen with Yeats and Japanese Noh).

IRST 40103. Heroic Literature in Modern Adaptation

(3-0-3)

Beginning with a study of the ethos of Irish/Celtic heroic literature in its historic and cultural context, this course examines the ideological, aesthetic, and personal uses to which that material has been put by Irish writers of the past two centuries (19th and 20th centuries) writing in English and Irish. Among the authors to be studied are Seamus Heaney, Flann O’Brien/Myles na Gopaleen, Nuala Ni

Dhomhnaill, and Eugene Watters/Eoghan ÓTuairisc. Particular attention will be paid to shifting concepts of “authenticity” and the degree to which various creative artists have retained, reinterpreted, or reinvented what they perceived to be the essence of their originals. This course will interest English majors, modernists, and medievalists.

IRST 40110. The West of Ireland: An Imagined Space

(3-0-3)

This course will interrogate and examine representations of the West of Ireland in various 20th-century texts focusing, in particular on the role of “the West of Ireland” in state formation and legitimization during the early decades of independent Ireland and its role in the construction of an Irish identity. We will look at how images of the West of Ireland were constructed in various utopian or romanticized formulations as well as examining more dystopian versions. This course will take an interdisciplinary approach, drawing on the visual arts and film, as well as on literary texts in both Irish and English. (Irish language texts will be read in translation).

IRST 40112. A Gendered Voice—The Poetry of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3) Nic Dharmada

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, the foremost contemporary poet writing in Irish. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ní Dhomhnaill's poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

IRST 40215. Visits to Bedlam

(3-0-3)

Literary, medical, and social views of madness in the 16th through the 19th century.

IRST 40216. Irish and British Literature 1790–1815

(3-0-3)

Burke, Paine, Godwin, Wordsworth, Edgeworth, and Scott in the context of the French Revolution and the Irish political situation at the end of the 18th century.

IRST 40217. Anglo-Irish Identities 1600–1800

(3-0-3)

Observers of the political and cultural problems that continue to plague relations between the modern Irish State, six counties in the north of Ireland, and Great Britain cannot fail to note that the unresolved differences that have festered over the last 200 years had their roots in the traumas of the preceding centuries of English colonialism in Ireland. Focusing on that crucial period in Irish history, this course will explore the complex and contested cultural, political, and ideological identities of a group we have come to call the Anglo-Irish.

IRST 40218. Studies in Six Irish Writers

(3-0-3)

W.B. Yeats, Elizabeth Brown, Bram Stoker, J.M. Synge, Seamus Heaney, and Medbh McGuckian.

IRST 40219. Modern Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will study both the drama produced by the playwrights of the Irish literary renaissance—Yeats, Synge, Lady Gregory, and O’Casey—and the political struggle for Irish independence that was taking place at the same time.

IRST 40220. Passing and Fictions of Race

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of how notions of “race” are explored in Anglo and Anglo-Irish literature.

IRST 40221. Anglo-Irish “Gothic”

(3-0-3)

An interpretation of the uses of the uncanny and the supernatural in Anglo-Irish fiction of the 19th century. Readings will include ghost stories as well as Gothic and “Big House” fiction (some of it in English disguise).

IRST 40222. Culture and Politics in Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

What the literature of Northern Ireland reveals about the culture and politics of Northern Ireland.

IRST 40223. Versions of the Gothic

(3-0-3)

A survey of Gothic fiction in England and Ireland from the mid-18th century to the Victorian Age.

IRST 40224. Contemporary Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

This course explores the drama produced by Irish playwrights during the latter half of the 20th century.

IRST 40302. Beckett, Theater, and Visual Art

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will read and watch Samuel Beckett's plays, read some of his art criticism and view work by artists he admired—where possible, we will seek out paintings by these artists in the L.A. area. As a dramatist, Beckett makes extensive use of painterly effects, both in stage design and in direction. We will be able to watch both TV productions of plays like Krapp's Last Tape, Not I, and Eh Joe that Beckett, himself, closely supervised, and the newly completed film versions of his plays (including Waiting for Godot, Endgame, and Happy Days) by directors that range from Neil Jordan and Atom Egoyan to Damien Hirst and David Mamet. Artists we will look at will include the Irish painter Jack B. Yeats (brother of W.B. Yeats), Bram Van Velde, the Dutch abstract painter, and Avigdor Arikha, the Israeli figurative painter and close friend of the writer from the late 1950s. We will, accordingly, read Beckett as dramatist in the context of the visual arts and their influence on his work, and learn to read visual material—painting, film, and plays. We will try to understand Beckett both in the context of Irish drama and art (reading a little of the drama of Synge and W.B. Yeats) and in the context of the international avant-garde of which he was part. The dramas and visual material will be supplemented by a small number of critical works that will aid students in understanding Beckett's works. Students will be expected to do response papers and one longer research paper.

IRST 40303. Identities in Early Modern Irish Literature

(3-0-3)

The topic to be covered in this course is the formation of individual and collective identity through language, literature, and history in this period. In addition to the works of the great early-modern poets (16th to 18th centuries) such as Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn, Dáibhí Ó Bruadair, and Aogán Ó Rathaille, we will focus on such important prose works as Foras Feasa ar Éirinn, the foundation history of the “new” Irish nation of the 17th century. Important secondary works here will include those of Anthony D. Smith and Adrian Hastings on pre-modern forms of nationalism, as well as Stephen Greenblatt on identity formation in 16th-century England and Paul Friedrich on linguistic relativism and the poetic in language.

IRST 40304. Poetry and Politics in Early Modern Ireland 1541–1688

(3-0-3)

The political poetry of the period 1541–1688 will be discussed and analyzed against the historical background. The primary focus will be the mentality of the native intelligentsia as it is reflected in the poetry and as it responded to the momentous changes of the period. The origins and rise of the cult of the Stuarts will be examined and the historiography of the period will be assessed.

IRST 40305. The Poetry of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the interstices of gender and cultural identity in the work of Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill. Her poetry will be situated within a theoretical framework that draws, inter alia, on recent feminist scholarship. It will address theories of the feminine as well as the specificities of Irish-language literary and oral discourses and their impact on Ni Dhomhnaill's poetic practice. The course will also address the implications of translation. While texts will be read in English, there will be an opportunity for close textual comparisons with the original Irish-language poems.

IRST 40306. Irish In Their Own Words

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is to introduce students to the richness and variety of literature produced in the Irish language during the medieval and early modern periods (we will cover primarily the period between approximately 800 and 1700 AD). The emphasis in the first half of the semester will be on studying the mainly prose saga literature of the medieval period in its various literary, cultural, and historical contexts. This will involve both a close reading of the texts themselves in English translation and an examination of the material in the light of recent scholarship in this area. The second half will investigate the literature of the early-modern period, in this case largely the poetry. This period is one of cumulative crisis for the Irish and their linguistic and cultural well-being. Students read closely a selection of texts representative of various facets of this crisis and of Irish responses to them in their own language rather than in the English language of their colonizers. All the translations are accompanied by facing original text so that students gain some working knowledge of the Irish language, which will assist them in evaluating the translations they are reading and in appreciating the sensuous beauty of much of this poetry. The material provides interesting contrasts and comparisons for those who have already studied some Anglo-Irish literature and it should also be of interest to students of modern Irish history.

IRST 40307. Gender, Politics, and the Poetic Tradition in Irish

(3-0-3)

This course begins with the fundamental feminist assumption that gender matters, and that gender is one of the central terms through which people both understand and critique their world. Our particular area of inquiry will be the role of gender in the Irish poetic tradition from the 16th century onward, something that has only recently begun to receive attention from critics such as Angela Bourke, Mairin Nic Eoin, and Briona Nic Dhiarmada. The class will focus on how gendered representations of masculinity and femininity underwrite political appeals, particularly regarding Ireland's colonial relationship to England. We'll also look at how gender is used to represent and to resist related social changes, like shifting class relations, unstable power relations between men and women, and contested notions of sexuality. We will read a variety of poetic texts, some serious and formal, some funny and popular; genres will include formal bardic poetry, the aisling (or vision poem), oral lament, song poetry, and comic verse. The methodology will be historically informed close reading, meaning that we will read texts closely, rather than generalize abstractly, so that we have a sound basis for our analysis. No knowledge of Irish language is required or necessary, though original texts will be provided alongside translations. This class is discussion-based and will ask for your engaged participation at all times. Students will be responsible for presentations and will write several shorter papers and a longer term paper.

IRST 40308. Modern Irish Poetry

(3-0-3)

An introduction to Ireland and the Irish poetic tradition, this course is a magnificent chance to study with a world-renowned poet. It offers a unique opportunity to study modern Irish poetry with the greatest living Irish-language poet. Visiting Notre Dame for the 2006 fall semester only, Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill will teach a course on modern and contemporary Irish poetry. This class will spotlight key canonical texts by Irish-language poets as students conduct close readings, examine the verses' social and political context, and deconstruct the mechanics of each individual poem. We will read Cathal O Searcaigh, Gearoid Mac Lochlainn, Biddy

Jenkinson, Michael Hartnett, Maire Mhac an tSaoi, Michael Davitt, Gabriel Rosenstock, Liam O Muirlithe, Pearse Hutchinson, Sean O Riordain, Mairtin O Direain, and Aine Ni Ghlinn. This course also focuses on Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill's own work. All texts will be available in English. No prior knowledge of Irish required.

IRST 40309. Northern Ireland Troubles

(3-0-3)

This discussion-based seminar explores the history of the six northeastern counties of Ireland that became "Northern Ireland" in 1920–21. Northern Ireland remained part of the United Kingdom and had a built-in Protestant unionist majority. The Catholic minority, alienated from the state from the outset, looked across the new border and to Dublin, capital of the Irish Free State, as the true site of their allegiance. Northern Ireland was thus, from the beginning, dysfunctional, scarred by sectarian violence and systematic discrimination in housing and employment. After examining the origins of the state and the early decades of its existence the seminar will turn to its main concern "the Troubles" that broke out in the late 1960s. The major episodes under scrutiny include the civil rights movement, Bloody Sunday, the hunger strikes, and the Good Friday Peace Agreement. Students are obliged to produce a 25-page essay based on original research, and many are expected to draw on the rich microfilm archive of "the Troubles," the Linenhall Collection, held in the Hesburgh Library.

IRST 40310. Ideology, Poetry, and Politics in Jacobite Ireland

(3-0-3)

Jacobitism, or allegiance to the course of the House of Stuart (from Latin Jacobus—James—the deposed James II), was the common voice of political dissent in 18th-century Ireland, Scotland, and England. Irish Catholic advocacy of the Stuart cause had already become a political orthodoxy in the course of the 17th century, and when the Stuarts were deposed by William of Orange ("King Billy") later succeeded by the Hanoverians (1714), the culture of dispossession and displacement and the rhetoric of return and restoration became firmly entrenched in the political ideology of Catholic Ireland. This course will examine the development of Irish Jacobitism in its various literary, historical, and ideological aspects, in addition to placing it within its wider British and European context in the 18th century.

(3-0-3)

Until visitation was restricted in 1770, London's Bethlem Hospital (popularly known as "Bedlam") attracted as many as 96,000 spectators per year who paid for the privilege of watching mental patients: Like the tigers in The Tower, these patients were not simply chained, but shown, put on exhibition. The cruelty of this practice and the fact that it was stopped both point to the 18th-century fascination with madness, with the irrational, with what Freud would call the Unheimlich, the uncanny. Johnson's astronomer who comes to believe that he personally controls the weather, Sterne's mad Maria, piping for her lost lover, Locke's man who believes himself made out of glass and who acts, "reasonably," to avoid hard objects; or Swift's modest proposer who concocts a cookbook to save the Irish nation—all bear witness to this other side of the 18th century, which will be the subject of this course. We will begin with selections from Cervantes's Don Quixote and some short readings in Locke and others who attempted to analyze madness. We will then move on to explorations of Johnson, Smollett, Sterne, and Swift. Our major focus will be the last writer, with special attention to his poetry, Gulliver's Travels and A Tale of A Tub. (Swift, who was a governor of Bethlem Hospital, left most of his money to fund the first mental hospital in Ireland, St. Patrick's, which is still there). For the sake of comparison, we will conclude with several 19th-century selections.

IRST 40312. Identity and Gender in Modern Irish Women's Poetry

(3-0-3)

This course interrogates issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish women poets. We examine the ways in which contemporary poets write from a constellation of identities—sexual, cultural, and linguistic—and will focus in particular on the ways they articulate versions of identity in specific cultural and literary forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies, feminist theory, and postcolonial studies, among others, this course examines texts that question and problematize essentialist notions of cultural and gender identity. We will also explore tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary Irish-language writing. We read, among others, poets such as Eavan Boland, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Maedhbh McGuckian, Paula Meehan, and Eiléan Ní Chuilleanáin.

IRST 40315. Re-Imagining Ireland: Sociological Perspectives on a Changing Society

(3-0-3)

In recent years, we have witnessed the passing of many of the old orthodoxies in Irish society. The Roman Catholic Church has lurched from one scandal or crisis to another, all the time losing its legitimacy among the body politic. Politics has been exposed as a less than honorable affair, as tribunal after tribunal lay bare the unsavory financial ties between politicians, developers, and leading Irish businessmen. Irish sport, language, music, and culture have gone global in the process, transforming themselves into commodities that ultimately stretch their capacities to remain true to their local qualities. A sustained, if uncertain, economic prosperity engulfs the land. A new cult of individualism promotes the idea of more choice—whether that relates to supermarkets, schools, hospitals, or health care packages. In this course, we employ critical sociological analysis to explore present-day Ireland in relation to class and social mobility, the rise of consumer culture, gender and gender relations, transformations of place and space, and cultural/media innovation and its diffusion.

IRST 40316. Folklore, Literature, and Irish National Culture

(3-0-3)

The ideological character of the 19th-century concept of folklore allowed it to transcend the social category of peasants from whom it was largely recorded. This course will look at the role of folklore in the building of an Irish national culture from the time of the Gaelic Revival. Programmatic texts in Irish and in English by Douglas Hyde, first president of the Gaelic League, and by Séamus Delargy, director of the Irish Folklore Commission, will be discussed. It will also look at a later polemical text of the Gaelic writer Máirtín Ó Cadhain, directed at what he perceived as the essentialism of Irish folklorists.

IRST 40320. Gender and Identity in Irish-Language Texts

(3-0-3)

This course will interrogate issues of gender and identity in the work of contemporary Irish-language writers. We will examine the ways in which contemporary writers in Irish writing from a constellation of identities, sexual, cultural, and linguistic, exploring these issues as they articulate them in specific cultural forms. Drawing on recent theoretical work in gender studies and postcolonial studies, the course will look at texts that question and problematize essentialist notions of cultural identity. It will explore, in particular, some of the tensions inherent in the articulation of a cross-cultural sexual identity and the specificity of linguistic and cultural inheritance in contemporary writing in Irish. We will read, among others, texts from writers such as Máire Mhac an tSaoi, Biddy Jenkinson, Nuala Ní Dhomhnaill, Pearse Hutchinson, Cathal Ó Searcaigh, Seán Mac Mathúna, and Micheál Ó Conghaile.

IRST 40409. Elizabethans and Their World

(3-0-3)

This course aims to set the work of the great figures of the Elizabethan Renaissance—Shakespeare, Spenser, and Sidney—in their larger cultural and intellectual context, such as political commentaries, social polemics, historical works, crime writing, religious exhortations, ballads, engravings, and maps, which made up the Elizabethans' attempts to comprehend and control their perilously changing world.

IRST 40410. Early Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course comprises a survey of the history and culture of the Irish and the other Celtic peoples from the Neolithic era to approximately AD 1500. We will explore the main documentary sources in translation—mythological and historical, ecclesiastical and secular—as well as discussing the importance of the archaeological evidence.

IRST 40411. Ideology, Poetry, and Politics in Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course is a broad-based exploration of Ireland and her neighbors from the 8th century to the 16th.

IRST 40412. Late-Medieval/Early-Modern Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course offers new perspectives on the struggle for mastery in Ireland from 1470 to 1660. The most important effect of these contending conquests was the way they shaped the diverse responses of the native Irish, ranging from accommodation and assimilation to outright rebellion and national war.

IRST 40413. Ethnic Conflict to Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

A history of the Troubles.

IRST 40414. The Vikings

(3-0-3)

Discussion will be based on medieval primary sources from England, Ireland, France, and Russia. Scandinavian life at home and the possible reasons for migration will also be considered, as background to the more exciting events abroad. The importance of archaeological evidence (including art), and modern treatments of Vikings in film and literature, will also be included.

IRST 40415. Reading Ulysses

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of James Joyce's Ulysses.

IRST 40420. Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Scottish Literature

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course will survey major authors, genres, and themes of the literature of Scotland from the era of Burns to the present.

IRST 40500. Religious Persecution in Early Modern England and Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course examines the dynamics of religious persecution in the early modern period in England and Ireland. We will look at the experiences and perspectives of both the victims and the perpetrators in these two rapidly evolving and interacting societies. The theories of persecution and resistance will be examined in particular for the period of the reformation. Intolerance and persecution are not new phenomena, and what we find when we examine their manifestation in the past that some of the same motivations are exhibited in religious sectarianism and bigotry today. This is a course that calls on us to consider the experiences of mainstream Catholics and Protestants and the authorities involved and to make connections with our present day world.

IRST 40501. Contemporary Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

A close analysis of the dramatic literature produced by Irish playwrights during the latter half of the 20th century.

IRST 40503. Archaeology of Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course examines the cultural and historical trajectory of the archaeology of Ireland through a series of richly illustrated lectures, organized chronologically, that trace cultural, social, and technological developments from the Neolithic through the Viking period. Integrated with this lecture series, and running concurrently on alternate days, will be a series of seminar and discussion classes focused on a number of anthropological and archaeological issues related to each of these periods of time. This includes the emergence of the unique systems of communities and the development of systems of metallurgy in the Iron Age. Other classes will touch upon the topics of regionalism and identity and contact at different periods of time, mortuary practices and ritual, and discussion of village life in ring forts during the Bronze Age.

IRST 40506. Modern Irish Drama

(3-0-3) Harris

A study of the romantic theme in Irish literature from Edgeworth and Moore to the young Yeats and Joyce. This course will include poetry, fiction, drama, and aesthetics.

IRST 40509. Modern Irish Drama

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will study both the drama produced by the playwrights of the Irish literary renaissance—Yeats, Synge, Lady Gregory, and O’Casey—and the political struggle for Irish independence that was taking place at the same time.

IRST 40510. Romantic Ireland

(3-0-3) Campbell

A study of the romantic theme in Irish literature from Edgeworth and Moore to the young Yeats and Joyce. This course will include poetry, fiction, drama, and aesthetics.

IRST 40513. Culture and Politics of Northern Ireland

(3-0-3)

Using a broad range of texts—drama, fiction, poetry, film, painting, and documentary material—an examination of the politics of culture, and the cultures of politics, in the North of Ireland during the 20th century.

IRST 40515. Contemporary British and Irish Fiction

(3-0-3) Smyth

This course will introduce students to the contemporary fiction of Ireland, England, Scotland, and Wales, as well as some of the best recent black British fiction. Some of the authors whose work we will read are Pat McCabe, Neil Jordan, John Banville, Zadie Smith, Monica Ali, Andrea Levi, Irvine Welsh, James Kelman, and Pat Barker. These writers will be read in the context of “the Break-up of Britain” and a concomitant sense of the changes in British and Irish identity in the past 20 years or so. Expect a lot of reading, but also some superb novels. Two 12-page papers and a presentation.

IRST 40517. The Politics of Civil Wars

(3-0-3)

This course will explore social scientific explanations for the phenomenon of modern civil wars. It will do so through detailed exploration of individual theories of civil war with a view to testing how they explain a variety of civil wars in the 20th century. Students will be expected to acquaint themselves with these theories and also with the history of some individual cases. The course will, therefore, cover both political science and historical materials, and students will be expected to write both a theoretical paper and an analysis of one individual case. The course will be assessed through two papers and a general exam.

IRST 40525. Gender, Genre, and the Short Story

(3-0-3)

This course discusses how representations of gender were explored in a survey of 19th- and 20th-century short stories from England, Ireland, France, Russia, and the Southern United States.

IRST 40540. Conflict and Consensus in Twentieth-Century Ireland

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10200 OR POLS 141 OR POLS 141A) OR (POLS 20200 OR POLS 241 OR POLS 241A) OR (GOVT 10200 OR GOVT 141 OR GOVT 141A) OR (GOVT 20200 OR GOVT 241 OR GOVT 241A)

This course examines the government and politics of the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland through the lenses of democratization, state-development, nationalism, and unionism. Among the themes covered in the course are the British and Irish national questions; religion, ethnicity, and nationalism; the partition of Ireland and its consequences; the constitutional development and democratization of an independent Ireland; devolved government and control in Northern Ireland; the party systems in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland; and the consequences of British direct rule.

IRST 40605. Film, Literature, and Irish Culture

(3-0-3) Gibbons

Corequisite: IRST 41606

This course will examine some of the dominant images of Ireland in film and literature, and will place their development in a wider cultural and historical context. Comparisons between film, literature, and other cultural forms will be featured throughout the course, and key stereotypes relating to gender, class, and nation will be analyzed, particularly as they bear on images of romantic Ireland and modernity, landscape, the city, religion, violence, family, and community. Particular attention will be paid to key figures such as Yeats, Synge, and Joyce, and contemporary writers such as John McGahern, William Trevor, Patrick McCabe and Roddy Doyle will be discussed in terms of the wider implications of their work for contemporary Irish culture. The resurgence of Irish cinema and new forms of Irish writing in the past two decades will provide the main focus of the second part of the semester, tracing the emergence of new distinctive voices and images in an increasingly globalised and multicultural Ireland.

IRST 41606. Irish Film and Culture Lab

(0-1-0)

Corequisite: IRST 40605

Required for IRST 40605 Irish Film and Culture.

IRST 50316. Folklore, Literature, and Irish National Culture

(3-0-3) Gillan

The ideological character of the 19th-century concept of folklore allowed it to transcend the social category of peasants from whom it was largely recorded. This course will look at the role of folklore in the building of an Irish national culture from the time of the Gaelic Revival. Programmatic texts in Irish and in English by Douglas Hyde, first president of the Gaelic League, and by Séamus Delargy, director of the Irish Folklore Commission, will be discussed. It will also look at a later polemical text of the Gaelic writer Máirtín Ó Cadhain, directed at what he perceived as the essentialism of Irish folklorists.

IRST 50318. The Feminine in Irish literary and Oral-Vernacular Tradition

(3-0-3) O’Cruaioich

This course addresses issues concerning the representation of the feminine in Irish literary and oral-vernacular tradition. It treats of the historical displacement and re-interpretation of the figure of the autonomous “otherworld” female in literature and oral narrative. In particular it examines a series of texts from pre-modern oral narrative tradition featuring the figures of cailleach/hag and bean feasa/wise woman with a view to understanding their significance for the “native” ear. The potential significance of such texts as therapeutic resources for the modern reader is also considered.

Latin American Studies

LAST 10500. Beginning Quechua I

(4-0-4) Callalli Villafuerte

This is an introductory, first-year language sequence with equal focus on the four skills: speaking, listening, reading, and writing. An appreciation for Quechua culture is also encouraged through readings and class discussions.

LAST 20000. Black Music, World Market

(3-0-3)

Slavery and the coerced migration of Africans to the New World left a multitude of popular musical styles from black peoples (and others) on both sides of the Atlantic. This course is an examination of the diversity of popular black musics on a global scale.

LAST 20002. Societies and Cultures of Latin America

(3-0-3) Smith

This course introduces students to the diverse cultures and societies of Latin America through historical, ethnographic, and literary study. Contemporary issues of globalization, violence, and migration will preoccupy the discussion of Central and South America and the Caribbean today.

LAST 20003. Witchcraft and Magic in the Contemporary World

(3-0-3)

Witchcraft and the ritualistic use of magic for shaping the future and controlling the present have been a part of human development from the earliest times. The advent of science and technology has only modified or altered the role and significance of witchcraft in contemporary societies, as witchcraft and magic services and their providers have gone online. Anthropological studies on witchcraft in contemporary societies have pointed out the relationship between the development of witchcraft and the prevailing economy, politics, public health, culture, and the environment. This course will explore the role and evolution of witchcraft in modern societies of Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Through assigned readings, in-class discussions, movies, documentaries, and ethnographic projects, we will seek to understand why witchcraft and magic and associated beliefs are universal phenomena in human societies, and how these practices themselves adapt to the changing world.

LAST 20151. Women in the Americas

(3-0-3)

A survey of a wide variety of literature (fiction, poetry, testimonio, personal essay, autobiography, critical essay, and oral history) and film written by and about women in the Americas from the time of conquest/encounter to the present.

LAST 20152. Latino Literature

(3-0-3)

A survey of Latino fiction, poetry, and other literary works.

LAST 20153. Caribbean Women Writers

(3-0-3)

A sampling of novels written by Caribbean writers, with a particular emphasis on such themes as colonization, madness, childhood, and memory.

LAST 20154. Literature of the Early Americas

(3-0-3)

Close examination of selected works written by Americans from the 17th century through the Civil War.

LAST 20400. Studies in Spanish American Culture

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the scope and variety of Spanish American culture. Readings at an intermediate level in history, art, culture, and society.

LAST 20402. La Telenovela

(3-0-3) Mangione-Lora

In this course, you will explore the genre of the telenovela (a major social, cultural, political, and economic force in Latin America and, more recently, in the United States) by reading about the genre (in Spanish) and watching two condensed telenovelas (also in Spanish). You will demonstrate your understanding of the telenovela and its importance in Hispanic culture through writing and discussion and through application of these ideas as you write, produce, direct, act in, record, and edit a mini-telenovela as a class. During this process you will learn and apply basic production (videography) and post-production (computer-based video and audio editing) techniques.

LAST 20403. Studies in Andean Culture

(3-0-3) Callalli Villafuerte

An intermediate Spanish course focusing on Andean culture and the Inca Empire.

LAST 20500. Conversation and Composition: Afro-Brazilian Culture

(3-0-3)

This course explores cultural perspectives on Brazil through a wide variety of sources, including literary, sociological, and historical texts, feature films, music, and news reports. Topics for discussion include race relations in Brazil, Afro-Brazilian culture and identity, and Brazil's contemporary relations with Africa. Oral and written assignments aim at perfecting students' proficiency in speaking, reading, and writing. This course reviews major concepts of Portuguese grammar in context and provides practical exercises in diction and vocabulary building. Course conducted in Portuguese.

LAST 20550. Globalization, Coffee, and Fair Trade

(3-0-3) Brenneman

This special spring '09 course will examine globalization and its effects on people at the global "margins," especially in economically depressed Central America. The drop in world coffee prices, the rise of the maquila industry, and the increase of emigration from Central America are just a few of the topics that will be considered during this course. The course will also examine how lifestyle choices and consumption habits in the United States affect farmers and artisans in the "third world." A key focus of the course will be the examination of the international fair trade movement, both a result of and a response to globalization. A required one-week cross-cultural experience in Guatemala during spring break will bring students face-to-face with some of the people who are most deeply impacted by economic globalization. During the trip, students will meet and hear from Guatemalan coffee farmers, large and small, as well as from economists and sociologists with differing views on the subjects of "fair trade" and "free trade." You must be willing and able to travel to Guatemala from March 7 to 15 in order to pass this class. Students will use conceptual tools from global sociology, economic sociology, and social movement theory. Students in other majors such as finance, marketing or economics, will learn how economic sociology sheds light on economic behavior and international economic forces. The course is a natural fit for sophomore or junior sociology majors and Latin American Studies minors, but seniors are also welcome. The course content and the cross-cultural component would also make it an ideal elective for majors in marketing; Spanish; and film, theatre, and television. This course is capped at 19 students, and all registering students must receive approval for enrollment by Dec. 10, 2008.

LAST 20725. Pirates, Planters, and Peasants: Caribbean Experiences in the Past

(3-0-3) Hauser

The Caribbean is often depicted as a sea inhabited by pirates, filled with exotic islands, picturesque beaches, and bucolic landscapes. What is often overlooked is the culture and history of the people who actually lived there. Who were the pirates of the Caribbean? Why were the islands so important to European powers? And what were the effects of slavery? Focusing on Jamaica, Belize, and Barbados, this course charts the emergence of a multi-ethnic Anglophone Caribbean through an examination of plantation colonies and the aftermath of slavery. Specifically, it will focus on cultural encounters between Native Americans, Africans, and Europeans through a combination of ethnography, history, and archaeology.

LAST 27500. Topics in Afro-Luso-Brazilian Cultures

(3-0-3)

This course explores cultural perspectives on Brazil through a wide variety of sources, including literary, sociological, and historical texts, feature films, music, and news reports. Topics for discussion include race relations in Brazil, Afro-Brazilian culture and identity, and Brazil's contemporary relations with Africa. Oral and written assignments aim at perfecting students' proficiency in speaking, reading, and writing. This course reviews major concepts of Portuguese grammar in context and provides practical exercises in diction and vocabulary building. Course conducted in Portuguese.

LAST 27501. Intermediate Quechua I

(3-0-3)

This course is by department approval only for the student who wants to learn and study Quechua at an intermediate level.

LAST 30001. Caribbean Diasporas

(3-0-3)

This course explores the transnational orientations and the multidimensional consequences of movement from the Caribbean as it affects sites in Miami, London, Paris, or Brooklyn, as well as Havana, Jamaica, Haiti, or Belize. Readings include works of ethnography, fiction, and history that pose questions about how the construction and reconstruction of family bonds, community identity, religion, political power, and economic relations will be treated in the domestic and the global context.

LAST 30002. Archaeology of the African Diaspora

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to serve as an in-depth undergraduate level introduction to archaeological perspectives on the African Diaspora. In this course, we examine the formation and transformation of the Black Atlantic World beginning with the transatlantic slave trade to the middle of the 19th century through the study of archaeological and historical sources. The emphasis in this course is on English-speaking African America, where the vast majority of archaeological investigations have been undertaken. A major objective of this course is to understand the material world of communities of the African Diaspora within the context of the history and historiography of the Black Atlantic. This course is organized around the following themes: (1) diaspora and the Atlantic world; (2) material life of the diaspora; (3) diverse communities of the diaspora; and (4) intersections of race, class, gender, and representation.

LAST 30003. Immigration in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3)

How do people in immigrant-receiving countries form their attitudes toward immigrants? What are the unintended consequences of increased governmental investments in border and immigration control? What are the differences between refugees and other migrants? How is immigration related to the 2005 riots in France? In this course, we will be able to examine such questions, and more generally understand the causes, experiences, and consequences of transnational migration. We will acquire a sound interdisciplinary understanding of migration in its historical, social, political, and cultural facets. Diverse aspects of immigration history, policy implementation, and migrants' lives will be examined, with fieldwork accounts from countries of origin and from the United States, Europe, and Japan. Issues to be addressed include ethnic neighborhood formation; gender and class differences in migration and settlement; religion; identity formation; border enforcement; racism; and mass-media representation.

LAST 30100. Economic Development of Latin America

(3-0-3)

An examination of the roots of independence in Latin America. An analysis of the key problems of economic development and the policies prescribed for their solution.

LAST 30101. Global Economic History

(3-0-3)

The course presents a comparative economic history emphasizing the sources of long-term economic growth. The comparative analysis is used to explore different development strategies around the world over the past two centuries, from the British Industrial Revolution to the contemporary developing countries, focusing on examples from Europe, Latin America, and North America. Subjects include population change, migration, technological change, industrialization, market integration, education, inequality, and government expenditure. Each topic is discussed through a current economic policy concern. Special attention will be placed upon the role played by the natural resources endowments and institutional change. The last section of the course centers around the debates on globalization and inclusive development. Does going global foster growth? Who gains and who loses?

LAST 30102. Development Economics

(3-0-3)

The current problems of Third World countries are analyzed in a historical context, with attention given to competing theoretical explanations and policy prescriptions. The course will combine the study of the experiences of Latin American, African, and Asian countries with the use of the analytical tools of economics.

LAST 30150. Women in the Americas

(3-0-3)

A survey of a wide variety of literature (fiction, poetry, testimonio, personal essay, autobiography, critical essay, and oral history) and film written by and about women in the Americas from the time of conquest/encounter to the present.

LAST 30200. History of Modern Mexico

(3-0-3) Pensado

This course examines the complex nation that is Mexico in the 20th century, its challenges and its prospects. Focusing primarily on the period since 1870, we will study the social, economic, political, and cultural forces that have shaped the history of the United States's southern neighbor.

LAST 30201. Indigenous and Colonial Mexico

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the history of Mesoamerica from the Olmec, Mayan, and Aztec societies to Mexico's independence from Spain after 1800. It will examine the nature of several indigenous societies; their conquest and domination by Europeans; post-conquest debates concerning Indians' nature and colonial Indian policy; the structure of colonial society, including relations between Indians, Africans, and Europeans; Catholic conversions and the role of the Church; and finally, the causes of independence. We will use readings, lectures, discussions, archeological evidence, film, and literature throughout the course. Students need not have any background in Latin American history.

LAST 30202. The Emergence of Nations in Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course provides an introduction to the major themes of 19th-century Latin American history. It provides an overview of the colonial background to the independence struggle that engulfed the region in the early part of the century, describes the motivations, and in many cases, reluctance, of the colonies to disengage from the Spanish empire, and the legacies and opportunities for the construction of a new social, political, and economic order in the region. The course examines the influence of regionalism in the emergence of the new nations, and pays particular attention to the impact of liberalism on social, political, and economic structures in the region.

LAST 30203. History, Politics, and Society of Chile

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the formation and development of Chilean national society. The course begins by examining the colonial period and the struggle for independence. It then focuses on 19th- and 20th-century issues such as the consolidation of the central state, the development of democracy, the creation of the party and electoral systems, economic cycles of growth and stagnation, the breakdown of democracy in 1973, the Pinochet dictatorship, and the return to democracy in the 1990s. Class lectures and discussions will include relevant comparisons with other Latin American and even European countries.

LAST 30204. Survey of Latin American History
(3-0-3)

This course provides an introduction to the major themes of Latin American colonial history, including the discovery, conquest, and settlement of the New World; the institutional framework established by the Iberian countries to advance their economic, political, and religious interests in the region; and various aspects of Latin American society and culture until independence in the early 19th century.

LAST 30205. Modern Latin America
(3-0-3)

A survey of modern Latin American history.

LAST 30206. Inequalities in Latin American History
(3-0-3)

Any quick survey of contemporary Latin America quickly uncovers a glaring range of social inequalities. Sharp divides and diverging conditions separate individuals and groups along economic, political, ethnic, educational, and gender lines, to name a few. Although nearly all the Earth's societies exhibit social inequalities, Latin America's have proved particularly endemic, enduring, and intractable; they have fundamentally shaped the region's potential for democratic governance and economic development; they are also deeply rooted in the region's past. This course will begin by examining manifestations of social inequalities in the region today. We will then spend most of the semester tracing the roots of today's conditions through the region's history. Students need not have any background in Latin American history.

LAST 30207. Religion and Social Movements in Latin American History
(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is to give students an understanding of the role religion has played in Latin American history from the colonial period to the present. We will focus specifically on how religion mediates relations between culturally distinct peoples during points of encounter and the role it plays in social movements. Religion in Latin America served paradoxically as a means of and justification for conquest, but also at times as a foundation for subordinate people's resistance to domination. We will examine this dynamic as it evolved in successive efforts by outsiders to impose control over people of indigenous and African descent. The course will focus on Spanish proselytization and its results during the colonial period, millenarian movements by people of indigenous and African descent during the 19th century, and American Catholic and Protestant mission endeavors and their outcomes in the 20th century.

LAST 30208. Race and Nation in Latin American History
(3-0-3)

This course offers a critical analysis of the particular representations of race and nation as presented in film, art, and essays from the colonial to the current era in Latin America. Utilizing these materials, we will examine issues of independence, statehood, slavery, revolution, wealth, poverty, education, and gender in public culture.

LAST 30209. Colonial Latin America
(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32901

This course provides an introduction to the major themes of Latin American colonial history, including the discovery, conquest, and settlement of the New World; the institutional framework established by the Iberian countries to advance their economic, political, and religious interests in the region; and various aspects of Latin American society and culture until independence in the early 19th century.

LAST 30210. Chronicles of the Conquest of Latin America
(3-0-3)

This seminar examines key aspects of the conquest of Latin America through readings of chronicles and other texts written by Spaniards and Amerindians in the 15th–17th centuries. We will focus upon the ways in which Spaniards and Amerindians theorized and explained their experiences, and their representations of themselves and their “others.” In particular, we will pay attention to the beginnings of modern notions of race and ethnicity through discussions of barbarians, wildmen, and cannibals, among other “types” important to the colonial encounter.

LAST 30211. Andean History and Ethnohistory
(3-0-3) Graubart

Corequisite: HIST 32929

The Andean countries—the area occupied by the Inca State at the height of its power—are modern-day Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia, as well as the northern half of Chile and the northwest of Argentina. This region is marked by geographic extremes (snow-capped mountain ranges, arid deserts, rainforests, and lots of rocky terrain in between), as well as a complex and often violent political and social history. In this course, we will survey the ways that Andean peoples have adapted and contributed to the formation of their societies, from pre-Columbian civilizations, most notably the Inca, to the invasion of Europeans in the 16th century, to the modern states struggling with questions of political integration, economic development, and foreign intervention. Our readings will come, when possible, from primary sources, including archaeological artifacts and first-person accounts, to allow for an ethnohistorical approach to these complex cultures.

LAST 30212. United States Operations in Central America
(3-0-3) Pensado

As European countries furthered their economic penetration of Africa and Asia during the 19th century, the United States continued its westward expansion by extending its borders to the Pacific and securing its economic and political dominance throughout the Latin American hemisphere. This course examines the social, cultural, and political repercussions a broad range of U.S. operations had in Central America since the writing of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823 until the “fall of communism” in the late 1980s, including “Dollar Diplomacy,” CIA-sponsored coups, paramilitary training of “death squads,” and overt military occupations.

LAST 30301. Latin American Politics and Economic Development
(3-0-3)

During the past few decades, Latin America has undergone deep political and economic change. The patterns of political polarization and the implementation of import substitution industrialization models that characterized the region were altered by the emergence of bureaucratic authoritarian regimes. From the 1980s on, Latin American nations sought to reinstall democracy and promote economic development, yet the paths they followed to those ends have been quite diverse, as have their achievements. This course examines those divergent paths during the past four decades. After introducing students to some contextual information on the region, the course will examine the different roads to democratic breakdown, the emergence of authoritarian regimes, and the contrasting paths to re-democratization and development.

LAST 30302. International Relations of Latin America
(3-0-3)

This course is based on the commonly accepted assumption from theories of political realism that the United States successfully has exercised hegemony over the Western Hemisphere since the beginning of the 20th century. The first topic to be considered is what tactics were used to consolidate that hegemony and how the “face of hegemony” evolved during the 1900s up until the present day. This will involve an examination of the history of hemispheric relations with an emphasis on the political, economic, and cultural aspects of Washington's strategy. The examination assumes that great powers attempt to control the behavior of less powerful countries in their sphere of influence, and one should not be surprised to find such a situation. The second half of the semester deals with some discrete situations or issues within the hemisphere: economic integration efforts such as NAFTA, CAFTA, and MERCOSUR; the role of petroleum (particularly as regards Venezuela); the drug issue; developments relating to the U.S.-Mexican border; the long-standing Castro regime in Cuba; and the foreign policies of individual Latin American countries (particularly Brazil and Mexico). There will be two written examinations, plus a final one and one paper and/or class presentation.

LAST 30304. Politics and Violence in Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course examines the political, historical, and economic context of violence in Latin American countries, and the significance of violence in Latin American politics today.

LAST 30305. Current Events of Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes the main challenges that Latin America has tackled for the past few years. After introducing students to some basic concepts and contextual information on the region, the course explores the various social, economic, and political events that Latin American countries have confronted as well as the different ways in which they have responded to these challenges. The course also incorporates an analysis of some of the “unsolved” issues of the region, such as environmental protection and sustainable development, gender quality, and ethnic minority rights.

LAST 30306. Political Economy of Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes the political bases of the developmental and distributive strategies pursued by several Latin American countries in the post-World War II period, and the relationship between economic crises in the region and political change. Topics covered include the rise and fall of import-substituting industrialization, the economic stabilization and recovery policies undertaken by politically repressive regimes, and the challenges and opportunities presented to democratic governments in the 1980s and 1990s to implement a neo-liberal economic order.

LAST 30307. U.S.-Latin American International Relations

(3-0-3) Hagopian

This course examines the international relations of Latin America with an emphasis on what determines U.S. policy toward Latin America, and the policies of Latin American states toward the United States, other regions of the world, and each other. It analyzes recurring themes in U.S.-Latin American relations, including the response of the United States to dictatorships, expropriations of U.S.-owned property, and revolution. It also studies new directions and issues in Latin America's international relations, e.g., trade policy, the environment, migration, and drugs in a post-Cold War world.

LAST 30308. Latin American Politics

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to Latin American politics. Thematically, we will focus on two of the great issues facing this region of the world at the end of the 20th century: democratization and strategies for promoting economic development. After spending the first part of the course examining these two issues in a broad way, we will then analyze these same issues, but focused on Brazil, Chile, and Mexico.

LAST 30309. Latin American Development and Politics

(3-0-3)

Latin American countries face many challenges, some inherited from Spanish and Portuguese colonial rule, some created by today's globalization, and some common to all developing countries. This course examines to several Latin American countries have responded to the most important of these challenges: how to build a state that can maintain order at home and stay at peace with its neighbors; how to form legitimate governments that can pass needed laws; how to ensure that citizens have political rights and a say in the political process; how to promote industrialization and economic growth; and how to achieve a more equal distribution of wealth and ensure that basic human needs are met.

LAST 30311. Law and Democracy in Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course explores many of the challenges to the rule of law across Latin America, and their connection to democracy. We will begin by examining the relationship between law and democracy, then look at a series of issues that illustrate the strength or weakness of the rule of law in the region. Rather than focusing on one country at a time or a few countries in depth, we will use events and systems in various countries as illustrations of important themes. We will then look at the possible consequences of these challenges for democracy in the region, and possible solutions. The course materials will at times cover difficult and controversial topics such as violence, human rights violations, and corruption. By the end of the course, you will have acquired some basic information about Latin American legal systems and some basic concepts about the different ways courts work in that part of the world. More importantly, however, you will have a greater understanding of what a robust democracy should look like, and where different countries fall short. You should be able to engage in a discussion about the role courts and laws do play, should play, and can play in the (democratic) political systems of Latin America, and its potential for improvement.

LAST 30312. Politics and Development in Central America

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the impact that politics and politicians have had on development in Central America. It will begin with a discussion of the concept of development and how we attempt to measure it. It will then proceed to review the different approaches used to spur development and what conventional wisdom holds today to be the determinants of growth. After this, it will review the socio-economic indicators of Central America and how they have evolved with time. It will subsequently study how politics and politicians, through current constitutions, laws, institutions, political culture, and practice have affected the determinants of growth. It will close with a discussion of the changes needed to foster high, sustainable, and equitable growth in the region.

LAST 30314. Politics and Institutions in Latin America

(3-0-3) Wieschomeier

This course aims at enabling students to understand politics in the Latin American region by introducing important concepts of comparative politics and discussing, from a comparative perspective, institutional components and configurations of Latin American countries. We will focus on the question of how institutional frameworks influence policy decisions and actors' behavior; that is, how they affect governability and representation. The course will revolve around central issues such as electoral systems, party system, legislative decision making, and executive-legislative relations and representation. One important aspect of the course is to get students acquainted with quantitative indicators of comparative politics that not only help to map representation, but also to understand some puzzles of policy making we will encounter throughout Latin American countries. Thus, the course will help students to better understand democratic representation, as well as quantitative approaches to the study of democratic institutions.

LAST 30315. Globalization

(3-0-3) Hagopian

This course will examine the movement of money, goods, information, and cultural norms that are collectively known today as “globalization.” We will consider the “pros” and “cons” of the roles played by the institutions that enforce growing financial and trade integration and the international promotion by governments and transnational activists of democracy and human rights. It will also highlight the cultural reactions to globalization, including the resurgence of nationalism, ethnic identities, and religious fundamentalism. Special emphasis will be placed on contrasting the approach of the United States and other advanced industrial and developing countries.

LAST 30316. Law and Democracy in Latin America

(3-0-3) Brinks

Democracy and the rule of law seem to be the prescription for what ails the developing world. But they are harder to put into practice than they at first appear. This course explores many of the challenges to the rule of law across Latin America, and how they affect the quality of democracy in the region. We begin by examining the meaning of democracy and its relationship to the rule of law. Then we look at a series of issues that illustrate the strength or weakness of the rule of law in the region. We use academic writings primarily, but also movies, news reports, and statistical reports to examine topics such as violence and crime, human rights violations, judicial independence, and corruption. Rather than focusing on one country at a time or a few countries in depth, we will use events and systems in various countries as illustrations of important themes. We will then look at the possible consequences of these challenges for democracy in the region and possible solutions.

LAST 30400. Survey of Spanish American Literature I

(3-0-3) Anadon

A general introduction to and survey of major works of colonial and 19th-century literature up to modernism.

LAST 30401. Survey of Spanish American Literature II

(3-0-3) Anderson; Heller

A survey of literary trends and major figures in modern Spanish American literature from 1880 to the present. Readings of selected texts in prose, poetry, and theatre.

LAST 30402. Nations in Motion: Latino/Latina Literature in the United States

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on the analysis of literary works by Mexican American, Cuban American, Puerto Rican, and Dominican American authors. Some reading knowledge of Spanish recommended.

LAST 30500. Brazilian Short Story

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will study some of the finest short stories written by Brazilian authors from the 19th century to the present, with special emphasis on historical context, literary movements, and theoretical issues related to the genre. Authors studied include Machado de Assis, Graciliano Ramos, João Guimarães Rosa, Samuel Rawet, Érico Veríssimo, Rubem Fonseca, Clarice Lispector, Lygia Fagundes Telles, Nélida Piñon, Raduan Nassar, and Moacyr Scliar.

LAST 30501. When Empires Fall

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Offered in Portuguese, “When Empires Fall” examines contemporary Luso-Brazilian literature and historiography that explore major shifts in Portugal’s status from world power to semi-peripheral, European nation. We focus on responses to three major traumas: the end of the Luso-Brazilian empire in the early 1800s, the confrontation with Britain and the Ultimatum of 1890, and the fall of the African empire with the subsequent decolonization of 1974–75. The course seeks to evaluate the role that imperial decline plays as a theme in contemporary narrations of the nation, to investigate how literature contributes to interpretations of Portugal’s imperial past, and to study the interconnections between history, memory, and national identity. This course is designed for students pursuing a minor in Portuguese and Brazilian studies and/or for students pursuing a minor in Latin American studies.

LAST 30550. Chile in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3)

Students will learn about the Chilean political process since the 1930s, with a special emphasis on the period from 1964 to 2002. Students will analyze and discuss institutional, economic, social, and cultural changes that occurred during that period. Chilean politics, economics, and sociology will be addressed from a historical perspective.

LAST 30551. Global Sociology

(3-0-3)

The course is designed as a broad overview of sociological analysis that extends beyond traditionally accepted national and local boundaries. It provides a perspective on the discipline as one that seeks to understand human society as a nested collection of interdependent societies. In particular, the course draws from world systems theory and institutional approaches—as well as from related disciplines such as anthropology—to consider how the “development project” of the 20th century evolved over time. The impacts of global economic integration on cultural and institutional change, inequality, and on changing identities and forms of collective action (including social movements) are phenomena we explore in the course. The course is designed for students who simply want to learn how the World Bank, IMF, and United Nations are impacting the experiences of people around the world, as well as for those who expect to do further research in the field.

LAST 30600. From Power to Communion: Toward a New Way of Being Church Based on the Latin-American Experience

(3-0-3)

This seminar explores the present and the future of the Catholic Church, placing emphasis on how its future is foreshadowed in the growing ecclesial interdependence that exists between the churches of North and Latin America. Emphasis is placed on the growing involvement of the laity in Latin America and where this may lead the North American church. In a particular way, attention is given to the role of small Christian communities.

LAST 30601. Catholic Church for Medellín to Aparecida: An Evangelizing Option for the Poor

(3-0-3)

Medellín (1968) was the first General Conference of the Latin American Bishops after the Second Vatican Council. Medellín was a strong step forward in clarifying the role of the Latin Church. This course will explore the following question: Did Aparecida (the fifth General Conference) in Brazil 2007, rekindle the vision of Medellín?

LAST 30650. Mexican Photography

(3-0-3)

This course examines Mexican photography from the 19th century on to contemporary works. Theoretical issues pertaining to the histories of photography, with emphasis in documentary photography, photography as an art form, photojournalism, and photo manipulation are part of this course. Key films, such as Mala Hierba from 1940 and Canoa (1970), will be discussed in the context of the relation they have with still images. Photography and film will be situated to particular photographic moments and specific socio-cultural and political developments in Mexico. Critical questions on the role of photography in the formation of national narratives and the role of photographers in the life of art and culture will be addressed. Works by Romuldo García, Agustín Casasola, Manuel Álvarez Bravo, Nacho López, Lola Álvarez Bravo, Tina Modotti, Lourdes Grobet, Graciela Turbide, and other artists will be discussed.

LAST 30652. Creole Language and Culture

(1.5-0-1.5)

This course introduces students to the vivid, sonorous language of Kreyòl, or Creole, and to the fascinating culture of its speakers. This intensive, beginning-level course is intended for students with no knowledge of Creole. In small-group teaching sessions, students will be prepared for conversational fluency with basic reading and writing skills, emphasizing communicative competence as well as grammatical and phonetic techniques. Our study of Kreyòl is closely linked to our anthropological exploration of how the language is tied to Caribbean society and culture. The course takes a holistic, anthropological approach to the history, political economy, and religion of Haiti. In addition to class work, audiotapes, music, and film enhance the study of the Haitian language and culture.

LAST 30653. Migration, Documented

(1-0-1)

Students will examine issues of educational equity and achievement in the United States from 1950 to the present. The course begins by framing these issues in terms of social and cultural processes, using an anthropological perspective. Students then will examine issues of educational equity in relation to long-established patterns of social stratification by race, ethnicity, and class. The course will conclude with a discussion of equity in light of the nation's rapidly changing demographics.

LAST 30654. Caribbean Diasporas

(3-0-3) Richman

This course examines the development of Creole societies in the French, Spanish, Dutch, and British Caribbean in response to colonialism, slavery, migration, nationalism, and, most recently, transnationalism. The recent exodus of as much as 20 percent of Caribbean populations to North America and Europe has afforded the rise of new transnational modes of existence. This course will explore the consciousness and experience of Caribbean diasporas through ethnography and history, religion, literature, music, and culinary arts.

LAST 30725. Caribbean Historiography

(3-0-3)

This class will introduce students to major events in Caribbean history and the various ways in which these histories have been represented. This course will present a picture of the Caribbean very different from that held by many North Americans. For 500 years, this region has been the site of encounters and clashes among Native Americans, Europeans, Africans, and Asians. For three centuries Europe's leading states fought each other to control these islands, which were the most valuable real estate in the Atlantic world. At the same time Dutch, English, French, and Spanish colonists imported millions of enslaved men, women, and children from Africa to work on the sugar and coffee plantations that made the region so profitable for its masters. Supported by racism and colonialism, plantation slavery left its mark on the Caribbean long after emancipation and independence. We will be emphasizing recent, representative texts, monographs, and essays, but placing them in the context of early research.

LAST 30726. Anthropology of Race

(3-0-3)

While issues of race and racism are pervasive in our society, most people know surprisingly little about the social, biological, political, and historical factors at play. Race is simultaneously a very real social construct and a very artificial, biological one. How can this be? Why do we care so much about classifications/divisions of humanity? This course will tackle the anthropology of race from a critical perspective. We will learn about the biology of human difference and similarity, how societies view such similarities and differences, how our social and scientific histories create these structures, and why this knowledge is both extremely important and too infrequently discussed.

LAST 30727. Material Life of Africans in the Americas

(3-0-3)

This course will provide the student with a sampling of the diversity of experiences of people of African descent in the Americas as viewed from the archaeologist's and historical anthropologists' perspectives. Because the language of archaeology is material culture, we'll be exploring how people have used crafts, goods, and space to communicate and negotiate identities and relationships with one another in the contexts of colonization, the birth of new nations, industrialization, and modernization. The experiences of colonizers and colonized, enslaved people, and post-colonial immigrant peoples and their families will be discussed. Due to the breadth and diversity of the material to be covered, the course will have both a loosely chronological and topical structure, but will not adhere formally to either.

LAST 33100. Political Economy of Development

(3-0-3)

The course is divided into two parts. The first part provides an overview of the institutional and empirical features of the developing world, followed by a survey and critical evaluation of the conventional development theories. The second part looks into the selected topics evoking the critical, controversial stakes in Third World development debates today. The topics include rent-seeking activities, land tenure and peasantry, micro-financing, corporate governance, failed state and market failure, market and democracy, income distribution and poverty, feminism in development, ethnic conflicts in resource use, and population pressures. The approach taken in this course is a political-economy perspective with references to the historical, cross-cultural, and empirical materials. The course aims at providing the students with intellectual spaces for alternative development paradigms and strategies. Where appropriate, the tools used in economic analysis will be reviewed at an elementary and accessible level.

LAST 36500. Testimonials From Urban Brazil

(3-0-3)

This course, taught in Portuguese, explores contrasting images of social change in recent Brazilian literature and cinema. The focus is on attempts to give voice to the poor, the marginal, the rogue, and other agents of social change in urban Brazil. Course materials are drawn from fictional auto/biographies and diaries, street memoirs, documentary novels, crime stories, prisoners' accounts, films, and documentaries. Texts by Caio Fernando Abreu, Rubem Fonseca, Sebastião Uchoa Leite, Paulo Lins, João Gilberto Noll, Esmeralda do Carmo Ortiz, Moacyr Scliar, and others. Films by Cláudio Assis, Ana Carolina, Fernando Meirelles and Kátia Lund, Murilo Salles, and Walter Salles and Daniela Thomas. (Prerequisite: a 20000-level course in Portuguese or equivalent).

LAST 40000. Race, Ethnicity, and Power

(3-0-3)

Presents a review and discussion of social scientific research concerning the nature of race and ethnicity and their expression as social and cultural forces in the organization of multiethnic societies. The focus is multidisciplinary.

LAST 40001. Aesthetics of Latino Culture

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes the philosophy and principles underlying the social and political aspects of Latino art.

LAST 40002. Latino Image in American Films

(3-0-3)

This course traces the historical depiction of Chicanos, Mexicanos, Puerto Ricans, Cubans, and other Latinos in Hollywood-made movies. Cinematic plots, roles, and motifs from the earliest of silent films through the onset of the 1980s are examined to explore the changing physical, social, and cultural definitions of Latinos in the United States. All films and filmmakers are considered within their historical context. Though the main object of study is the Latino image, the course also surveys corresponding images for other ethnic minority groups.

LAST 40003. Human Rights in Latin America

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ANTH 10109 OR ANTH 109) OR (ANTH 30104 OR ANTH 326 OR ANTH 326A) OR (ANTH 30103 OR ANTH 328 OR ANTH 328A)

This course takes the concept of international human rights as the framework to explore contemporary cultural, economic, and political debates about identity, culture, and society in Latin America. We will review the civil and political rights, the social and economic rights, and the indigenous people's rights of the International Declaration of Human Rights through ethnographic case studies. For example, we will explore (1) freedom of speech in Chile and review the report of the findings of the Truth Commission; (2) indigenous people's rights in Colombia and learn about the Afro-Colombian movements for ancestral lands; and (3) social and economic rights in Guatemala and current efforts to implement socio-economic recommendations of the Commission for Historical Clarification. In each area, we will specifically address the role of anthropology, the American Anthropological Association's human rights declaration, and the unique contribution anthropologists can make to international efforts to understanding human rights.

LAST 40004. Multiculturalism

(3-0-3)

The course explores the economic, state, and national conditions of multiculturalism as a social relation and semiotic form. Seminal questions include the issues of difference deployed in debates over multiculturalism and anthropology's location in them as a study of human diversity.

LAST 40006. Cultural Memory

(3-0-3)

Looking at examples from around the world through readings, films, slides, recordings, and other media, we will consider a variety of strategies humans use to instill a sense of socially and culturally shared memory, including ritual; performative traditions such as dance and theater; written and oral histories; art and literature; media and popular culture; museums and monuments; science and technology (particularly archaeology, craft productions, and ecology); and certain aspects of everyday life, such as food, clothing, jokes, and the transference of knowledge.

LAST 40007. Cultural Difference and Social Change

(3-0-3)

This course is designed especially for students returning from summer service projects or study abroad programs in the developing world. Students can only enroll with the permission of the instructor. In the class, students will conduct research to better understand the sites that they visited during their overseas projects, orienting them in relation to broader global, regional, and national patterns. Course readings will cover such topics as world systems theory, globalization, development, NGOs, various understandings of "human rights," applied anthropology, activism, and the relation between cultural relativism and service. Students will develop three collaborative websites during the semester (although each student will receive individual grades for their work). These collective projects will present the student's own research interests based on their overseas experience, and will focus on the site where they worked, a problem that they observed in cross-cultural perspective, and an analysis of strategies for redressing this sort of problem. The overall goal of the course will be for students to gain an understanding of how social science analysis might help to understand and confront problems in cross-cultural contexts.

LAST 40008. Archaeology of Catholic Missions

(3-0-3)

The Catholic Church has sponsored missions for centuries. As colonial forces seeking land, labor, and resources spread European influence across the globe, Catholic missions became a global phenomenon that continues to this very day. This course is designed to look at Catholic missions in the "New World" (North and South America) during the colonial period using historical and material evidence. The course will take a comparative approach by studying missions in different geographic and cultural areas, and in different colonial contexts. Historical sources are used to contextualize how Catholicism and missionary activities were a part of broader colonial endeavors. Material evidence is used to tell us about day-to-day activities and local living conditions, as well as how missions affected the lives of local native populations. In this course, we will attempt to use historical and material sources in tandem to learn more about these institutions than either type of source could provide alone.

LAST 40009. Race, Ethnicity, and Power

(3-0-3)

This course explores race and ethnicity as biological, social, legal, and cultural constructs and lived experiences. Its underlying objective is to understand how relations of power affect racial and ethnic affiliations, categorizations, and experiences. Rather than merely learning a collection of facts on specific racial and ethnic groups, we will examine race and ethnicity as they intersect with dynamics of social class, gender, mass media representation, racism, immigration, and everyday life in urban settings. We will focus on the diversity of U.S. recent, real life experiences—from problems of inequality to the flourishing of "ethnic" food and music—but also look at postcolonial and European locales. This will enable us to compare racial and ethnic understandings, practices, and identities across geopolitical settings, and in global and transnational context.

LAST 40150. Icons and Active Figures in Latino/a Literature

(3-0-3)

Understanding U.S. Latino/a literature, art, and film through its many allusions to and representations of traditional icons and historic figures as well as legends, myths, popular figures, and action heroes/heroines of the Americas (including those with origins in Native American, Latino/a, African, Asian, and European cultures).

LAST 40151. Latino/a Poetry

(3-0-3)

A study of prominent contemporary Latino/a poets whose work has enriched and diversified the canon of American poetry in the last 20 years.

LAST 40152. Literatures Across the Americas

(3-0-3)

A survey of literatures written by English- and Spanish-speaking peoples from the late-16th century to the mid-19th century.

LAST 40153. Literatures of the American Hemisphere

(3-0-3)

National borders mark our Americas today, but for the first European explorers the landscapes of their "new world" were uncharted and unbounded. The newly encountered land invited utopian dreams even as it became the arena for genocidal violence. To reconsider these moments of violence and possibility, we will approach early American literature intra-hemispherically, reading not just from the British colonial record, but also from Spanish documents in English translation. We will read comparatively in order to ask key questions about American identity, both then and now. For example, what do we learn when we juxtapose Cortés's invasion of the Mexican empire to King Philip's War in the New England colonies? To what degree do these legacies of imperialism still shape our modern world? What comparisons arise between the poetry of Anne Bradstreet and Sor Juana Inés de La Cruz; between the captivity adventures of Cabeza de Vaca and Mary Rowlandson? How might these contact points continue to shape our views of "others"? How have native nations across the Americas written or spoken the loss of worlds? The authors and subjects noted above will serve as key markers, but we will also read primary works by William Bradford, Bernal Díaz, John Smith, William Apress, and others as we reconsider the literatures and histories of the Americas in a cross-national paradigm. Students will be expected to write three short papers, take a final exam, and participate actively in class.

LAST 40200. Technology and Development in History

(3-0-3)

Technologies are often seen as either the product of human genius and achievement, or as an alienating, inhuman, and sometimes destructive force. Both perspectives argue that technological change has been one of the most important forces shaping world history over recent centuries. This course examines technological developments and theories of technological change in world history. It focuses on the relationship between new technologies, social change, and economic development since 1750, surveying cases from Britain, the United States, China, Japan, and Latin America. We will pay special attention to technology transfers: the movement of new machines and processes and knowledge from one society to another; and the ways that social, cultural, and political forces have shaped technological change in different parts of the world.

LAST 40201. Global Development in Historical Perspective

(3-0-3)

The difference between rich and poor nations is not, as Ernest Hemingway once said, that the rich have more money than the poor, but is in part because the rich produce more goods and services. Industrialization, in other words, has often brought wealth (as well as social dislocation and protest) to those who have succeeded. This course examines the process of industrialization from a comparative perspective and integrates the history of industrialization and its social consequences for Western Europe (Britain and Germany), the United States, Latin America (Mexico), and East Asia (Japan and South Korea). We will concentrate on these countries' transition from agriculture-based societies to industrial societies. We will analyze the process of industrialization on two levels: from above, the role of political authority; and from below, a view of factory life, industrial relations, and protest from the perspective of workers and the working classes. No specific prerequisites in history or economics are necessary.

LAST 40202. Seminar: Coffee/Sugar/Other Goods

(3-0-3)

Between their origin in the earth and their ultimate destination in our bodies, coffee, sugar, and other addictive commodities (such as tobacco, cacao, tea, opium, cocaine, and perhaps oil) have had profound effects on world history. In all cases, their production, processing, distribution, and consumption have been intertwined with the historical development of individuals, peoples, nations, and international relations. Growing consumption has profoundly altered the social, economic, and environmental history of producing countries, with especially profound impact on those individuals whose labor brings them from the earth. And in all cases, most of the world's supply of such commodities comes from relatively poor regions while consumption is centered in the relatively wealthy, industrialized nations. The course introduces students to the broad outlines of the history of comparative commodities through class readings and discussions. Students will then conduct research on an approved topic related to a specific commodity or theme that examines one aspect of the role of a commodity in world history. Course requirements include the submission of a bibliography, a thesis statement, a first draft, and a 25-page research paper.

LAST 40204. Gender, Sexuality, and Colonization in Latin America

(3-0-3) Graubart

In this course we will examine the historical construction of gendered roles in the Spanish colonial world. This will entail thinking about gender in the societies that "encountered" each other in the New World, and also thinking about how that encounter produced new forms of gendered relations. Among the questions we will consider: How was the conquest gendered? How did colonial society produce masculinity as well as femininity? What gendered forms of power were available to women? How did ethnicity and caste, as well as gender, determine people's sense of themselves and their "others"? The course will look at a mixture of primary and secondary materials, including letters and chronicles written by men and women, testimony before the Spanish Inquisition, poetry, and novels. While there are no prerequisites for this seminar, some familiarity with colonial Latin American history will be helpful.

LAST 40205. Experience of Conquest in Mesoamerica

(3-0-3) Fernandez-Armesto

Experience of Conquest explores Native American perceptions of and relations with Spaniards in 16th-century Mesoamerica.

LAST 40400. Studies in Latin-American Colonial Literature

(3-0-3)

An in-depth study of a particular theme, author, or genre in colonial Latin-American literature.

LAST 40401. Mexican Literature

(3-0-3)

Combines an overview of the historical development of prose, poetry, and theatre in Mexico, with a close look at special problems and issues in Mexican literature.

LAST 40402. Film/Latin American Imagery

(3-0-3)

A survey of the development of the short-story genre in Spanish America. Close readings of works by representative authors.

LAST 40403. Spanish American Poets of the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3) Heller

This course will focus on the principal trends of Spanish America lyrical production through close readings of poetry from the avant-garde to the present.

LAST 40404. Argentine Narrative

(3-0-3)

This course may cover an in-depth study of a particular author, theme, genre, or century. In addition to treating primary texts, some critical material will be required reading. The course culminates in a substantial research paper. May be taken either fall or spring term.

LAST 40405. Spanish American Short Story

(3-0-3) Ibsen

This course considers the issue of Latin American identity through a variety of media, including film, literature, and popular culture. Focus may be on a particular region or genre.

LAST 40406. Seminar: Selvas, llanos y otro

(3-0-3)

This course may cover an in-depth study of a particular author, theme, genre, or century. In addition to treating primary texts, some critical material will be required reading. The course culminates in a substantial research paper. May be taken either fall or spring term.

LAST 40408. Film and the Latin American Imagery

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: LAST 41408

This course considers the issue of Latin American identity through films from various national traditions, including Cuba, Chile, Mexico, and Brazil. Class discussions consider how shared cultural elements are represented in Latin American film and how these representations challenge assumptions about identity politics.

LAST 40409. Topics in Colonial Latin American Literature

(3-0-3)

An in-depth study of a particular theme, author, or genre in colonial Latin American literature.

LAST 40411. Does This Nation Have a Woman's Face?

(3-0-3)

A study of the national imaginary depicted in 19th-century Spanish American fictional prose and essays. Special attention will be given to gender issues and historical events.

LAST 40412. Topics in Spanish American Poetry

(3-0-3)

A survey of the development of the short-story genre in Spanish America. Close readings of works by representative authors.

LAST 40413. Spanish American Literature: Borges y Cortazar

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the short narrative (short story and novellas) of 20th-century authors Jorge Luis Borges and Julio Cortazar. The emphasis will be on close readings of the texts along with recent developments in critical theory.

LAST 40415. Studies in Latin American Colonial Literature

(3-0-3)

An in-depth study of a particular theme, author, or genre in colonial Latin American literature.

LAST 40419. Beyond the Islands: Latino/a Caribbean Literature and Culture

(3-0-3) Moreno

This course examines the literary and cultural production of Latinos/as from the Spanish-speaking Caribbean. Issues of migration, transnationalism, and transculturation will be explored through the analysis of texts by Puerto Rican, Cuban American, and Dominican American authors. From Loisaida to Washington Heights to Calle 8, Latinos/as from the Spanish-speaking Caribbean have become a strong cultural presence across the United States. Like other minorities in the United States, the centuries-old history of Caribbean Latino settlement in this country has been recorded in the literature and cultural production of this group. In this course, we will examine literary works and other artistic expressions (film, music, etc.) by Puerto Rican, Cuban American, and Dominican American authors and artists. We will also examine precursor texts from Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Dominican Republic, which offer representations of the immigrant experience from an island-centered perspective. Readings from various disciplines such as history, sociology, and anthropology will help students understand the reasons behind the massive movements of peoples from the Hispanic Caribbean to the United States, as well as their current conditions in their new homeland. Issues of migration, transnationalism, transculturation, gender, and racial and class discrimination will be central to our discussions. Some of the authors studied include Jose Luis Gonzalez, Pedro Juan Soto, Pedro Pietri, Piri Thomas, Lino Novas Calvo, Gustavo Perez Firmat, Cristina Garcia, Junot Diaz, and Julia Alvarez. Texts discussed will be in Spanish and/or English. There will be several short essays, a final paper, a midterm and a final exam. Knowledge of Spanish is required. Class discussions and written work will be in Spanish.

LAST 40420. Women's Narrative in the Southern Cone

(3-0-3)

This course designed as a seminar for upper-level Spanish students aims to critically analyze some of the most important narrative texts by twentieth-century Argentine, Chilean and Uruguayan women authors. Some of the writers to be studied include Somers, Geel Guido, Peri-Rossi, Mercado, Eltit, and Valenzuela, among others. Our readings of the selected works will be informed by the social and political circumstances of their time, which will enable us to understand the emergence of feminine subjectivities and their fictional representations. Concepts of gender, sex, and sexuality will be central to our discussions. Thus, theoretical and critical texts on feminism will also be included.

LAST 40421. Self, Family, Nation: Insular and Hispanic Caribbean Women Writers

(3-0-3) Moreno

This course focuses on the literature of Hispanic Caribbean women authors in the islands and in the United States. By contrasting the works of recent and more established authors from Puerto Rico, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and their counterparts in the United States, we'll explore the construction of gender and sexuality from a Caribbean feminist perspective. Some of the texts that this course will examine include: In the Time of the Butterflies by Julia Alvarez, Papi by Rita Indiana, When I was Puerto Rican by Esmeralda Santiago, Maldito amor by Rosario Ferré, and Dreaming in Cuban by Cristina García.

LAST 40422. Modernization in Latin America: Urban Changes, Technology and Desires at the Turn of the Last Century

(3-0-3)

This course designed as a seminar for upper-level Spanish students aims to critically analyze some of the major transformations of Latin America at the time of its entrance in the world market (1875–1910). Focusing on the dramatic transformations of space—urban changes—and of time—the popular knowledge and use of modern technology—we will study how literature responds to these major changes, at the same time that it proposes ways to articulate the new Latin American sensitivity. Writes such as Cuban José Martí, Nicaraguan Rubén Darío, Argentine Leopoldo Lugones, Uruguayans José Enrique Rodó, Julio Herrera y Reissig, and Delmira Agustini, among others, will enable us to reflect on the thoughts of Latin American intellectuals regarding the advantages and disadvantages of modernization as well as their ideas on the different development of the two Americas at a pivotal time in their history. Concepts of nationalism, subjectivities, and gender will be part of our discussions. Thus, theoretical and critical texts on these subjects will also be included.

LAST 40423. Literature and Popular Culture in Modern Cuba

(3-0-3) Anderson

In this class, we will study a number of aspects of popular culture in the modern Cuban literature.

LAST 40500. Luso-Brazilian Literature and Society

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on questions of national identity in the Luso-Brazilian world. We will examine how social and cultural issues are perceived, conceptualized, represented, and understood in and by literature. The course will pay particular attention to how literature depicts important human problems such as gender and race relations, the crafting of national identity and national heroes, class conflict, family structure, and some ideological values such as success, love, happiness, fairness, misfortune, destiny, honesty, equality, and faith. Authors to be studied will include Manuel Antonio de Almeida, Machado de Assis, Jorge Amado and Guimarães Rosa, on the Brazilian side, and Miguel Torga, Jo de Melo, Jose Saramago, and Lydia Jorge, on the Portuguese side. Conducted in English with readings in Portuguese or English (discussion group available in Portuguese). Requirements will include active class participation, two oral presentations, and two papers.

LAST 40501. Short Fiction of the Portuguese-Speaking World

(3-0-3)

This is a comparative study of short prose fiction in the Portuguese-speaking world, with special emphasis on theoretical issues related to this literary genre. Authors studied include Machado de Assis, Joso Guimarães Rosa, Clarice Lispector, Mario de Sa-Carneiro, and Luandino Vieira. Texts and discussions in English.

LAST 40502. Immigrant Voices/Contemporary Brazilian Literature

(3-0-3)

This course examines literary perspectives on the European and non-European immigrant experience in Brazil. Readings from literature, literary and cultural theory, cultural studies, history, and anthropology. Authors studied include Moacyr Scliar, Samuel Rawet, Nelda Pion, and Milton Hatoum. Texts and discussions in English.

LAST 40503. Dictatorships in Lusophone Fiction and Film

(3-0-3)

This course explores the role of the dictator as painted in popular fiction and film production.

LAST 40504. Colonialism Revisited

(3-0-3)

With readings from Angola, Mozambique, Brazil, and Portugal, this course examines colonialism and its aftermath in Africa in light of postcolonial fiction and contemporary sociological and anthropological writing from the Lusophone world. This course brings the Lusophone experience, with its important varieties, yet overlooked implications, into broader debates in the field of postcolonial studies. Course conducted in English with readings in Portuguese and /or English.

LAST 40505. Brazilian Cinema and Popular Music

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This course offers social, cultural, and historical perspectives on Brazil through film and popular music.

LAST 40506. Carnival in Cinema and Literature

(3-0-3)

Brazil, the largest South American country, has tantalized our imagination with the images of Samba and Carnival. As Brazilian anthropologist Roberto DaMatta asserts, Carnival creates a festival out of the everyday social world in which there is no emphasis on the harsh rules that govern membership and identity. This course will offer an exploration of Brazilian culture by investigating the ways in which the celebrations of Carnival have been viewed, articulated, and unsettled by film and literature. Along with major films, documentaries, and literary works, we will examine contemporary sociological and anthropological writing that contributes to our understanding of Carnivals within and beyond Brazil. We will learn how key issues in Brazilian society (race and gender relations, national identity, rituals and symbols, values and social roles) play out in Carnival. Course offered in English.

LAST 40507. Fictions of the South Atlantic

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Taught in English, this seminar offers a comparative study of 19th-, 20th-, and 21st-century fiction writing in the Lusophone South Atlantic, particularly exploring the historical connections and the cultural links between Brazil and Angola.

LAST 40550. Religion and Power in Latin America

(3-0-3)

The cultural dimension of religion and the institutional building abilities present in religious communities are building new power sources for religions in the present Latin American context. Taking the experience of Peru, we will look at Latin American recent processes in the religious domain. The course will describe the changing conditions of the Catholic Church in Latin America and the new situation of religious pluralism produced by the growing presence of evangelical groups and Pentecostalism. We will look at the impact of religion in the empowerment of people from below, and its relation to new social movements, as well as to the institutionalization of power at the state level in the new context of globalization.

LAST 40551. International Migration and Human Rights

(3-0-3) Bustamante

This course is an extension from the mini-course to a full term offered by Prof. Bustamante, with a wider coverage of international migration experiences in the world with an emphasis on human rights. It starts with a historical approach to various immigration waves to the United States, from the years of the Industrial Revolution to the present. It focuses on the current debate on the impact of the undocumented immigration from Mexico and Central America, with a discussion of the gap between public perceptions and research findings. Differences between Mexico and the United States's migration policies, and its social and economic implications, are discussed. The recent developments within the context of the United Nations' Commission of Human Rights on the relationship between migration and human rights are also covered.

LAST 40552. Social Transformations and Democratic Chile

(3-0-3)

This course provides a comprehensive view of the social, cultural, and political transformations that have taken place in Chile since 1990. These transformations have been effected by the consolidation of democracy and the rapid pace of economic growth and modernization in the country. The course draws comparisons to the same processes that have occurred in recent years in Central and Eastern Europe.

LAST 40553. Ideology and Politics in Latin America

(3-0-3)

Ideological discourse shapes political action in Latin America. Thinkers such as Mart, Maritegui, Haya de la Torre, Lombardo Toledano, Mella, Recabarren, Prebish, Medina Echavarrá, Germani, Cardoso, and others and their discourses—nationalism, revolutionary nationalism, Latin American Marxism, developmentalism, modernization theory, dependency theory, and democratization—acted within specific historical contexts and contributed actively to the conformation of political action. It is our purpose to present the main ideological positions and their impact upon political action in the continent. Their constituent elements conform a unity we will discuss on the basis of lectures, reading of the texts, and debates presented by teams of students. The course is divided into 21 sessions (including the three reading exams and four debates). For each session, we indicate required readings. The final paper is to be presented on the last session of the course, together with the third reading exam.

LAST 40554. Building Democratic Institutions in First-Wave Democracies

(3-0-3) Valenzuela

Elements of democratic regimes emerged long before the regimes as such can be identified as being minimally in place. Beginning with a brief discussion of the essential features of democracies, the course examines how and why such institutions emerged, and the critical moments in which the actual transitions to the new democratic regimes occurred. The course focuses on democratizations that took place before the Second World War, and will examine key European and Latin American cases.

LAST 40650. Mexican Immigration: A South Bend Case Study

(3-1-4) Richman

This course uses experiential learning in the Mexican community of South Bend in order to understand how Mexican migrants conduct their lives across the vast distances separating South Bend and their homeland. The course begins with readings in social science and fiction about transnationalism, Mexican-U.S. migration and the history and sociology of the local community. Next, we learn ethical fieldwork methods in preparation for community research. Students working in two-person teams will gather data on local and transnational households and kin networks, political involvement, employment, consumption practices, cultural activities, and religious life, working through contacts with social service agencies, the Mexican consulate, and Mexican- or Latino-run media, businesses, food stores, and sports leagues. We will document the innovative adaptations of this migrant community, especially the growth of an ethnic enclave of small businesses that both unite Mexicans as an ethnic group and sustain their ties to their homeland. We intend to compile the research in a volume published by Latino studies to be given to those who shared their lives with us and to entities that are committed to helping them.

LAST 40651. Migration, Markets, and Entrepreneurship

(3-0-3)

This course combines methodological tools from business and anthropology for analyzing the impact of migration movements on local socio-economic conditions and on the markets and the economy. This joint approach will focus on the study of the economic, social and cultural dimensions of Mexican migration—the largest contemporary source of migration to the United States—with a particular emphasis on two economic aspects, namely (1) entrepreneurial traits and skills of the migrant population, and (2) the pattern and level of remittances by the migrant sector residing in the United States. The course also considers how transnational social, cultural, political, and religious networks and institutions affect and are affected by Mexicans' activities as workers, consumers, entrepreneurs, and general economic agents. The course will examine the following topics: the role of remittances in the Mexican economy; local business partnerships between migrant organizations and the state; Mexican transnational households' financial structure; characteristics of the Mexican migrant labor force; consumption patterns and savings behavior; and the study of a Latino/Hispanic market segment in the United States that includes the production and/or sales of Mexican products, special advertising, and promotion techniques specifically targeted for that market. Comparative case studies of entrepreneurs based in central Mexico and those of Mexican immigrants in the U.S. Midwest complete the course and seek to understand how these economic agents and community leaders build economic, social, and cultural capital in the context of the communities where they reside.

LAST 40997. Colonialism Revisited

(3-0-3)

With readings from Angola, Mozambique, Brazil, and Portugal, this course examines colonialism and its aftermath in Africa in light of postcolonial fiction and contemporary sociological and anthropological writing from the Lusophone world. This course brings the Lusophone experience, with its important varieties, yet overlooked implications, into broader debates in the field of postcolonial studies. Course conducted in English with readings in Portuguese and /or English.

LAST 41408. Film and the Latin American Imagery

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: LAST 40408

This course considers the issue of Latin American identity through films from various national traditions, including Cuba, Chile, Mexico, and Brazil. Class discussions consider how shared cultural elements are represented in Latin American film and how these representations challenge assumptions about identity politics.

LAST 43150. Seminar: Latino/a Literature

(3-0-3)

Close readings of several seminal works of 20th-century Latino/a literature.

A course designed for students who have completed EALJ 20212 or its equivalent. Students will build on their acquisition of the four basic language skills: reading, writing, speaking, and listening.

EALJ 30312. Third-Year Japanese II

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: EALJ 30311

Development of oral-aural skills with an emphasis on typical conversational situations. Improvement of reading and writing skills.

EALJ 40411. Fourth-Year Japanese

(3-0-3) Scott

This is a course for students who have completed third-year Japanese or its equivalent. Students will build on their acquisition of the four basic language skills—reading, writing, speaking and listening. Approximately 100 new kanji compounds will be introduced. Conversational skills include making travel plans and reservations, describing physical ailments, and discussing complaints and problems with a host family. This course covers parts of Chapters 10–12 in Chukyuu No Nihongo (An Integrated Approach to Japanese), supplemented with authentic materials such as newspaper articles, video clips, and songs.

EALJ 40421. Advanced Japanese I

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: EALJ 40412 OR EALJ 30312

Advanced Japanese is a three-credit course for students who have completed EALJ 30312 or 40412. This course takes students beyond the grammar-centered approach of textbooks to the study and discussion of original materials produced in Japanese for everyday Japanese consumption. Course materials include excerpts from short stories, poetry, letters, social criticism, academic writing, newspaper articles, and video clips. Students may repeat the course more than once, as the content of the course changes according to the needs and interests of the students enrolled.

EALJ 45498. EALJ Internship: Nanzan Student Internship

(0-V-V)

In this course, exchange students from Nanzan University will serve as peer tutors in a variety of capacities for the Japanese language program.

EALJ 47498. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

This course takes students beyond textbook Japanese by introducing original materials created for Japanese audiences (literature, current events, video materials, etc.) Emphasis is on grammar and syntax, vocabulary building, speaking, reading, and writing.

EALK 10111. First-Year Korean I

(5-0-5) Lee

Prerequisite: EALK 10112

Korean 20211 is the first semester of an Intermediate course on spoken and written Korean. It is catered for learners who have taken First-Year Korean or have prior knowledge of Korean language and culture. It is designed to continue building students' language skills with emphasis on enhancing the speaking ability, writing skills, and usage of more complex constructions. Hence, classroom activity and assignments will be designed and conducted with the main purpose of facilitating students' learning process. Furthermore, the medium of instruction will be in Korean and students are expected to use the target language as much as they can throughout the course. There will be nine lessons covered during fall semester, with supplementary activities relevant to each lesson. Moreover, approximately 90 Chinese characters will be introduced for the achievement of basic literacy.

EALK 20212. Second-Year Korean II

EALK 22211. Second-Year Korean I Lab

(0-0-0)

Corequisite: EALK 20211

This course is the corequisite lab for EALK 20211, the intermediate course on spoken and written Korean.

EALK 40422. Advanced Korean for Heritage Students

(3-0-3)

This course is designed for students who have previous exposure to Korean. The target audience is students who can speak Korean fluently but are not able to read and write at the same level. During the first one third of the semester we will cover important Korean grammar points (e.g., verb conjugation, noun-modifying forms, honorific expressions, etc.). The rest of the semester, then, we will read advanced materials (e.g., newspapers, articles) on various topics in Korean culture, society and politics, and discussion will follow. Toward the end of the semester, students are asked to do a short presentation on Korea in a formal setting. Throughout the course reading, writing, and formal speech will be emphasized

EALK 47498. Special Studies Korean

(1-0-1)

Requires “contractual agreement” with the professor prior to scheduling. For advanced students who wish to pursue an independent research project reading Korean language materials.

LLEA 13186. Literature University Seminar

(1-0-3)

An introduction to the study of East Asian literature. The course will focus on either Chinese or Japanese literature.

LLEA 20101. Introduction to Chinese Civilization and Culture

(3-0-3)

This is a survey course that introduces the students with little or no knowledge of the Chinese language or culture to the major aspects of Chinese cultural tradition from the dawn of its civilization to the present time. Readings (in English translation) include traditional Chinese historical, philosophical, political, religious, and literary texts, as well as modern scholarship. Students are encouraged to bring in their experience, living or reading, of Western culture in order to approach the Chinese texts from a comparative perspective. This course will use a combination of lectures, discussion, and presentation by students. Movie documentaries will also be used from time to time. Reading assignments should be done before the lectures and in the sequence as they are given in the course schedule for each class so that the students may be ready for discussion in class. Whereas their amount and level of difficulty vary, the texts always demand careful and thoughtful reading.

LLEA 20105. Introduction to Korea and Korean Culture

(3-0-3)

This introductory course is designed for students without extensive prior knowledge of Korea or Korean culture. Diverse aspects of Korea such as natural environment, history, religion, family relations, thought, literature, and arts will be surveyed. Through this course, students will gain a greater appreciation and knowledge of Korean culture and literature, allowing them to engage in more advanced, in-depth study in subsequent semesters. The contemporary culture of Korea will be an important focus of the course, enriching students understanding of Korean society and culture today.

LLEA 20106. Modern Korean Literature and Drama in Translation

(3-0-3)

This course aims to provide basic understanding of modern Korean literature and drama. In this class, we will first briefly survey the history of Korean literature from 2,000 years ago, till now. Then we will select a few important literary texts to read. Through this lecture, students will be able to understand the various forms and contents, and important themes of Korean literature, through which deeper understanding of the lives and thoughts of the Korean people will be possible. Also, students will watch Korean TV dramas, popular in Korea and abroad, and through it have a chance to see and understand various aspects of Korean life. Through this introductory course, students will be prepared for a more in-depth study of Korean literature and culture.

LLEA 20107. Understanding Korean Culture: Yesterday and Today

(3-0-3)

This course aims to help students to understand Korean society and culture. Starting from its unique historical background, students will explore and discuss various aspects of Korea such as religion, thoughts, literature, politics, arts, life styles and pop culture (“Korean Wave”) throughout the course. The in-depth examination of traditional features will guide students to extensive understanding of contemporary phenomena in Korea. Lecture-based teaching format will be enriched by a variety of supplementary channels such as movies, documentaries, and invited speakers in the field.

LLEA 23101. Chinese Literary Traditions

(3-0-3)

A survey course introducing students to the major themes and genres of Chinese literature through selected readings of representative texts.

LLEA 23301. Masterpieces of Japanese Literature

(3-0-3)

This course is a survey of Japanese poetry, fiction, and drama from the earliest times through the 20th century. All texts are in English, and no special knowledge of Japan or Japanese is required. The course is divided into four units. We will begin with the development of court poetry (waka) as found in the Manyoshu (Collection of 10 Thousand Leaves) and the first Imperial Anthologies, followed by episodes from the Tales of Ise, and selected chapters from Murasaki Shikibu’s masterpiece of courtly love, The Tale of Genji (ca. A.D. 1000). In addition to social and historical factors influencing the development of a courtly aesthetic, we will also consider the influential role played by Buddhism and Chinese literature. In the second unit, we will look at how Japanese literature developed under the patronage of the samurai aristocracy during Japan’s “medieval” period (12TH–16th centuries) with readings of Noh plays, linked verse (renga) and philosophical essays such as An Account of My Hut and Essays in Idleness. For the third unit, we move to the early modern period with the haiku poetry of Basho, short stories by Saikaku (“Five Women Who Loved Love”), and The Love Suicides at Amijima, a play by Chikamatsu Monzaemon. For the last unit, we will read a selection of modern stories and plays.

LLEA 30101. Chinese Ways of Thought

(3-0-3)

This lecture and discussion course on the religion, philosophy, and intellectual history of China introduces the student to the world view and life experience of Chinese as they have been drawn from local traditions, as well as worship and sacrifice to heroes, and the cult of the dead. Through a close reading of primary texts in translation, it also surveys China’s grand philosophical legacy of Daoism, Buddhism, “Confucianism” and “Non-Confucianism,” and the latest religious accommodations of Christianity and Islam.

LLEA 30280. International Relations in East Asia

(3-0-3)

This course explores the interactions of the states and societies in the East Asian region, focusing mainly on the relationships of China and Japan, their interactions with each other and with the outside “Asian” powers, the United States and Russia (Soviet Union). Topics include: the China-centered system in east Asia prior to the intrusion of the new world system carried by western imperialism; the Western impact, including colonialism, the Chinese revolution, and Japan’s “defensive modernization”; the clash between Japanese and Chinese nationalism; the diplomacy of the Second World War and postwar developments; the cold war; decolonization and the emergence of new states and nationalism; the Sino-Soviet rift; the failure of the American policy of deterrence in Vietnam; the diplomatic reconciliation of the United States and China; the liberal reforms in China and their partial disappointment; the end of the cold war; China’s growth as a potential world power; Japan’s perhaps increasing restiveness in serving as an American surrogate; Asian assertiveness against perceived American hegemonic aspirations; potential tensions and rivalries within the region itself; and the collapse of the Asian economic boom and the onset of a period of chronic economic troubles. Specific readings have yet to be decided. Course requirements include assigned readings and class participation; a midterm and final examination; and completion of two brief research papers dealing with the foreign policy of one of the “smaller” Asian countries (that is, one of the countries other than China and Japan).

LLEA 30465. Chinese Politics

(3-0-3)

Study of the contemporary Chinese political system and process in the light of Chinese history and culture. Some of the topics treated include the traditional political order; the revolutionary movements; the rise of communism; Maoism and the rejection of Maoism; the political structure; leadership, personalities, and power struggles; economic policy; social policy and movements; problems of corruption and instability; prospects for democratic development. There will be some attention to Taiwan and to Hong Kong as special Chinese societies

LLEA 30608. The Worlds of Buddhism

(3-0-3) Gimello

A thematic introduction to the pan-Asian (i.e., South, Southeast, and Central Asian as well as East Asian) Buddhist tradition exploring the fundamentals of Buddhist doctrine and practice while also sampling major themes in the religion's social, cultural, and material history. Among the particular topics to be covered are: the life of the Buddha (history and hagiography), the "Four Noble Truths" (the essentials of the Buddhist "creed"), the Buddhist canon (the nature and scope of Buddhist scripture), Buddhist cosmology (Buddhist conceptions of the formation and structure of the universe, i.e., of time and space), Buddhist monasticism, meditation and the Buddhist contemplative life, Buddhist ethics, the ritual lives of Buddhists, Buddhism and politics, Buddhist "family values," Buddhism and the arts, etc.

LLEA 30609. Buddhism in China

(3-0-3)

Buddhism is the only one of the major religions traditionally regarded as Chinese that did not originate in China. China is arguably the Asian civilization in which Buddhism underwent its most extensive development and its most thoroughgoing transformations. This course is designed to be a thematic and historical overview of the development of Buddhist thought and practice in China with special emphasis on the process of mutual influence by which Buddhism, without ceasing to be Buddhist, became also a Chinese religion while China, without abandoning its indigenous religious heritage, became also a Buddhist culture. As such, the course will serve a threefold purpose: it will introduce students to fundamental Buddhist beliefs and values as they took shape in China; it will acquaint them with essential elements of Chinese civilization attributable to Buddhism's presence; and it will provide an opportunity to study what may well be world history's most remarkable instance of successful cross-cultural religious communication.

LLEA 30611. Buddhist Meditation Traditions

(3-0-3)

Relying chiefly on English translations of primary, mostly East Asian canonical sources, this course will examine varieties of Buddhist meditation practice while also posing theoretical questions about the nature of meditation as a form of religious life; its ethical implications; its relations with other elements of Buddhism like doctrine, ritual, art, institutions; etc. all considered against the background of theological and philosophical concern with the role of contemplative experience in the religious life.

LLEA 30612. Buddhism in Practice

(12-0-3)

An introduction to Buddhism in East Asia (principally China, but also Japan, Korea and Vietnam) with emphasis less on what Buddhists think or believe and more on what they actually do in their public as well as private lives—e.g., the rituals they perform; their disciplines of self-cultivation; the institutions they establish; and the ethical, political, and economic decisions they make.

LLEA 31105. Masters of Contemporary Chinese Cinema—Lab

(0-2-0)

Corequisite: LLEA 33105

This introductory film course showcases master directors and major films from China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Students will learn to appreciate Chinese cinema both for its content and techniques, while familiarizing themselves with social and political changes under which these films were produced in Greater China. We will examine cinematic accomplishments by master directors and analyze how they recreate for the audience different Chinese societies on the screen. This course is taught in English. No prior knowledge of Chinese is required.

LLEA 31316. Introduction to Japanese Popular Culture Lab

Corequisite: LLEA 33316

This course will examine postwar Japanese popular culture using the theories and methods of cultural studies, media studies and gender studies. We will explore some of the primary sites of postwar popular culture across media, as well as emphasizing the theoretical distinctions between those media. Rather than chronological order, the course will be grouped into sections by media, including novels, film, television, manga, and anime. As we discuss issues specific to each of these media and across genres, however, our discussion will be framed by some key questions: What was the role of popular culture in defining a national identity to the postwar? What was the role of foreign influences, most importantly, American pop culture? How have popular culture texts spoken to and defined specific audiences (for instance, teenagers, women, non-Japanese)? Knowledge of Japanese is not required.

LLEA 33101. Heroism and Eroticism in Chinese Fiction

(3-0-3)

In this course we will read works in Chinese fiction from the late imperial periods. We will discuss the aesthetic features of such works and their cultural underpinnings, especially the infusion of Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist meanings. Particularly, we will focus on heroism and eroticism as two major themes in Chinese fiction and their specific expressions in each work. We will consider the transition from heroism to eroticism as a shift of narrative paradigm, which coincided with a general trend of "domestication" in traditional Chinese fiction. Through the readings and discussions, the students are expected to become familiar with pre-modern Chinese narrative tradition and acquainted with some aspects of Chinese culture. All the readings are in English translation, and no prior knowledge of China or the Chinese language is required.

LLEA 33103. Twentieth-Century Chinese Literature

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will read English translations of works in 20th-century Chinese literature, especially short stories and plays written from the May 4th Movement in 1919 to the beginning of the Reform in the early '80s. We will discuss the literary expressions of China's weal and woe in modern times and of the Chinese people's frustrations and aspirations when their country was experiencing unprecedented social changes. No prior knowledge of the Chinese language or Chinese culture is required for taking the course.

LLEA 33105. Masters of Contemporary Chinese Cinema

(3-0-3) Lin

Corequisite: LLEA 31105

This introductory film course showcases master directors and major films from China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Students will learn to appreciate Chinese cinema both for its content and techniques, while familiarizing themselves with social and political changes under which these films were produced in Greater China. We will examine cinematic accomplishments by master directors and analyze how they recreate for the audience different Chinese societies on the screen. This course is taught in English. No prior knowledge of Chinese is required.

LLEA 33107. City in Chinese Film/Fiction

(3-0-3)

Since the first decade of the 20th century, China has undergone tremendous changes, which are most evident in the life of city dwellers. In this class, we will read short stories and analyze films about urbanites and their desires, anguish, and aspirations. We will examine, for instance, why Shanghai was portrayed as the nadir of vice in the 1930s. Or how the underprivileged youths struggle in present-day Beijing. We will read about how the men and women of Taipei and Hong Kong grapple with their changing social, political, economic, and spiritual realities. To complete our understanding of the city in the mind of the Chinese, we will also explore writings by overseas Chinese on foreign cities such as New York and Paris. We will try to answer questions such as how different cities are portrayed and what these diverse perceptions represent. How have these perceptions changed over time? Is the city always exciting, threatening, or benign, and how do people in these various places cope with modern life in the city? Is there no more distinction among cities, now that we are all living in a global village?

LLEA 33108. Anti-Social Behavior in Modern Chinese Fiction

(3-0-3)

Chinese society is often characterized as highly conformative and lacking in individuality. Is this true? What kind of behaviors then would be considered antisocial, and what are their moral, social, and political consequences? In this course, we will read fictional works depicting behaviors and attitudes that are considered by society in general as antisocial, anti-conventional, and sometimes anti-party. We will investigate the contexts of these behaviors and their political implications. For instance, are these behaviors justified? Are different standards applied to women? What are the temporal and spatial factors in people's conception of an antisocial behavior? To what extent are these behaviors culturally determined? No prior knowledge of the Chinese languages or China is required.

LLEA 33111. Chinese Literary Dreams and Dream in the Red Chamber

(3-0-3)

Dreams have long been objects of fascination for people in all cultures, including the Chinese. Focusing on the 18th-century Chinese masterwork Dream of the Red Chamber, this course examines the literary functions of dreams in the Chinese context. Dreams will be discussed as a catalyst in the process of fiction making, serving as a master trope for the "complementary oppositions" between truth and falsehood, between history and literature, between reality and fictionality, and between the sublunary and the supernatural. The goal of the course is to familiarize students with a novel that is generally considered the pinnacle of Chinese fictional literature and with some of the cultural convictions that underscore Chinese literary dreams. The primary text of the course is the 5-volume English translation of Dream of the Red Chamber. Supplementary readings include scholarship on the novel and modern theories on dream and the unconscious. Prior knowledge in Chinese language and culture not required.

LLEA 33112. Readings in Chinese Drama

(3-0-3)

This course studies a number of works in Chinese dramatic traditions from the pre-modern times up to the 20th century. While attention will be paid to Chinese theater as performing art, the plays selected for this course will be studied primarily as literary texts. The purpose of the course is to familiarize students with some of the most outstanding formulations in Chinese drama and their underpinning cultural meanings. All readings are in English translations, and no prior knowledge of Chinese culture or language is required.

LLEA 33114. LAC Chinese, Heroism and Eroticism in Traditional Chinese Fiction

(1-0-1)

Students who have completed advanced Chinese are eligible to sign up for an additional single credit of work in the target language as part of the Languages Across the Curriculum (LAC) initiative of the College of Arts and Letters. Choosing this option means that students will do some additional reading in the Chinese language materials, and meet once a week with faculty tutor from the Department of East Asian Languages & Cultures, who will guide the discussion and direct the written work. The LAC section in association with this course will be graded on a pass/fail basis and will be credited on the student's transcript. Up to three LAC discussion sections can be applied toward a major, secondary major or minor in Chinese. In this course, we will read works in Chinese fiction from the late imperial periods. We will discuss the aesthetic features of such works and their cultural underpinnings, especially the infusion of Confucian Taoist, and Buddhist meanings. Particularly, we will focus on heroism and eroticism as two major themes in Chinese fiction and their specific expressions in each work. We will consider the transition from heroism to eroticism as a shift of narrative paradigm, which coincided with a general trend of "domestication" in traditional Chinese fiction. Through the readings and discussions, the students are expected to become familiar with pre-modern Chinese narrative tradition and acquainted with some aspects of Chinese culture. All the readings are in English translation.

LLEA 33115. LAC Introduction to Japanese Popular Culture

(1-0-1)

Students who have completed the first semester of third-year Japanese or higher, or who possess equivalent Japanese language skills, are eligible to sign up for an additional 1-credit section. The Languages Across the Curriculum (LAC) section will meet for one hour once a week for discussion of course material in Japanese. Students will also read selections of course material in the original, and submit three short (2- to 3-page) writing assignments. The LAC section will be graded on a pass/fail basis. This course is a component of LLEA 33316, Introduction to Japanese Popular Culture. This course will examine postwar Japanese popular culture using the theories and methods of cultural studies, media studies, and gender studies. We will explore some of the primary sites of postwar popular culture across media, as well as emphasizing the theoretical distinctions between those media. Rather than chronological order, the course will be grouped into sections by media, including novels, film, television, manga, and anime. As we discuss issues specific to each of these media and across genres, however, our discussion will be framed by some key questions: What was the role of popular culture in defining a national identity in the postwar? What was the role of foreign influences, most importantly, American pop culture? How have popular culture texts spoken to and defined specific audiences (for instance, teenagers, women, non-Japanese)?

LLEA 33155. Multicultural China

(3-0-3) Lin

This course showcases the multifaceted aspects of China, not only in the ethnic sense but also in the political sense. We will read literary works by writers of different ethnic backgrounds (e.g., Han, Tibetan, the Atayal tribe from Taiwan) and geographical origins (the PRC, Taiwan, and Hong Kong). The objective of this course is to help students to gain a deeper understanding of the notion of "Greater China" and the concept of "Chinese-ness." Through analyzing works by different ethnic writers, we will learn to appreciate the diversity of Chinese culture that is often overshadowed by a misconception about Chinese homogeneity. Likewise, fictional creation by writers from the three regions will give us a broader knowledge of Chinese culture that is constantly threatened by a political need for unity. This course is taught in English, and no prior knowledge of the Chinese languages is required.

LLEA 33301. Love and Death in Traditional Japanese Drama

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will explore the themes of love and death in the three main forms of traditional Japanese theater: Noh, Kabuki, and Bunraku (puppet theater). We will begin with the medieval No theater, which evolved out of a variety of performing arts and reached maturity in the 15th century under the patronage of the warrior aristocracy. In an effort to create an atmosphere of mystery and beauty, these plays transformed episodes from folk tales, courtly romances, and military epics into highly stylized dance-dramas imbued with the austere aesthetic of Zen Buddhism. For the remainder of the course, we will study Kabuki (a theater of live actors) and Bunraku. These two rival forms of popular entertainment first appeared in the 17th century as part of a new and lively urban culture. This was the 'floating world' (ukiyo) of teahouses, brothels, and theaters, where townsmen mingled with samurai in the pursuit of pleasure and spectacle, and where Kabuki actors became the first "superstar" celebrities. We will focus on plays by Chikamatsu Monzaemon (1653–1725), the "Japanese Shakespeare," who wrote for both Kabuki and Bunraku. Plays such as The Love Suicides at Sonezaki (1703) Gonza the Lancer (1717), and The Woman-killer and the Hell of Oil (1721), bring to life tragic tales of star-crossed lovers, adulterous wives, and murdering ne'er-do-wells. In addition to reading and discussing selected plays, students will view scenes from modern performances and from modern film adaptations. All readings will be English translation and no previous knowledge of Japan is required.

LLEA 33314. Cruel Stories of Youth: Children and Teens in Japanese Film

(3-0-3)

From the wide-eyed children of anime to the crazy street fashions of Harajuku, images of kids and teens in Japanese popular culture are now distributed and consumed around the world. How then are those young audiences depicted and addressed within Japanese popular culture? What aspects of childhood or teen identity are repeated across generations? In order to answer these questions, we will look at Japanese films, including animation, from across the 20th century, that represent children and teens from a variety of perspectives, from the celebration of innocence to the threat of juvenile delinquency. In addition to analyzing representations of children and teens, students will also gain familiarity with Japanese film history and genres, and develop the critical vocabulary of film analysis. Films will include I Was Born But, Crazed Fruit, A Cruel Story of Youth, Battle Royale, All About Lily Chou Chou, Nobody Knows, Grave of the Fireflies, and Akira. All films will be subtitled. There will also be secondary readings in cultural studies and film studies, relating to the films we watch in class. Assignments will include an oral presentation, several short writing assignments, a film viewing journal, and a longer paper.

LLEA 33315. Men and Women in Modern Japanese Literature

(3-2-3)

In 20th-century Japan, as old roles such as samurai and geisha waned, both men and women had to redefine the characteristics and meaning of masculinity and femininity. This course will look at constructions of gender in modern Japanese literature by both female and male authors. As we discuss both normative and deviant depictions of male and female roles, some topics we will address include: men and women at work and at war, marriage and family life, homosociality and homosexuality. Students will also gain familiarity with some of the major authors, genres, and literary movements of modern Japanese literature. Texts will include Kokoro by Natsume Soseki, Confessions of a Mask by Mishima Yukio, Diary of a Vagabond by Hayashi Fumiko, and short stories by Higuchi Ichiyo, Kono Taeko, and Oe Kenzaburo. This course is taught in English and no knowledge of the Japanese language is required.

LLEA 33316. Introduction to Japanese Popular Culture

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: LLEA 31316

This course will examine postwar Japanese popular culture using the theories and methods of cultural studies, media studies and gender studies. We will explore some of the primary sites of postwar popular culture across media, as well as emphasizing the theoretical distinctions between those media. Rather than chronological order, the course will be grouped into sections by media, including novels, film, television, manga, and anime. As we discuss issues specific to each of these media and across genres, however, our discussion will be framed by some key questions: What was the role of popular culture in defining a national identity in the postwar? What was the role of foreign influences, most importantly, American pop culture? How have popular culture texts spoken to and defined specific audiences (for instance, teenagers, women, non-Japanese)? The goals of this course are to gain familiarity with some key texts in postwar Japan, and to learn various methods of analyzing those texts. As we approach each medium, we will be using film, television, and comics theories to analyze them. In order to gain proficiency in the academic analysis of popular culture, you will use those theories in writing and in a formal oral presentation. Students who have completed the first semester of third-year Japanese or higher, or who possess equivalent Japanese language skills, are eligible to sign up for an additional 1-credit section. The Languages Across the Curriculum (LAC) section will meet for one hour once a week for discussion of course material in Japanese. Students will also read selections of course material in the original, and submit three short (2- to 3-page) writing assignments. The LAC section will be graded on a pass/fail basis.

LLEA 33317. The Samurai in Classical Japanese Literature

(3-0-3)

The sword-wielding samurai warrior is perhaps the most familiar icon of pre-modern Japan, one that continues to influence how Japanese think of themselves and how others think of Japan even in modern times. Who were the samurai? How did they see themselves? How did other members of Japanese society see them in the past? How did the role and the image of the samurai change over time? To answer these questions, we will explore the depiction of Samurai in various kinds of texts: episodes from quasi-historical chronicles, 14th-century Noh plays, 17th-century short stories, and 18th-century Kabuki and puppet plays (many Kabuki plays, a theater of live actors, were first written for the puppet theater). While some of these texts emphasize themes of loyalty, honor, and military prowess, others focus on the problems faced by samurai in their domestic lives during times of peace. The last part of the course will be devoted to the most famous of all stories, "The Revenge of the 47 Samurai." Students will read eyewitness accounts of this vendetta, which occurred in 1702, and then explore how the well-known Kabuki/puppet play Chushingura (A Treasury of Loyal Retainers, 1748) dramatizes the conflicting opinions surrounding it. All readings will be English translation, and no previous knowledge of Japan is required.

LLEA 40610. History of Chinese Medicine

(3-0-3) Murray

In light of the contemporary currency of certain Chinese practices in the field of alternative medicine, this course will explore the phenomenon of Chinese traditional medicine in both its historical and contemporary settings. The first unit, Medicine in Ancient China, will explore the earliest medical ideas of the Chinese and will demonstrate how the state's political unification gave rise to a correlative cosmology that not only included Heaven and Earth, but also human beings as integral elements of an organic cosmos. The second unit will explore the influences and contributions of Taoism (Daoism) and Buddhism to Chinese medicine and will explore what it meant to be both physicians and patients in late imperial China. The third unit will focus on medicine in contemporary China and will feature the experiences of Elisabeth Hsu, a student of Chinese medical anthropology who as a part of her doctoral research enrolled as a student in Yunnan Traditional Chinese Medical College between September 1988 and December 1989. We will conclude the course with a brief examination of the influence of Chinese medicine on the contemporary world.

LLEA 40615. Hong Kong Action Cinema

(3-0-3) Magnan-Park

Corequisite: LLEA 41615

This course addresses the global significance of the gong fu vague [kung fu new wave] that hit world cinema in the early 1970s and its ripple effects up to the present. As the signature genre of the Hong Kong film industry, it does not stand in global isolation but is rather a product of careful market research in developing a distinctive genre that could have global popularity outside of its traditional regionalized domestic market (HK and Southeast Asia) and its overseas ethnic Chinese enclaves in numerous Chinatowns across the world. Some of the key issues that we will cover include: How does a small non-national population sustain a commercially viable film industry? How can a film industry create a version of action cinema that supersedes Hollywood's dominance in the genre? Is this purely a "Chinese" phenomenon or one that is inherently dependent on non-Chinese participation? Do these films have ideological, aesthetic, and economic significance within a larger framework or must they be critically dismissed outright? What does it mean that "everybody was kung fu fighting" and continuing to do so? Taught in English. No knowledge of Mandarin or Cantonese is required. Whenever possible, we will view the films in their original language with English subtitles. A few films will be dubbed in English.

LLEA 47498. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Requires "contractual agreement" with the professor prior to scheduling. For advanced students who wish to pursue an independent research project reading Chinese language materials.

LLEA 48311. Honors Thesis, Chinese

(3-0-3)

Majors in Chinese are strongly encouraged to pursue the honors track. Those who are interested must meet the following criteria: (1) fulfillment of all the requirements for a first major of 30 credit hours in Chinese; and (2) a cumulative GPA of at least 3.6 or permission from the department chair. In addition to the 30 hours required for a major, the honors track requires the completion of a senior honors thesis of at least 30 pages that demonstrates the student's originality and ability to do research in the target field. For this endeavor the student will receive 3 hours of graded credit. This means that to graduate with departmental honors, the student must earn 33 hours of credit in the major. Based on past experience, it is our expectation that honors projects will emerge from previous coursework where close interaction between faculty and students has planted the seeds for a larger project; from the student's leadership role in the cultural and intellectual life of the department; or as a follow up to experiences begun during his/her study abroad program. A thesis director is chosen to guide the student and provide assistance.

Department of German and Russian Languages and Literatures

German

GE 10101. Beginning German I

(4-0-4) Della Rossa; Boes; McChesney; Wimmer

An introductory course of the spoken and written language. Aims at the acquisition of basic structures, vocabulary, and sound systems. For students with no previous study of the language.

GE 10102. Beginning German II

(4-0-4) Boes; Della Rossa; McChesney; Wimmer

Continuation of an introductory course of the spoken and written language. Aims at the acquisition of basic structures, vocabulary, and sound systems.

GE 10111. Intensive Beginning German I

(6-0-6) Weber

In this course, students will develop skills in understanding, speaking, reading, and writing German. They will also attain a grasp of the basic structures of the language. During class, emphasis will be placed on using the language to communicate and interact in a variety of situations and contexts. In addition, there will be a comprehensive introduction to the culture of German-speaking countries, with a particular emphasis on Austria, as this course is strongly recommended for students with no previous study of German who wish to participate in the International Studies Program in Innsbruck. The course is also open to any student who wishes to make more rapid progress in German language skills and cultural competence.

GE 10112. Intensive Beginning German II

(6-0-6) Weber

Continuation of GE 10101 (with permission) or 10111. In this course students will continue to develop and improve skills in understanding, speaking, reading, and writing German. They will also attain a grasp of the basic structures of the language. During class, emphasis will be placed on using the language to communicate and interact in a variety of situations and contexts. In addition, there will be a comprehensive introduction to the culture of German-speaking countries, with a particular emphasis on Austria, as this course is strongly recommended for students who wish to participate in the International Studies Program in Innsbruck. It is also open to any student who wishes to make rapid progress in German language skills and cultural competence.

GE 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3) Hösle; McChesney; Wimmer; Della Rossa

This course introduces German literature and culture while also serving as an introduction to the seminar method of instruction. The course is writing-intensive, with emphasis given to improving students' writing skills through the careful analysis of specific texts.

GE 20201. Intermediate German I

(3-0-3) Boes; Profit; Della Rossa; Hagens; Wimmer

In this course, students will build on and develop their communicative abilities acquired in Beginning German I and II. The four-skills approach (speaking, listening, reading, and writing) is centered on authentic texts, recordings, videos, and other images. The course includes grammar review, concentrated vocabulary expansion, and intensive practice.

GE 20202. Intermediate German II

(3-0-3) Hagens; Della Rossa

In this bridge course, students will strengthen and refine the four linguistic skills (speaking, listening, reading, and writing). Students will work toward greater fluency, accuracy, and complexity of expression. They will debate, analyze, and express opinions. Materials and class discussions will center on a cultural topic that will carry through the entire semester.

GE 10112. Intensive Beginning German II

(6-0-6) Weber

Continuation of GE 10101 (with permission) or 10111. In this course students will continue to develop and improve skills in understanding, speaking, reading, and writing German. They will also attain a grasp of the basic structures of the language. During class, emphasis will be placed on using the language to communicate and interact in a variety of situations and contexts. In addition, there will be a comprehensive introduction to the culture of German-speaking countries, with a particular emphasis on Austria, as this course is strongly recommended for students who wish to participate in the International Studies Program in Innsbruck. It is also open to any student who wishes to make rapid progress in German language skills and cultural competence.

GE 20211. Intensive Intermediate German I

(6-0-6) Weber

This course provides comprehensive training in all the communicative language skills, speaking, reading, writing, and listening, as well as cultural competence. Students will work with authentic texts, recordings, videos, and other images. During class, emphasis will be placed on using the language to communicate and interact in a variety of situations and contexts. The course includes grammar review, concentrated vocabulary expansion, and intensive practice. This course is strongly recommended for students who wish to study abroad in a German speaking country and for any student who wished to progress rapidly in the ability to communicate in the German language.

GE 20212. Intensive Intermediate German II

(6-0-6) Weber

This course provides comprehensive training in all language skills, speaking, reading, writing, and listening, with the goal of greater fluency, accuracy, and complexity of expression. Students will read and discuss selected cultural and literary texts with an emphasis on the period between 1945 and the present. They will review grammar in the context of situations and readings, become acquainted with Austrian and German culture and history, employ typical conversational strategies and gambits, sharpen listening skills, produce various types of written expression, and enlarge their active and passive vocabulary. This course is designed to prepare students with some previous study of German for study abroad in Innsbruck or Berlin. It is also recommended for any student who wishes to make more rapid progress in German language skills and cultural competence.

GE 20320. Pre-Study Abroad—Austria and Germany

(1-0-1) Weber

This mini-course will prepare students accepted for study abroad in Notre Dame's CES program in Innsbruck, Austria, and the program in Berlin, Germany, for living and studying in their chosen location. Topics for discussion will include, among others, practical aspects of everyday life, handling cultural differences, adjusting to the academic system, optimizing academic opportunities, culture with a small and capital C, making the most of travel, and possibilities for post-study abroad internships, fellowships, research projects and other opportunities for returning to the German-speaking world. Course begins the week after spring break.

GE 20610. The Crises of Modernity in German Culture, 1900–33

(3-0-3) Boes

German culture during the period from 1900 to 1933 can be read as the sustained response to a series of crises that overturned moral, religious and social conventions. Sexual and political emancipation, the mass suffering of the First World War, the turmoil of the "Golden Twenties" and the ultimate rise of the Nazi party presented writers, artists, and philosophers with unprecedented experiences that demanded new forms of creative expression. In this course, we will study the varied responses to this challenge and discover how the foundations for our modern consciousness were laid in the first three decades of the 20th century. After reading two influential theoretical accounts of modernity by Nietzsche and Freud, we will move on to the sumptuous aestheticism of Vienna during the age of Strauss, Kafka, and Kokoschka. During the second half of the course, we will study the frantic urban culture of Berlin during the 1920s, paying special attention to works by Brecht, Mann, Weill, and others. In addition to literature and philosophy, we will cover music, film, and the fine arts, paying special attention to mixed genres and limit cases of literature, such as opera, song cycle, and artist book. (In English)

GE 20810. Spectors, Spectators, and the Spectacular in the German Novella

(3-0-3) McChesney

Innate human curiosity has long fueled our desire to gain a glimpse, if but for a moment, into others' lives and into other worlds. The German novella delights in fulfilling this wish, and it presents readers with vivid tales of fantastic dreams, scandalous realities and ghostly encounters. This course retraces the visual legacy of this short literary form from its roots in the spectacular novella cycles 1001 Arabian Nights and Boccaccio's Decameron to its presentation of specters and spectacles in the German novellas from the 18th century to the present. Each work will be read and discussed with careful attention to its formal characteristics, its visual thematic, and their effects. We will also consider comparable novellas in the broader European tradition.

GE 27998. Special Studies: German

(3-0-V)

This course was created to allow students to add credit in special circumstances to an already existing course offered in the department. Approval of department chair and instructor of the course is required.

GE 30102. The ABCs of Reading and Writing about Literature (in German)

(3-0-3) Profit

At most, two works will be read: Durrenmatt's Der Richter und sein Henker and Der Besuch der alten Dame. We will read these carefully, with great attention to detail. Writing assignments will evolve from the readings; they may include a character portrayal, the description of an outdoor event, a short conversation, description of a crime scene, etc. They will increase in length from a single paragraph to two or three pages.

GE 30103. Advanced German Conversation

(3-0-3) Norton

This is an advanced German language course, designed for students who have successfully completed a minimum of four semesters of German. This course expands on the grammatical structures of the German language spoken in German-speaking countries today, with emphasis on communication and acquisition of advanced language skills: reading and listening comprehension, and oral and written expression. A study of everyday German culture supports the language study. The conversational component of the course requires student-teacher and student-student interaction (in large and small group settings) to exchange information, clarify meanings, express opinions, argue points of view, and engage in any other communicative function for which native speakers use language. The course includes ongoing evaluation of students, using a variety of evaluative instruments and communicative contexts. Note: Native speakers or students who already have achieved a high level of oral proficiency (to be determined by an oral proficiency interview with the instructor) will not be given credit for this course.

GE 30105. Advanced Stylistics and Composition

(3-0-3) McChesney

This course offers students the opportunity to increase the sophistication of their written German. Speaking, listening, and reading skills also will benefit. Assignments are varied widely to address the interests and strengths of all students and to allow many opportunities for creativity. For example, students may work at writing letters, biography or autobiography, short stories, editorials, film reviews, or advertisements, to name just a few of the genres and writing styles we explore. In the process, students build their vocabulary, including idiomatic expressions, and solidify their understanding of German grammar. German culture, as expressed in short texts, the Internet, films, and music, provide a rich and meaningful context for the writing process. Students work frequently in groups to read and edit each other's work.

GE 30107. Kulturgeschichte

(3-0-3) DellaRossa

This course offers a survey of major developments in the cultural history of Germany and Central Europe. The course will investigate different manifestations of German and Central European cultures, such as literature, painting, architecture, music, and philosophy, as well as their interrelationship and historical contextualization. The course will provide an overview of important cultural and historical developments that have shaped German-speaking Europe. The goal is to familiarize students with basic techniques of approaching and interpreting texts and artifacts while preparing them for a wider range of more specialized courses. Taught in German.

GE 30108. Literatur von gestern und heute

(3-0-3) DellaRossa

This course acquaints students with the major periods and issues of German literature through the examination of a significant constellation of literary texts. Students read, discuss, and analyze selected texts from prose, poetry, and drama and become familiar with basic techniques of approaching and interpreting texts that will prepare them for a wider range of more specialized courses.

GE 30113. Business German

(3-0-3) Wimmer

German business language and practices. Designed to introduce the internationally oriented business and German major to the language, customs, and practices of the German business world.

GE 30215. Medieval German Literature

(3-0-3) Wimmer

This course constitutes a survey of German literature from its beginnings during Germanic times until the 16th century. Ideas, issues, and topics are discussed in such a way that their continuity can be seen throughout the centuries. Lectures and discussions are in German, but individual students' language abilities are taken into consideration. Readings include modern German selections from major medieval authors and works such as Hildebrandslied, Rolandlied, Nibelungenlied, Iwein, Parzival, Tristan, courtly lyric poetry, the German mystics, secular and religious medieval drama, Der Ackermann aus Bohmen, and the beast epic Reineke Fuchs. Class discussions and brief presentations in German by students on the selections are intended as an opportunity for stimulating exchange and formal use of German.

GE 30565. The German Novella

(3-0-3) Della Rossa

This course will explore the German Novelle, one of the most popular genres of 19th-century German literature. Each work will be read and discussed with careful attention to its formal characteristics as well as its historical and cultural contexts. By proceeding chronologically through the literary periods of romanticism, Biedermeier, poetic realism, and naturalism, students will gain a sense of literary developments in the 19th century and how these reflect shifts within the broader culture. Among the writers to be read: Goethe, Tieck, Kleist, Hoffmann, Eichendorff, Stifter, Storm, Keller, and Hauptmann. As a 30000-level course, writing will be emphasized. Students will be required to rewrite each of their essays.

GE 30620. Three Modern German Writers: Mann, Kafka, and Seghers

(3-0-3) Boes

Detailed study of selected short fiction by three authors whose work exemplifies both different stylistic approaches to and different periods of German literary modernism. Primary sources will be complemented by background readings on German history from 1890 to 1945 and by a few theoretical texts on modernism and modernity in both English and German. Class conducted in German.

GE 30650. The Romantic Tradition

(3-0-3)

Between 1790 and 1830, the movement known as romanticism profoundly changed the artistic, musical, historical, religious, and political sensibilities on the continent and in Britain. Romanticism marked a turn from the rational formalism of the classical period and reawakened an interest in myth, religious faith, the imagination, and emotional experience. In this course, we will focus principally on the German contribution to romanticism and trace its origins, development, and eventual decline in works of literature, philosophy, theology, music, painting, and architecture. Works to be studied will include those by the writers Ludwig Tieck, Friedrich von Hardenberg (Novalis), and Friedrich Schlegel; the philosophers Fichte and Schelling; the theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher; the painters Caspar David Friedrich and some members of the Nazarene school; the composers Franz Schubert, Felix Mendelssohn, and Robert Schumann; and the architect Karl Friedrich Schinkel.

GE 30685. Discourses of Unity or Disunity? Representing Germany After 1990

(3-0-3) McChesney

The fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 brought the hope of unity to two diverse German traditions. Yet despite rapid political and geographical unification, even now, more than 15 years later, Germany seems in many respects more dis-united than ever. In this course we will examine the unity discourse in contemporary German film and text. Focusing in particular on current depictions of the former East and West, we will consider whether these representations contribute to a new sense to national unity by emphasizing the similarities in a common past and present, or whether in fact they accentuate a sense of disunity by bringing out areas of difference, divergence, and even conflict. The course will facilitate explorations of the literary, cultural, and historical impact of (dis)unity in present-day Germany through intensive discussion, written essays, and short student-led presentations.

GE 30850. Law and Justice on the German Stage

(3-0-3) Boes

The relationship between spectacle and law, narrative resolution and ethical justice is a recurrent theme in the German theatrical tradition from the 18th century to the present. This course will focus on a number of plays that dramatize the contentious relationship between state power and the individual, between personal conscience and the normative demands of society. We will pay special attention to the disquieting similarity between the theater and the courtroom, between the dramas that divert us and those by which we decide between right and wrong. Readings will be drawn from Lessing, Goethe and Kleist, as well as from the Brechtian tradition, which includes, besides Brecht himself, also Peter Weiss and Heiner Müller. Taught in German.

GE 30891. Masterpieces of German Literature

(3-0-3) Hagens

A sampling of the most beautiful, moving, and humorous prose and poetry of the 20th century will be read and interpreted. Amongst other authors, we will focus our attention on selections from Heinrich Boll, Wolfgang Borchert, Max Frisch, Karl Krolow, and Rainer Maria Rilke. The written assignments will evolve from the texts studied. Taught in German.

GE 40430. The Classical Period of German Literature (1750 to 1830)

(3-0-3)

Modern German literature comes into being at the middle of the 18th century. This period of German culture, often referred to as its “classical age,” is represented by such figures as Klopstock, Lessing, Herder, Schiller, Goethe, Hölderlin, and Kleist. In this class, we will read and discuss some of the great works written by these authors and analyze them in relation to the intellectual and cultural currents of the time.

GE 40440. Goethe and His Time

(3-0-3) Norton; Hölsle

An intensive study of Goethe’s major works of poetry, prose, and drama within the cultural framework of his times.

GE 40471. Twentieth-Century Prose and Poetry

(3-0-3) Profit

In order to acquaint the student with the rich diversity characteristic of 20th-century German literature, a wide variety of materials will be studied. They will not only encompass various genres: the short story, the drama, and the poem, but will also represent various time periods: from the beginnings of the 20th century to the ‘50s. Among others, readings will include Franz Kafka, Die Verwandlung, Wolfgang Borchert, Draussen vor der Tur, and poems from Rilke to Celan. An oral report, two papers, and a two-hour final will supplement thorough and engaging class discussions based upon close readings of the selected texts. Taught in German.

GE 40484. Overcoming Political Tragedy

(3-0-3) Hagens

An interdisciplinary course in drama and peace studies. Drama is a potentially fascinating topic for peace studies because, at the heart of traditional drama and theatre, there is conflict—and the question of whether it can be resolved. Moreover, just as politics is often dramatic, drama is often political; there is, for example, an extensive tradition of plays that make a theme of political revolution, usually in the form of tragedy or comedy. Students in this course read classic political dramas that are neither tragedies nor comedies, but rather bring potentially tragic public conflict to positive yet nontrivial resolution. Having discussed definitions of tragedy and comedy, and what might be the advantages of aesthetic renditions of conflict, the class then reads some of these dramas of political reconciliation: Aeschylus, Oresteia: Eumenides; Shakespeare, Measure for Measure; Calderon, The Mayor of Zalamea; Corneille, Cinna; Lessing, Nathan the Wise; Schiller, William Tell; Kleist, The Prince of Homburg; Brecht, The Caucasian Chalk Circle; Lan, Desire; and Fugard, Valley Song. (We also may include selected films, such as Meet John Doe, On the Waterfront, or Twelve Angry Men.) We will examine these plays (and films) through both the categories of drama analysis and theories of conflict resolution, mediation, and transformation, with the expectation of achieving greater depth in our interpretations of the dramatic texts and in our understanding of the theories of conflict resolution. Students of peace studies and political science who are familiar with these pieces of world literature will have acquired a new kind of resource for their ability to think through and work in conflict resolution.

GE 40490. Schiller (in German)

(3-0-3) Norton

In this course, we will consider Friedrich Schiller as a dramatist, poet, aesthetic philosopher, and historian. We will read several of Friedrich Schiller’s most important plays, including Die Rauber, Kabale und Liebe, Die Verschwörung des Fiesko, Wallenstein, Maria Stuart, and Die Braut von Messina. In addition, we will read from his letters on beauty (Kallias), and the essays Über Anmut und Würde, Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung, and Die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen. Finally, we will also read selections from his historical works on the Thirty Years’ War and on The Netherlands.

GE 40610. Crises of Modernity in German Culture

(3-0-3) Boes

To a European citizen living in the year 1900, the world would have seemed a promising place. The continent had enjoyed almost universal peace for the past 80 years, science and the arts were prospering, the economy was booming. Yet less than 50 years later, Europe lay in ruins, reeling from a half-century of war, economic depression, and genocide. This course will set out to explore what happened. Instead of focusing on political, economic, or military history, however, we will enter the minds of some of the thinkers and poets who shaped cultural life during the first third of the century, choosing Germany as our specimen case. It was here that modern thought attained its greatest heights and here, also, that it ultimately sank to its lowest depths. Through close analysis of selected texts, we will uncover how the heights and the depths were intimately related to one another, and how modernity was from the very beginning dogged by a series of profound crises. Readings and discussion in English. Students taking the course for German credit will study selected texts in the original and write their papers in German. Open to sophomores with permission of instructor only. Authors will include Nietzsche, Freud, Weber, Heidegger, Brecht, Hesse, Höch, Riefenstahl, and others.

GE 40648. German Cinema in the Weimar Republic (1918–33) (in English)

(3-0-3) Hagens

The years between 1918 and 1933 are the golden age of German film. In its development from expressionism to social realism, the German cinema produced works of great variety, many of them in the international avant-garde. This course gives an overview of the silent movies and sound films made during the Weimar Republic and situate them in their artistic, social, and political context. The oeuvre of Fritz Lang, the greatest German director, receives special attention. Should we interpret Lang's disquieting visual style as a highly individual phenomenon independent of its environment, or can we read his obsessive themes (world conspiracies and terrorized masses, compulsive violence and revenge, entrapment and guilt) as a mirror image of the historical period? Might his films, as some critics have suggested, even illustrate how a national psyche gets enmeshed in fascist ideology? Films subtitled, dubbed, or in English; readings, lectures, and discussions in English.

GE 40669. Modern Metropolis in German Literature

(3-0-3) Hagens

If Paris was known as the capital of the 19th century, turn-of-the-century Berlin was declared the capital of the 20th century. The largest then German metropolis came to epitomize rapid and spectacular modernization in Germany that started before World War I and continued during the Weimar Republic. Berlin had it all: gigantic industrial factories, glamorous boulevards, street lights, dazzling shop windows, night life, movies and entertainment, armies of white-collar employees, housing barracks, modern architecture, shopping, traffic, crime, and social problems. This course offers an introduction to one of the most dynamic periods in German cultural history (1900–33) as it is represented in texts and films about the big city. The discussions will focus on the following questions: Why did the big city appear fascinating and inspiring to some authors, and to others it loomed as a dreadful epitome of alienation and decadence? How were modern phenomena reflected in language and images? What were the forms of aesthetic innovation and artistic experimentation associated with the representation of modern life? Did men and women experience metropolitan modernity differently?

GE 40672. The Modern German Short Story

(3-0-3) Wimmer

The German short story and other forms of prose from the "Stunde Null" in 1945 to the 1990s. Authors range from East and West German writers of the immediate postwar era to the most recent commentators on issues of politics, society, gender, and aesthetics.

GE 40675. Minority German Writers (in German)

(3-0-3) DellaRossa

This course explores German-language literature written by authors of non-German heritage. As a seminar it opens up the possibilities of reading a more diverse body of post-1945, and more specifically post-Wende German literature. Secondary texts will help us to understand the social and historical context in which these authors write. The primary reading selections will include works by authors of African, Turkish, Sorbian, Roma, and Arab heritages.

GE 40685. Twentieth-Century German Literature

(3-0-3) Hagens

This survey course introduces students to the major writers in 20th-century German-language literature. We will be reading, discussing, and writing about poems, short stories, and dramas by authors such as George, Hofmannsthal, Rilke, Trakl, Thomas Mann, Kafka, Musil, Brecht, Celan, Bachmann, Frisch, Durrenmatt, Enzensberger, Christa Wolf, Peter Schneider, Brinkmann, Hahn, and Königsdorf. By also considering these writers' contexts—the trends and movements they were part of, the activities in the other arts that influenced them, the contemporary discourses that surrounded them—we may be able to add depth and nuance to our readings. Thus, depending on student interest and ability, we will familiarize ourselves with the larger environs of 20th-century German-language culture. Taught in German.

GE 40850. Verbrechen, Detektion, und Gerechtigkeit im deutschen Kriminalroman

(3-0-3) McChesney

Verbrechen, Detektion, und Gerechtigkeit im deutschen Kriminalroman (Crime, Detection and Justice in the German Crime Story): Tales of crime and detection famously engage their readers in enthralling stories about perplexing criminal acts and the harrowing search to solve the crimes and to capture and judge the guilty. Through these depictions, German detective stories however also fundamentally challenge ideas of justice. They present the reader with questions such as: What is the source of justice? Which type of justice drives the detective? Which idea of justice determines the judgment? And, what happens when these ideas are at odds? In this course, we will look at the changing depictions of justice in German detective stories from 1786 to the present and how they cast a critical light on society. Each work will be read and discussed with careful attention to its formal characteristics as well as to the historical changes in the judicial system that are reflected in the works. Among the authors we will read are Schiller, Kleist, Hoffmann, Dürrenmatt, and Schlink.

GE 40855. German Drama 1750 to the Present (in German)

(3-0-3) Hagens

We will read and discuss some of the greatest plays in the German dramatic tradition, by authors such as Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, Kleist, Grillparzer, Nestroy, Freitag, Hauptmann, Hofmannsthal, Brecht, and Werfel. This semester we will focus on the so-called "drama of reconciliation," a newly rediscovered genre, where the conflict is serious but ends harmoniously. By interpreting classic German-language plays in the original, you will (1) learn how to approach drama analysis, and (2) develop a sense for the history of drama throughout the past 250 years. In addition, we will study a few short, and often English-language, texts in the theory of drama (Aristotle, Schelling, Carriere, and Cavell, as well as the department's own Höhle and Roche), which will (3) allow you to differentiate between the basic genres of drama (tragedy, comedy, and drama of reconciliation), and (4) better understand the nature of conflict and reconciliation. Students interested in other national literatures will have the opportunity to draw comparisons with plays by authors such as Aeschylus, Sophocles, Shakespeare, Calderon, Corneille, Racine, and Ibsen; and those interested in film may branch out into analyzing works by directors such as Hitchcock, Renoir, Ford, Capra, Curtiz, Hawks, Chaplin, and Kurosawa.

GE 40889. Literature and Religion

(3-0-3) Roche

Literature, according to Martin Walser, descends just as irrefutably from religion as human beings do from the apes. Indeed, there is no denying that even during aesthetic modernism, literature, art, and religion are closely intertwined. When art achieved autonomous status in the second half of the 18th century, it did, to be sure, shed its subservient function relative to religion, yet in terms of its topics, themes, and, most particularly, its claim to interpret and give meaning to human existence, literature remained tied to religion; in fact, became its great rival. This seminar will examine several stations of this development. Beginning with church hymns during the Renaissance and baroque, we will see how the Bible was discovered as a literary text in the 18th century. At the end of the century, art is conceived as an autonomous, even holy artifact. Poetry, for some, even becomes the medium of human self-definition and the place in which new myths are created. In the romantic period, art and religion become fused into a single unity. A century later, art and religion again come into close contact in lyric poetry of the fin-de-siècle. The seminar concludes with a consideration of the psalm form in 20th-century poetry. Readings will include works by Luther, Paul Gerhardt, Klopstock, Hölderlin, Wackenroder, Stefan George, Rilke, Trakl, Brecht, Celan, and Bachmann.

GE 40891. Evil and the Lie (English and German)

(3-0-3) Profit

In an attempt to define the nature of evil and its relation to such phenomena as lying and the preservation of a self-image, this seminar will carefully analyze works spanning the years 1890–1972. Among them will be Wilde, The Picture of Dorian Gray; Gide, The Immoralist; and Frisch, Andorra. Further courses acceptable for comparative literature majors will be found listed by the Department of English. Consultation of program director is required.

GE 40911. Self-Definition and Quest for Happiness in Continental and American Prose of the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3) Profit

Everyone from the ancients to the most technologically conscious CEOs tell us that those who succeed know the difference between the important and the unimportant and they allocate their time accordingly. But how does one make these choices? If, in fact, success and happiness are synonymous, as some would claim, which way lies success; lies happiness? And what are the guideposts? What really matters? In an age such as ours, does anything have lasting value? Do I really matter? If I am most assuredly defined by my beliefs and my deeds, what then do I believe, what do I do? In the final analysis, who am I? If literature, as so many maintain, not only mirrors but also foretells world events, how have several 20th-century authors representing diverse national traditions formulated the answers to these seminal questions? Readings will include F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Great Gatsby; Albert Camus, The Stranger; and Max Frisch, Homo Faber.

GE 40920. Hermeneutics and Literary Theory

(3-0-3) Dutt

What makes an interpretation of a literary text valid? The reconstruction of what the author meant by his text, intentionalists say. But does one understand enough if one just goes back to what the author had in mind, some anti-intentionalists ask. Both intentionalists and anti-intentionalists claim to derive their respective hermeneutic norms from insights into the nature of textual meaning in general and literary semantics in particular. This seminar will focus on the relationship between the theory and methodology of interpretation and literary theory. We will analyze major contributions by, among others, Hans-Georg Gadamer, E.D. Hirsch, Paul Ricœur, Frank Kermode, Umberto Eco, and Richard Rorty. Note: Readings in English and German, discussions in English.

GE 40928. Literary Criticism From Aristotle to Jakobson

(3-0-3) Hösle

The course will render the students familiar with some basic texts from two millennia. We will begin with Aristotle's Poetics, discuss Horace's Ars poetica and Longinus's On the Sublime. The medieval period will be represented by a work by Dante. A special focus will lie on the creation of modern literary criticism in German idealism, but we will also discuss post-idealistic works (including Nietzsche) and end with Roman Jakobson's groundbreaking structuralist approach to the nature of poetic language.

GE 40980. From Goethe to Nietzsche to Kafka: The Search for God in German Literature and Philosophy

(3-0-3) Hösle

One of the peculiarities of German culture is the strong connection between philosophy and literature; another the heroic attempt to develop a religion no longer based on authority, but on reason. We will discuss the main steps in this German quest for God, alternating philosophical and literary texts by authors such as Lessing, Goethe, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, and Kafka. Texts and discussions in English. Prerequisite: junior or senior standing

GE 40988. Plato Before The Republic

(3-0-3) Hösle

Plato is the philosopher most difficult to interpret. The range of his interests, the innovative nature and the complexity of his thought, finally the fact that he does not speak in first person adds to the difficulty. After a general introduction into the main problems and positions of Plato scholarship today, we will read some of his dialogues written before his most important work, The Republic, dealing with such various topics as virtues, the nature of art, the relation of ethics and religion, the politics of Athens, and the essence of knowledge. We will analyze both his arguments and the literary devices by which he communicates them and partly withholds and alludes to further ideas.

GE 40989. Philosophical Dialogues

(3-0-3) Hösle

Philosophy is communicated in different literary genres—as essays, treatises, didactic poems—the choice of which influences in a subtle manner the contents exposed. One of the most interesting literary genres used by philosophers is certainly the dialogue, since it allows to hide the author's mind behind a variety of different positions which get the chance to articulate themselves and since it shows the connection between philosophical ideas and discursive behavior. We shall read different texts ranging from Plato to Feyerabend to see how different philosophers have exploited the possibilities of this genre.

GE 43439. Goethe's Lives

(3-0-3) Hösle

Goethe is doubtless the greatest German poet. He was the last Renaissance man—a philosophical mind, a scientist, and a statesman, who has written some of the most sublime German literature in all three genres. But one of his greatest artworks was his own life. We will read his autobiography Dichtung und Wahrheit, which gives us a splendid overview of Germany's intellectually most prolific time, and his Italienische Reise, one of the most intense experiences of the essence of Italian culture ever. One of the focuses of the seminar will be on the literary transformation of biographical facts peculiar to all autobiographies, and to Goethe's in particular.

GE 43483. Seminar on German Women Writers (in German)

(3-0-3) DellaRossa

Participants in this seminar will explore the rich literary history of female writers from German-speaking Europe. We read works of many genres (drama, short story, novella, novel, letter) by women from the early Middle Ages to the present. In the process, we encounter Europe's first playwright, one of the 21st-century's brightest young literary stars, and an array of intriguing women who lived in the interim. We scrutinize and apply various theoretical and critical approaches to women's literature, both in writing and in lively debates.

GE 43499. German Literature Senior Seminar

(3-0-3)

Seminar devoted to the intensive study of selected works, periods, and genres of German literature.

GE 47498. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Under the supervision of the assigned instructor, this course permits a student to conduct research in a particular approved area of special studies.

GE 48499. Senior Thesis

(V-0-V) Staff

German majors who wish to graduate with honors may write a senior thesis. For those German majors who elect to write a thesis, several requirements must be met: (1) The student must have a GPA of 3.5 or higher in the major; (2) the thesis must be at least 30 pages long; and (3) the thesis must be written in German. The student writing a thesis enrolls in GE 48499 and receives one course credit (three credit hours) for the course. Although the thesis is graded by the advisor (to receive honors, the thesis must receive a grade of B+ or higher), a second faculty member reader acts in an advisory role to the advisor. The thesis is due the week after spring break, and the student is strongly advised to begin thinking about it and start conferring with the advisor before the October break of the fall term.

GE 53100. Literary Theory: Philology and Weltliteratur

(3-0-3) Buttigieg

The Literature Programs course on literary theory deals with theories of different time and places with emphasis on the critical problems that arise when what we call “literature” is investigated in a multicultural context. Issues that may be expected to arise include the following: the problems of translation, the meaning of metaphor, hermeneutics complexity, the meaning of the word “style” the relation between oral and written literatures. Eric Auerbach’s essay “Philology and Weltliteratur,” from which this course derives its title, serves as a point of departure for exploring the possibility of developing an approach to literary history and literary interpretation that: (a) attends to the historical, cultural, and aesthetic specificity of the individual literary work; and (b) at the same time, brings into relief the complex ways in which cultures interact, overlap, and modify one another. The course will focus primarily on the pertinent works of Vico, Herder, and the German romantics, Auerbach (and other historicists), Arnold, C.L.R. James, Raymond Williams, and Edward W. Said, as well as selections from the writings of Fanon, Ngugi, Lamming, Césaire, and others.

Russian

RU 10101. Beginning Russian I

(4-0-4) Gillespie; Marullo

No prerequisite. Develops students’ skills in listening, speaking, reading, and writing while also fostering an appreciation for Russian culture. (4-0-4) Gillespie; Marullo

Prerequisite: RU 10101

Continuation of Beginning Russian I. Develops students’ skills in listening, speaking, reading, and writing while also fostering an appreciation for Russian culture. Emphasis is placed on the acquisition of basic structures, vocabulary, and sound systems. Students will be encouraged to use their language skills to communicate and interact in a variety of situations and contexts.

RU 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3) Staff

This course introduces students to Russian literature and culture while also serving as an introduction to the seminar method of instruction. The course is writing-intensive, with emphasis given to improving students’ writing skills through the careful analysis of specific texts.

RU 20101. Intermediate Russian I

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

Prerequisite: RU 10102

This is the first half of a two-semester review of Russian grammar designed to facilitate a near-native proficiency with the form and function of Russian nouns, verbs, and adjectives. Exceptional forms are stressed, and reading selections on contemporary Russian life and excerpts from literature are employed to improve comprehension and build conversational and writing skills.

RU 20102. Intermediate Russian II

(3-0-3) Peeney; Gasperetti

Prerequisite: RU 20101

This is the second half of a two-semester review of Russian grammar designed to facilitate a near-native proficiency with the form and function of Russian nouns, verbs, and adjectives. Exceptional forms are stressed, and reading selections on contemporary Russian life and excerpts from literature are employed to improve comprehension and build conversational and writing skills.

RU 23500. Chance or Choice: Fate and Free Will in Russian Literature (in English)

(3-0-3) Peeney

No prerequisite. The opposition of fate vs. free will is central to matters of philosophy, religion, ethics, and science, and the same opposition figures in the sphere of our daily lives as well. Common phrases such as “It’s meant to be” and “I can make it happen” shape our parlance in terms of fate and free will. This course will explore the complex interaction of these seemingly contradictory concepts as they are particularly manifested in Russian literature and the arts. We will analyze these themes broadly, tracing them through 19th and 20th-century Russian literary history and connecting them to major ideas such as romantic will and Marxist determinism. We will also consider the interplay of destiny and chance in the context of the private realm, framing individual characters’ fates in terms of certain rituals of Russian culture, such as card games, fortune-telling, and dueling. The reading list will include works by major Russian authors and thinkers such as Pushkin, Dostoevsky, Bulgakov, and Nabokov.

RU 30101. The Literature of Imperial Russia I (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. The first part of a two-semester survey of long and short fiction focusing on the rise of realism in Russia. Topics to be included are the content and method of realism (“gentry,” “urban,” “classical,” “romantic,” “empirical,” and “psychological”); the evolution of the “family” chronicle; the nature and development of the Russian hero and heroine, particularly the “superfluous man,” “the philosophical rebel,” the “man-god,” and the “moral monster”; the interplay of “patriarchal,” “matriarchal,” and “messianic” voices; the dynamics of the Russian soul and soil; the interaction of lord and peasant; the premonition of catastrophe and Apocalypse; and finally, the conflict between city and country, “old” and “new,” Russia and the West. Daily readings and discussions. Several papers, projects, and exams.

RU 30102. The Literature of Imperial Russia II (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. The second part of a two-semester survey of long and short fiction and focusing on the rise of realism in Russia. Topics to be included are the content and method of realism (“gentry,” “urban,” “classical,” “romantic,” “empirical,” and “psychological”); the evolution of the “family” chronicle; the nature and development of the Russian hero and heroine, particularly the “superfluous man,” “the philosophical rebel,” the “man-god,” and the “moral monster”; the interplay of “patriarchal,” “matriarchal,” and “messianic” voices; the dynamics of the Russian soul and soil; the interaction of lord and peasant; the premonition of catastrophe and Apocalypse; and finally, the conflict between city and country, “old” and “new,” Russia and the West. Daily readings and discussions. Several papers, projects, and exams.

RU 30103. Literature of the Russian Revolution, 1900–25 (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. Literature of the Russian Revolution (in English) focuses on the national written expression that attended the explosion in the arts in Russia in the first 30 years of the 20th century, e.g., Stravinsky in music, Diaghilev in ballet, and Benois, Goncharova, Chagall, and Larionov in art. Readings include the “decadence” of Ivan Bunin, Leonid Andreev, and Feodor Sollogub; the “proletarian” writings of Maxim Gorky; the “symbolism” of Andrei Bely and Alexander Blok; and the “modernism” of Mikhail Kuzmin, Evgeny Zamiatin, Vladimir Maiakovsky, Isaac Babel, and Boris Pilniak. (Bunin was the first Russian writer to be awarded the Nobel Prize in literature; Zamiatin’s novel, WE, was the model for the anti-utopian fiction of Orwell and Huxley; Bely is the Russian James Joyce). Topics to be considered are the content and method of Russian “decadence,” “symbolism,” and “modernism”; the “lost” man and woman in the early 20th century; the conflict between city and country, “old” and “new,” Russia and the West; the dynamics of revolution, catastrophe, and apocalypse; the nature of “imprisonment,” “liberation,” and “exile” (physical, social, spiritual, and aesthetic); the interplay of “patriarchal,” “maternal,” and “messianic” voices; the form and function of anti-utopian themes, psychological investigation, and the grotesque; the yearning for “ancient” Russia and the dismay at the new Soviet state; links to “modern” Russian painting, music, and ballet; and the critique of modernity and its implications for humankind. Daily readings and discussions; several small papers, projects, and exams. The course is designed to sharpen students’ aesthetic and analytical capabilities, improve their reading comprehension, and strengthen their written and oral skills.

RU 30104. Literature of Russian Dissidence, 1927–90 (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. The second half of a yearlong survey of 20th-century Russian literature, this course focuses on literature as protest against Soviet totalitarianism and as an assertion of the freedom and dignity of the individual in the face of challenges from the state and from “modern life.”

RU 30201. Dostoevsky (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. This course is an intensive, in-depth survey of the major long and short fiction of one of the world's greatest and most provocative writers. Readings include: The House of the Dead (1862); The Notes From the Underground (1864); Crime and Punishment (1866); and The Brothers Karamazov (1879–80). Topics to be discussed: the evolution of the Dostoevskian hero and heroine within the context of the writer's fiction, as well as within the social and literary polemics of the age; the content and method of both “urban” and “psychological” realism; the interplay of “patriarchal,” “matriarchal,” and “messianic” voices; the dynamics of Russian soul and soil; the conflict between city and country, “old” and “new,” Russia and the West; the influence of the “saint's tale,” the “family chronicle,” the “detective story,” and the genres of journalism and drama on Dostoevsky's writing; and the writer's political, theological, and epistemological visions, in particular, his distrust of behavior (i.e., co-dependency, sadomasochism, sexual perversion, and the like); and his endorsement of so-called “Pauline mysticism.” The first three weeks of the course will focus on Dostoevsky's early fiction, the thesis being that many of the ideas, images, and themes of the writer's major novels were rooted in the early experiments of both his “Petersburg” and “Siberian” periods. Daily readings and discussions. Several small papers, projects, and exams.

RU 30202. Tolstoy (in English)

(3-0-3) Marullo

No prerequisite. Tolstoy in English is an intensive, in-depth survey of the major long and short fiction of one of the world's greatest and most provocative writers. Readings include Childhood, Boyhood, Youth (1852–57), The Sevastopol Tales (1855–56), The Cossacks (1863), War and Peace (1865–69), Anna Karenina (1875–77), The Death of Ivan Ilyich (1886), The Kreutzer Sonata (1889), Master and Man (1895), Father Sergius (1898), and Hadji Murad (1904). Topics to be discussed: the evolution of the Tolstoyan hero and heroine within the context of the writer's fiction, as well as with the social and literary polemics of the age; the interplay of “patriarchal,” “matriarchal,” and “messianic” voices; the dynamics of Russian soul and soil; the conflict between city and country, “old” and “new,” Russia and the West; and the writer's political, theological, and epistemological visions, in particular, his theory of history, his defense of the family, his endorsement of “rational egoism,” and his distrust of socially inspired “great men” in life.

RU 30301. Confessions in Russian Literature

(3-0-3) Peeney

No prerequisite. This course explores the confessional mode of narration in various manifestations, beginning with some of the earliest forms of Russian writing comprising the lives of saints, and ending with the famous American novel by a Russian émigré writer: Nabokov's masterpiece Lolita. The narrators of the selected works pick up their pens for various reasons: to ease one's conscience; to justify oneself; to instruct the wayward; to create art. We will challenge the aesthetic efficacy of these motivations to confess, and discuss the unique features of first-person narration. We will explore the repetitions and innovations in these themes over the course of centuries and trace their progress into a distinctly American novel.

RU 30510. One Thousand Years of Russian Culture (in English)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

In 1939 Winston Churchill famously called Russia “a riddle, wrapped in a mystery, inside an enigma.” This course is an introduction to the mysteries of Russian culture from medieval times to the present that are often overlooked in surveys of Western European art, literature, and culture. Through our explorations into the Russian religious tradition, painting, music, architecture, dance, cinema, folk art and folk tales, proverbs and superstitions, intellectual debates, socio-political movements, and of course literature, we will explore the ways in which Russians define themselves and their place in the world, and how they experience and express their cultural uniqueness as well as their ties to both East and West. By the end of the course, students will be able to trace certain patterns of belief and sensibility in Russian culture that persist in spite of the country's long history of succumbing to sudden, revolutionary change. Literary readings for the course will range from the ancient historical chronicles and lives of early Russian saints, to short works by such classic Russian authors as Pushkin, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov, to poems and stories by several contemporary authors. Course materials will also include a background textbook on Russian history and culture and frequent audio-visual, Internet, and musical presentations.

RU 30515. Russian Realms: Societies/Cultures of Eastern Europe and Beyond (in English)

(3-0-3) Gaffney

No prerequisite. This course explores the social structures, the historical contexts, and the symbolic universes of the peoples who either identify themselves as Russian or whose way of life has come to be deeply affected by the Russian tradition. It concentrates on those territories that were formerly incorporated into the Tsarist Empire and subsequently formed parts of the Soviet Union. It will include an examination of the extensive efforts by Russian thinkers to characterize their own national spirit, reflecting, for example, on classic and contemporary attempts to define dusha, or a distinctively Russian “soul,” as well as some of the consequences of these formulations, looking at this famous “civilization” question through art, literature, and film as well as social science works. However, the chief approach of the course will be through reading of anthropological studies that have addressed the larger questions from numerous specific local venues. A strong emphasis will also be placed on the so-called current “transition period,” as a new Russia in the neighborhood of the “commonwealth of independent states” seeks to reshape its heritage amid complex problems arising from social, economic, political, and cultural factors, not to mention old ghosts of global rivalry, terrorism, and disputed legitimacy.

RU 33301. Brothers Karamazov (in English)

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

No prerequisite. This course is a multifaceted investigation into the philosophical, political, psychological, religious, and literary determinants of Fyodor Dostoevsky's longest and most complex novel, The Brothers Karamazov. Emphasis is placed on daily, in-depth discussions based on a close reading of the text. Additional assignments illuminate a variety of themes in the novel, from the author's visionary political predictions and rejection of West European materialism to his critique of rationalism and insistence on the link between faith and morality.

RU 33401. Russian Women Memoirists (in English)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

No prerequisite. Throughout the history of Russian literature, the genres of autobiography, memoir, and diary have provided a venue for women to find their voices in a private arena safely distanced from the privileged genres of novels and lyric poetry. This course examines the history and development of the female memoir in Russian literature, from the 18th-century memoirs of a courtier of Catherine the Great to documents of the Stalinist terror and prison camp life of the 20th century. We also will address theoretical questions about women's autobiographical writing and consider the relationship of the works we read to the dominant “male” literary tradition.

RU 33450. Progress, Prosperity, (In)Justice: The Plight of the Individual in Nineteenth-Century Literature (in English)

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

No prerequisite. Analyzes a seminal transition in Western society as it moves from an agrarian world centered around the rural estate to an urban culture built on industry and commerce. Literary texts emphasize the physical, psychological, and moral consequences to the individual of the decline of the estate, the rise of capitalism, the nontraditional nature of life and work in the city, various challenges to the established order (socialism, anarchism), and changing notions of gender. Texts include Daniel Defoe, Robinson Crusoe; Nikolai Gogol, “The Overcoat”; Eugene Sue, The Mysteries of Paris (excerpts); Leo Tolstoy, Childhood; Charles Dickens, Hard Times; Horatio Alger, Ragged Dick; Emile Zola, Germinal and Henrik Ibsen, A Doll’s House. Nonliterary texts used to support the literary depiction of the era include John Locke, “Of Property,” Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (excerpts); Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, The Communist Manifesto; and Henry Mayhew, London Labour and the London Poor (excerpts).

RU 33520. Post-Soviet Russian Cinema (in English)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

No prerequisite. Freed from the constraints of Soviet-era censorship, since 1990, Russian filmmakers have exploited the unique qualities of the film medium in order to create compelling portraits of a society in transition. The films we will watch cover a broad spectrum: reassessing Russia’s rich pre-Revolutionary cultural heritage as well as traumatic periods in Soviet history (World War II, the Stalinist era); grappling with formerly taboo social issues (gender roles, anti-Semitism, alcoholism); taking an unflinching look at new social problems resulting from the breakdown of the Soviet system (the rise of neo-fascism, the war in Chechnya, organized crime); and meditating on Russia’s current political and cultural dilemmas (the place of non-Russian ethnicities within Russia, Russians’ love-hate relationship with the West). From this complex cinematic patchwork emerges a picture of a new, raw Russia, as yet confused and turbulent, but full of vitality and promise for the future. Short readings supplement the film component of the course. Film screenings optional; films will also be available on reserve.

RU 40101. Advanced Russian I (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

Prerequisite: RU 20102

This yearlong course is designed to significantly improve students’ comprehension and self-expression skills in Russian, serving as a preparation for Russian literature courses in the original. The fall semester will include an intensive review of Russian grammar; Russian stylistics, syntax, and grammar at the advanced level; reading and analysis of a wide range of 19th-century Russian literary texts; writing essays in Russian; and extensive work on vocabulary building and advanced conversation skills.

RU 40102. Advanced Russian II (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

Prerequisite: RU 40101

This yearlong course is designed to significantly improve students’ comprehension and self-expression skills in Russian, serving as a preparation for Russian literature courses in the original. The spring semester will include an intensive review of Russian grammar; Russian stylistics, syntax, and grammar at the advanced level; reading and analysis of a wide range of 20th-century literary texts writing essays in Russian; and extensive work on vocabulary building and advanced conversation skills.

RU 40301. Confessions in Russian Literature—Language Across the Curriculum Tutorial

(1-0-1) Peeney

Prerequisite: RU 20101

Corequisite: RU 30301

This 1-credit tutorial is open to students enrolled in RU 30301 Confessions of Saints, Sinners, and Madmen in Russian Literature. Students in the LAC tutorial will gain the additional benefit of analyzing excerpts of the course readings in the original Russian. This experience will deepen their knowledge of Russian and strengthen their grasp of the texts as they learn the nuances that are lost in translation. Furthermore, one of the lines of inquiry in the course centers on whether Nabokov’s American novel fits into the tradition of the Russian confessional. The LAC students will have a chance to read portions of Nabokov’s own translation of his masterpiece into Russian to learn whether and how the author made adaptations for a Russian audience. The readings for the supplemental tutorial will be limited in scope, suited to the language level of students who enroll (4–6 pages assigned per class period). Writing assignments for the tutorial will be in English and will consist of short reflection papers that compare the original texts and their translations. LAC students will also have the opportunity to incorporate analysis of the original Russian texts into their already required analytical papers for RU 30301. Up to three LAC tutorial credits can be applied toward a major, supplemental major, or minor in Russian or a minor in Russian and East European Studies. Graded pass/fail.

RU 43101. Nineteenth-Century Russian Literature Survey (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

Prerequisite: RU 40102

Introduces the major movements and authors of the 19th century. Special attention is given to the genesis of the modern tradition of Russian literature in the first half of the century and to the role literary culture played in the political and social ferment of the era. Readings, discussions, and written assignments are in Russian and English.

RU 43102. Twentieth-Century Russian Literature Survey (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

Prerequisite: RU 40102

This course surveys the generic richness, stylistic innovation, and political intrusion into literature that defined Russian literary culture in the first six decades of the 20th century. It introduces such movements/periods as symbolism, acmeism, futurism, the “fellow travelers,” socialist realism, and the “thaw.” Readings, discussions, and written assignments are in Russian and English.

RU 43204. Pushkin

(3-0-3) Gillespie

Prerequisite: RU 40102

This course is an introduction to the life and works of the great Russian poet Alexander Pushkin, often called the father of Russian literature. Through a reading and discussion of selections from Pushkin’s lyric verse, narrative poetry, drama, and prose, students will gain an appreciation for Pushkin’s extraordinary literary imagination and innovativeness, as well as his significance for the history of Russian literature as a whole. Attention will be given to Pushkin’s evolving understanding of his role as Russia’s national poet, including such themes in his work as the beauty of the Russian countryside, the poet’s sacred calling, political repression and the dream of civic freedom, Russia’s relationship to East and West, the dialectic between chance and fate, St. Petersburg and the specter of Revolution, and the subversive power of art. Prerequisite: Russian 40102 or permission of the instructor.

RU 43208. Chekhov (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

Prerequisite: RU 40102

This course is an introduction to the short stories and plays of Anton Chekhov, with attention to the development of his art of characterization, dialogue, plot construction, and innovative dramatic technique. Central themes of the course will be alienation and banality in Chekhov’s works, Chekhov’s attitude to science and progress, and his views on the future of Russia. A portion of the semester will be largely devoted to the reading and performance (in Russian) of one of Chekhov’s plays.

RU 43405. Russian Romanticism (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gillespie

Prerequisite: RU 40102

This course introduces students to the literature of Russian romanticism, which came into being at the turn of the 19th century, dominated Russian literature in the 1820s and was still influential well into the latter part of the century. Inspired by Russian writers’ encounters with English, German, and French romantic literature, Russian romanticism was, paradoxically, the first literary movement in Russia that sought to develop a definitively national, uniquely Russian literature and literary language. We will explore this quest for a national literature in light of Russian romanticism’s Western influences. In so doing, we will study works of poetry, fiction, drama, and literary criticism by a diverse group of romantic writers including Vasily Zhukovsky, Alexander Pushkin, Nikolai Gogol, Mikhail Lermontov, Karolina Pavlova, Fedor Tiutchev, Afanasy Fet, and others. Themes of the course will include the national and the exotic, the natural and the supernatural, rebellion and social alienation, violence, and passion.

RU 43416. Modernity in Shorts: The Modern Short Story in Russian Literature (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Peeney

Prerequisite: RU 40102

The term “modern” is notoriously difficult to define for a number of reasons. It suggests both a period of time and an artistic movement that embodies certain principles of creation. Depending on the set of criteria, “modernity” might begin anywhere from the middle of the 19th century to the beginning of World War I, and “modern” may indicate simply a break with tradition or suggest a more complex set of characteristics. In a similar way, the short story as a genre is often reductively defined in terms of a number of pages, but certain qualities separate the short story from other short prose forms. This course will combine these two contentious concepts and consider a selection of Russian short prose pieces from the 19th century up until 1932, when the Soviet Union adopted socialist realism as its official artistic method. We will consider the stories in terms of content and form in an effort to determine what constitutes the Russian modern short story.

RU 43450. Models of Exile in Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Russian Literature (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Peeney

Prerequisite: RU 40102

The Russian writer’s relationship to Russia is traditionally a source of artistic inspiration and contemplation for the author. When that relationship is complicated by reform, revolution, oppression and/or banishment, it becomes an even more fascinating thread of investigation. This course will explore exiled authors and models of exile in (or outside of) the Russian context, beginning with Pushkin, who was exiled twice in his lifetime, and whose artistic identity was tied to the tradition of romanticism and romantic exile. This 19th-century model of exile will be compared to 20th-century examples of exile beginning with the inception of what would become of the Soviet empire. The revolution of 1917 marked the beginning of waves of emigration that brought some of Russia’s most talented artists outside its borders, others under the yoke of an oppressive regime within the cities, and some banished to Siberia. We will study the themes of exile, exilic imagination, and the artistic expression of one’s relationship to mother Russia, as written most famously by authors such as Pushkin, Nabokov, Bunin and Brodsky.

RU 43501. St. Petersburg as Russian Cultural Icon (in Russian)

(3-0-3) Gasperetti

Prerequisite: RU 40102

Uses St. Petersburg’s rich cultural heritage to investigate Russia’s struggle for national identity. Areas to be covered include literature (Pushkin, Gogol, Dostoevsky, Blok, Akhmatova, Zamiatin), painting (Repin, Surikov, Malevich), music (Stravinsky, Shostakovich) and film (Eisenstein).

RU 46101. Directed Reading

(3-0-3)

Directed reading course.

RU 47100. Area Studies Enrichment

(1-0-1)

Students enrolled in this course will be required to attend at least five lectures and/or cultural enrichment events (films, concerts, art exhibits, etc.) relevant to Russian and East European Studies, and then write a 1-page report summarizing each event and what they learned from it.

RU 47101. Area Studies Thesis Research and Writing I

(1.5-0-1.5)

Fall semester research in Russian and East European area studies. By the end of the semester, the student will be expected to produce an annotated bibliography of sources, a thesis statement, and an outline/proposal for the research project as a whole.

RU 47102. Area Studies Thesis Research and Writing II

(1.5-0-1.5)

Spring semester research in Russian and East European area studies. Working closely with the faculty advisor, the student will produce a polished final draft of the area studies thesis.

RU 48410. Honors Thesis Research and Writing I

(1.5-0-1.5)

Thesis writers work closely with their advisor, who guides them through the bulk of their research and the initial stages of writing the thesis. Goals to be accomplished in the first semester include the submission of a thesis statement and one-paragraph introduction by October 1, a two-page prospectus and an annotated bibliography by November 15, and 10 pages of the thesis by the end of the semester.

RU 48420. Honors Thesis Research and Writing II

(1.5-0-1.5)

Working closely with an advisor, the student completes the research and writing of the honors thesis. Goals to be accomplished in the second semester include the submission of the completed thesis to the advisor in mid-March (the first Monday after spring break), submission of the final draft of the thesis incorporating the revisions suggested by the advisor (Monday of the last full week of classes), and the candidate’s oral defense of the thesis before the faculty of the Russian section (approximately one week after the submission of the final draft).

Department of Romance Languages and Literatures

LLRO 10101. Beginning Quechua I

(4-0-4)

The principal aims of this beginning-level Quechua language course are to encourage the development of competency and proficiency in listening, speaking, reading, writing, and to generate cultural understanding. LLRO 10101 taken in connection with LLRO 10102 and 20201 fulfill the language requirement.

LLRO 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction, emphasizing the analysis of literary texts.

LLRO 27201. Special Studies: Intermediate Quechua I

(3-0-3)

An intermediate-level, third-semester college language course with emphasis on and refinement of grammatical competence and oral and written language skills. Class time is dedicated to interactive discussion encouraging the development of language proficiency and generating cultural understanding.

LLRO 30123. King Arthur in History and Literature

(3-0-3)

This course, intended to introduce undergraduates to one of the major themes, as well as to the interdisciplinary approaches characteristic of medieval studies, is a team-taught examination of the development and influence of the legend of Arthur, King of Britain, both in history and in literature.

LLRO 30125. Arthurian Literature in France and England

(3-0-3)

Survey of Arthurian literature.

LLRO 30592. Humor in European Film

(0-0-0)

To provide a forum for exploring this contemporary theme of humor in European film, the Nanovic Institute is hosting a series of films and lectures, followed by a 1-credit course open to Notre Dame students. This film series will allow the students to explore the cultural, historical, and ideological or political dimensions of humor.

LLRO 30610. Of Sans-Culottes and Saint-Domingue: Revolution in France and Haiti

(3-0-3) Douthwaite

This course will take an interdisciplinary literary-historical approach to revolutionary movements that electrified populations around the world: the revolt of the sans-culottes in France (1789–94) and the slave uprisings in colonial Saint-Domingue (1791–1804). Through analysis of short stories and novels by authors such as Condorcet, Balzac, and Hugo, and readings in 19th-century and modern-day historiography by scholars such as Michelet, Soboul, James, and Dubois, students will appreciate the controversies that have perplexed observers for centuries.

LLRO 30800. Rome: Journey in Art and History

(3-0-3)

This class is an exploration of the history and culture of Rome from late medieval times through the 20th century, with an emphasis on art and architecture. We will examine the urban panorama of the Eternal City through a series of layered investigations of its major sites and monuments such as the Capitoline Hill, St. Peter's and the Vatican complex, the Lateran, and Santa Maria Maggiore. We will read travelers' descriptions and literary evocations of the city with a view to reliving the enchantment of Rome, and the "idea" of Rome, through the ages. In addition to our readings and lectures, members of the class will have an opportunity to develop projects on objects, structures, or works of art of their own choosing.

LLRO 40040. Introduction to Linguistics

(3-0-3)

This course requires no previous study of linguistics. It serves as an introduction to the most basic elements of human language. Students will have the opportunity to analyze the word order and sound systems of various languages of the world. Each student will have the option of focusing investigations on one language in particular. Through this course, they will "discover" universal rules that govern all languages of the world. Finally, the course will take a brief look at how both first and second languages are learned, both inside and outside of the classroom. Students of all languages are strongly encouraged to register for this course.

LLRO 40105. France and England in the Hundred Years War

(3-0-3)

The course will examine in depth some of the major works of English and French literature in the period of the Hundred Years War, when each country defined its sense of national identity, and will set these works in their cultural, social, and political context.

LLRO 40106. Latin and Vernacular Codicology

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the variety of medieval books including Bibles, liturgical books, classical texts, manuals of theology and philosophy, song books, romances, and epics.

LLRO 40107. Meaning, Vulnerability, and Human Identity: the Relationship Between Theological and Literary Reflections

(3-0-3)

This course explores the contribution that the coming together of theological and literary reflection can make to our understanding of the nature of meaning. Focusing on the work of Augustine, Aquinas, Dante, Primo Levi, Dostoevsky, and Shakespeare, students will address questions such as "What is it we are doing when speaking, reading, or using language?" "How do the intellect and the imagination work in relation to literary texts?" "How might all this relate to our ways of thinking about God, human nature, and the relationship between them?" Such questions will be addressed, in particular, through reflection on how the texts studied invite us to think about the nature of love, forgiveness, vulnerability, and creativity.

LLRO 40115. Dante I

(3-0-3)

Dante I and Dante II are an in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical, and literary context, with selected readings from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, and De vulgari eloquentia). Dante I focuses on the Inferno and the minor works; Dante II focuses on the Purgatorio and Paradiso. Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation. Students may take one semester or both, in either order.

LLRO 40116. Dante II

(3-0-3)

Dante I and Dante II are an in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical, and literary context, with selected readings from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, and De vulgari eloquentia). Dante I focuses on the Inferno and the minor works; Dante II focuses on the Purgatorio and Paradiso. Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation. Students may take one semester or both, in either order.

LLRO 40120. Words and Music: Lyric Poetry of the Middle Ages

(3-0-3)

This course will explore medieval poetry set to music in Latin and vernacular languages, including French, Provençal, Spanish, Italian, and English

LLRO 40125. King Arthur in European Literature

(3-0-3) Boulton

We will read representative works chosen from the major medieval European literary traditions, including, for example Latin (Geoffrey of Monmouth), English (Lawman, Malory), French (Chrétien de Troyes, the Vulgate Cycle), Spanish (La Tragedia de Lançolot, Tristán), German (Hartmann von Aue, Gottfried von Strassburg), and Italian (La Tavola Ritonda, Tristan Panciaticchiano).

LLRO 40145. Dante I

(3-0-3)

The course will be a journey inside the ultimate nightmare in the whole history of literature: Dante's Inferno—a prison for eternity, accurately subdivided like a model dungeon, perfectly organized, with no possible evasions, no bribery to the guardians, no leagues between inmates, crossed through by two traveling poets, one of them relating his trip with outstanding precision, the other guiding him after rescuing him and becoming one of the great characters of the entire poem. We will study this great metaphor of a cosmic incarceration created by Dante's genius, and the amazing variety of the world of the convicted felons, and the philosophical ideas that rule this descent into the womb of the Earth where Lucifer, the utmost convict, lies.

LLRO 40212. Primo Levi: Language, Ethics, and the Pursuit of Knowledge

(3-0-3)

This course explores the work of Primo Levi, focusing especially on his writings on the Shoah. It addresses, in particular, the questions that such writings raise concerning the nature of meaning, suffering, creativity, and freedom. As such, the course invites students to consider the nature of the relationship between literature and the study of literature, on the one hand, and reflection concerning the nature of human community and identity, on the other.

LLRO 40230. Renaissance Woman

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It considers the image of women in the writings of male authors, as well as the work of female authors.

LLRO 40542. Comedy, Italian Style!

(3-0-3)

An exploration of comic traditions in Italy: the popular film genre known as "comedy, Italian style" is analyzed in its historical development in the 1950s and 60s, together with Italian film comedies from the silent period through the present. Roberto Benigni's new film version of Pinocchio, for example, released in the United States in December of 2002, extends a long line of comic genius. The commedia dell'arte, Goldoni's comedy of manners, and the political farce of Nobel Prize winner Dario Fo provide further examples of a comic tradition that continues to be a vital force of aesthetic pleasure and political comment. Requirements include attendance at mandatory film screenings, participation in class discussions, a number of short papers, and midterm and final exams. The class will be conducted in English.

LLRO 40545. Italian National Cinema

(3-0-3) Welle

Corequisite: ROIT 41505

Conducted in English, this course examines the concept and reality of "national cinema" in the Italian case. A history of one of the world's most renowned national cinemas, focusing on the construction of national identity in film.

LLRO 40548. Italian Cinema: Realities of History

(3-0-3)

This course explores the construction and development of the Italian cinematic realist tradition from the silent era to the early 1970s, although its primary focus is on the period 1934–66, which stretches from the appearance of Blasetti's openly fascist "historical" reconstruction, La vecchia guardia, to Pasolini's "eccentric" exercise in Left-wing commitment, Uccellacci e uccellini, with its mix of expressionist and hyper-realist techniques. At the centre of this period are found some of Italy's most highly regarded films made by directors, such as Vittorio DeSica, Roberto Rossellini, and Luchino Visconti, who belonged to the neo-realist movement (1945–53). These filmmakers rejected escapist cinema and tried to make films that examined the contemporary experiences of ordinary Italians. As well as analyzing the films in themselves, the course examines the formal and ideological continuities and differences between neo-realist films and their silent and fascist predecessors. In a similar way, it analyses neo-realism's impact on later filmmakers, such as Federico Fellini, Pietro Germi, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Gillo Pontecorvo, Dino Risi, and Francesco Rosi, who attempted to develop new versions of cinematic realism. Finally, the course aims to locate the films in their historical and cultural contexts and to address theoretical issues arising from the concept of realism.

LLRO 40560. Brazilian Film and Popular Music

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This course provides insights into 20th- and 21st-century Brazilian history, culture, and politics through film, photography, literature, and popular music. Topics discussed include Samba, Bossa Nova, Tropicalia, and the reception of Cinema Novo and of the new Brazilian Cinema. Special attention will be paid to Tropicalia (a movement with key manifestations in the visual arts, cinema, popular music, and literature) and the circumstances surrounding its creation, including the repressive military regime that governed Brazil from 1964 to 1985. This course satisfies the fine arts requirement and is cross-listed in FTT. Offered in English.

LLRO 40655. Italy in Modern Europe

(3-0-3)

The course will treat the cultural, literary, artistic, and political relationships between Italy and the rest of Europe in the modern period (since the Renaissance). Central concerns will be the presence and influence of masterpieces of Italian literature both in translation and in the original Italian in other European countries, and the image of Italy (and in particular of Rome) in the religious polemics (Catholic/Protestant) of modern Europe.

LLRO 40906. French Literature Goes to the Opera

(3-0-3) MacKenzie

In this course, the full title of which is Taking Liberties: From Book to Libretto, or French Literature Goes to the Opera, and which is taught in English, we will be looking at a series of parent texts, written originally in French, and their operatic offspring. Works include The Barber of Seville (Beaumarchais/Rossini), The Marriage of Figaro (Beaumarchais/Mozart), Don Juan (Molière), Don Giovanni (Mozart), Manon Lescaut (Prévost/Puccini), and Carmen (Mérimée/Bizet).

LLRO 40955. Dictatorships in Luso-Brazilian Fiction and Film

(3-0-3)

This course offers a literary and cinematic study of 20th-century dictatorships in Brazil and Portugal, with readings in Luso-Brazilian fiction, history, film, and cultural theory. Authors studied include Loyola Brandao, Antonio Callado, Ivan Angelo, Fernando Gabeira, Antonio Lobo Antunes, Lidia Jorge, Maria Isabel Barreno, et al, and Artur Portela. Viewing of films by Maria de Medeiros, Manoel de Oliveira, Joao Botelho, Glauber Rocha, Sergio Rezende and Bruno Barreto. Offered in English (discussion group in Portuguese).

LLRO 40956. Carnival in Cinema and Literature

(3-0-3)

Brazil has tantalized our imagination with images of Samba and Carnival. This course explores Brazilian culture by investigating the ways in which the celebrations of Carnival have been viewed, articulated, and unsettled by film and literature. Along with major films, documentaries, and literary works, we examine contemporary sociological and anthropological writing that contributes to our understanding of Carnivals within and beyond Brazil. We learn how key issues in Brazilian society (class, race, and gender relations; national identity; rituals and symbol; values; and social roles) play out in Carnival. Course offered in English.

LLRO 40957. Transnational Immigration in European Cinema
(3-0-3)Corequisite: LLRO 41957

This seminar will examine fundamental aspects of immigration in the European Union and the way this is represented in contemporary film. This course is loosely divided in four thematic units. The first unit will consider (1) the paradox where, on the one hand, the European Union, in its constant growth, promotes a cosmopolitan, borderless society, while, on the other hand, it attempts to curb what it considers an invasion by the immigrant other. In the second unit, we will examine (2) the legacies of France's and England's colonial past and how second- and third-generation national subjects enrich and complicate the countries' cultural terrains. In addition, we will also examine how the effects of Germany's gasterbeiter (guest worker) program were initially represented in German cinema of the 1970s. In the second half of the course, we will study how (3) the immigration wave of the early 1990s affected the southern European countries of Spain, Italy, and Greece, and how the massive influx of immigrants challenges each country's preconceived notion of a homogeneously imagined community. We will spend the last part of the semester concentrating on (4) subtler issues of nation, gender, politics, and religion, and the possible solutions that directors offer in the beginning of the 21st century as a way of escaping the ideological and cultural impasse of the end of the 20th century.

LLRO 40981. Short Fiction Across the Atlantic: Brazil, Portugal, and Lusophone Africa

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This is a comparative study of short prose fiction in the Portuguese-speaking world, with special emphasis on theoretical issues related to this literary genre. Authors studied include Machado de Assis, Joao Guimaraes Rosa, Clarice Lispector, Mario de Sa-Carneiro, Miguel Torga, and Luandino Vieira. Texts and discussions in English.

LLRO 40983. Immigrant Voices in Modern Brazilian Literature
(3-0-3)

This course examines literary perspectives on the European and non-European immigrant experience in Brazil and addresses fundamental questions that have occupied major contemporary Brazilian authors: How do we recreate a sense of home after having lost it? What makes us feel at home in a new place or country? How do we adapt to relocations of home? We will search for answers in the fiction of Milton Hatoum, Elisa Lispector, Salim Miguel, Ana Miranda, Raduan Nassar, Nelida Pinon, Samuel Rawet, and Moacyr Scliar. Conducted in English with readings in Portuguese or English (discussion groups available in Portuguese.)

LLRO 40997. Portuguese Colonialism Revisited

(3-0-3)

With readings from Brazil, Angola, Mozambique, and Portugal, this course examines colonialism and its aftermath in Africa in light of postcolonial fiction and contemporary sociological and anthropological writing from the Lusophone world. The course brings the Lusophone experience, with its important varieties yet overlooked implications, into broader debates in the field of postcolonial studies. Course conducted in English with readings in Portuguese and/or English.

LLRO 40998. Fictions of the South Atlantic

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Taught in English, this seminar offers a comparative study of 19th-, 20th-, and 21st-century fiction writing in the Lusophone South Atlantic, particularly exploring the historical connections and the cultural links between Brazil and Angola.

LLRO 41512. Comedy, Italian Style! Lab

(0-2-0)

LLRO 41545. Italian National Cinema Lab

(3-1-4)

Corequisite: LLRO 40545

Conducted in English, this is the lab component of the course that examines the concept and reality of "national cinema" in the Italian case. A history of one of the world's most renowned national cinemas focusing on the construction of national identity in film.

LLRO 41548. Italian Cinema: Realities of History: Lab

(2-0-0)

Corequisite: LLRO 40548

xxxThis is the lab component of the course that explores the construction and development of the Italian cinematic realist tradition from the silent era to the early 1970s, although its primary focus is on the period 1934–66, which stretches from the appearance of Blasetti's openly fascist "historical" reconstruction, La vecchia guardia, to Pasolini's "eccentric" exercise in Left-wing commitment, Uccellacci e uccellini, with its mix of expressionist and hyper-realist techniques. ROFR 10101. Beginning French I

(4-0-4)

For students who have had no previous exposure to French. An introductory, first-year language sequence with equal focus on the four skills: speaking, listening, reading, and writing. An appreciation for French culture is also encouraged through readings and discussions. This course is to be followed by ROFR 10102.

ROFR 10102. Beginning French II

(4-0-4)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 10101 OR ROFR 101) OR CEFR FOR MIN. SCORE OF 231

The second-semester course of the beginning French sequence. Focus is on a balanced approach to acquisition and appreciation of French language and culture.

ROFR 10115. Intensive Beginning French

(6-0-6)

This course covers the material of ROFR 10101 and 10102 in one semester, with classes five days per week. Equal emphasis is placed on spoken and written French. ROFR 10115 counts as two courses and is designed more for highly motivated students. It is to be followed by ROFR 20201 or ROFR 20215.

ROFR 20201. Intermediate French I

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ((ROFR 10102 OR (ROFR 10115)) OR CEFR FOR MIN. SCORE OF 301

ROFR 20201 course fulfills the language requirement. This is a third-semester, second-year language sequence, with equal focus on oral and written production. It includes a review of basic grammar and then transitions into more difficult features of French. Students learn to discuss and write about French cultural topics, current events, and literary texts. This course is to be followed by ROFR 20202 or ROFR 20215.

ROFR 20202. Intermediate French II

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 20201) OR CEFR FOR MIN. SCORE OF 351

A fourth-semester college language course. Includes review and expansion of basic grammatical structures, extensive practice in speaking and writing, and readings and discussions of a variety of literary and nonliterary text of appropriate difficulty.

ROFR 20215. Intensive Intermediate French

(6-0-6)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 10102 OR ROFR 10115) OR CEFR FOR MIN. SCORE OF 301

A two-semester sequence of intensive, comprehensive training in the language skills necessary for residence and study in France. Includes review of grammar, readings, civilization, and specific orientation for international study. For students with two to three years of high school French (with satisfactory achievement) preparing for the Angers international study program.

ROFR 20220. Intermediate Grammar Review

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 20201 OR ROFR 103 OR ROFR 201F) OR (ROFR 20215 OR ROFR 115F OR ROFR 215F)

This one-semester comprehensive review of French grammar is intended for students with intermediate proficiency in the four language skills. In addition to the formal grammar review, there will be a close reading of two novels.

ROFR 20300. Conversational French

(3-0-3) Escoda-Risto

Prerequisite: (ROFR 20202 OR ROFR 202 OR ROFR 202F) OR (ROFR 20215 OR ROFR 103 OR ROFR 201 OR ROFR 201F) OR CEFR FOR MIN. SCORE OF 401

This course is designed to further develop the student's conversational skills and grasp of a wide variety of styles and registers in French. Spoken French will be practiced through various types of classroom activities and assignments. Emphasis will be on topics of current interest.

ROFR 20305. French Through Acting

(3-0-3) McDowell

Prerequisite: (ROFR 20202 OR ROFR 201 OR ROFR 202 OR ROFR 202F) OR (ROFR 20215 OR ROFR 201F)

A nontraditional approach to conversational French that asks students to create scenes for a weekly soap opera centered on a large cast of student-created characters who live together in an apartment building in France. Scenes are performed in class for workshop on phonetics, gestures, and choice of idioms. Not intended for international study returnees.

ROFR 20450. French for Business

(3-0-3)

In this course, students investigate the particularities of the Francophone business world in order to acquire cultural and linguistic tools enabling them to establish links within it. For business students, this would fulfill a requisite in the International Business Program.

ROFR 20680. Creole Language and Culture

(1.5-0-1.5)

This course introduces students to the vivid, sonorous language of Kreyòl, or Haitian Creole and to the fascinating culture of its speakers. This intensive, beginning-level course is intended for students with no knowledge of Haitian Creole. In small-group teaching sessions, students will be prepared for conversational fluency with basic reading and writing skills, emphasizing communicative competence as well as grammatical and phonetic techniques. Our study of Kreyòl is closely linked to our anthropological exploration of how the language is tied to Caribbean society and culture. The course takes a holistic, anthropological approach to the history, political economy, and religion of Haiti. In addition to class work, audiotapes, music, and film enhance the study of the Haitian language and culture.

ROFR 21205. Angers: Atelier

(1-0-1)

A mini-course that prepares students accepted for study abroad in Notre Dame's program in Angers, France. Students are prepared for various cultural and day-to-day challenges that await them in Angers. Course begins the week after spring break.

ROFR 21206. Post-Study Abroad

(1.5-0-0)

A mini-course for students returning from study abroad in Notre Dame's program in Angers, France.

ROFR 22300. LAC French Discussion Group

(0-1-1)

Students who have completed the Notre Dame language requirement in French are eligible to sign up for an additional single-credit discussion section as part of the Languages Across the Curriculum (LxC) initiative of the College of Arts and Letters. Choosing this option means that students will do some additional reading in French language materials (approximately 20–25 pages a week), and meet once a week with a graduate student or faculty tutor from the Department of Romance Languages and Literatures who will guide a discussion in French and grade some brief writing assignments. The LxC discussion section in French associated with this course will be graded on a pass/fail basis and will be credited on the student's transcript. Up to three LxC discussion sections can be applied toward a major, secondary major, or minor in French. Please talk to the instructor if you are interested in adding this supplemental credit.

ROFR 30900. Writings of Disaster
(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 30310 OR ROFR 310) OR (ROFR 30710 OR ROFR 371) OR (ROFR 30720 OR ROFR 372)

It has often been said that the 20th century began in Sarajevo on June 28, 1914. In the years that followed, a number of disasters struck Europe, and occasionally the larger world. This course will focus specifically on the reaction of French writers and philosophers to disasters ranging from the two world wars to decolonization. These traumatic incidents not only changed the way we narrate, but also the idea of narration itself: Is it possible to represent and fictionalize historical events that are often referred to as “unimaginable” or “unrepresentable”? We will first ask the following question: How are the disasters of European and world history written? Then we will try to emphasize an apparent contradiction: On the one hand, literature confronts its limitations when it seeks to render disasters that defy words and representations; on the other hand, literature is in a sense always a narration of the unimaginable, whether it is deemed a success or a failure. In this seminar, we will analyze literary works including poems, novels, and short stories. We will also examine select cultural productions such as plastic art, music, and film, from 1914 to the present. The course will be conducted in French.

ROFR 30910. Caribbean Diasporas
(3-0-3) Richman

This course examines the development of Creole societies in the French, Spanish, Dutch, and British Caribbean in response to colonialism, slavery, migration, nationalism and, most recently, transnationalism. The recent exodus of as much as 20 percent of Caribbean populations to North America and Europe has afforded the rise of new transnational modes of existence. This course will explore the consciousness and experience of Caribbean diasporas through ethnography and history, religion, literature, music, and culinary arts.

ROFR 30932. Politics of Fiction, Fictions of Politics
(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ROFR 30310 OR ROFR 310) OR (ROFR 30710 OR ROFR 371) OR (ROFR 30720 OR ROFR 372)

This course will explore the influence of several fictional productions (including some cinematographic examples) on daily politics in France since 1848, from Victor Hugo to Yasmina Reza. Readings will focus on the interactions of politics and literature, with a special focus on the link between the history of democracy and the invention of literature.

ROFR 32300. LAC French Discussion Group
(0-1-1)

Students who have completed the Notre Dame language requirement in French are eligible to sign up for an additional single-credit discussion section as part of the Languages Across the Curriculum (LxC) initiative of the College of Arts and Letters. ROIT 27500. Intermediate Italian II

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (ROIT 20201 OR ROIT 20215)

An advanced, fourth-semester, content-driven language course is designed to further the student's conversational skills as well as grasp of a wide variety of styles and registers in Italian. Spoken and written Italian will be practiced through various classroom activities and assignments. Readings include a wide array of literary and nonliterary texts (newspapers and magazines, short fiction, and so on). Each course focuses on a different aspect of Italian culture. Recent topics include Art and Culture, Italian Mass Media, Media and Culture, and Attitude: Italian Style, Italian Society Today.

ROIT 30200. Renaissance Italy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32500

This course examines the political, cultural, social, and religious history of Italy from about 1350 to 1550. Starting with an extended study of Florence, its economic foundations, social and political structures, artistic monuments, and key personalities, the course then examines how the culture of the Florentine

Renaissance spread to the rest of Italy, especially to the papal court of Rome and the princely courts of northern Italy, and, finally, to the new nation-states of northern Europe. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 30205. Italian Renaissance

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32500

This course examines the political, cultural, social, and religious history of Italy from about 1350 to 1550. Starting with an extended study of Florence, its economic foundations, social and political structures, artistic monuments, and key personalities, the course then examines how the culture of the Florentine Renaissance spread to the rest of Italy, especially to the papal court of Rome and the princely courts of northern Italy, and, finally, to the new nation-states of northern Europe. Key topics will include: the growth of the Italian city-state; the appearance of new, Renaissance "characters" (the merchant, the prince, the courtier, the mercenary, the learned lady, and the self-made man); Renaissance humanism and the classical revival; the relationship between art and politics; and Renaissance ideas of liberty, virtue, historical change, and the individual's relationship to God. The course will not tell a story of steady progress from medieval to modern institutions, societies, and modes of thinking; rather, we will consider the Renaissance as a period in flux, in which established traditions thrived alongside creative innovations and vigorous challenges to authority. Students will write one long paper and take a midterm and a final exam.

ROIT 30206. Early Modern Rome

(3-0-3) Meserve

This course traces the interlocking histories of the papacy and the city of Rome from the Renaissance to the birth of the modern Italian state. Topics will include the rise and fall of the papal monarchy; cultural and intellectual life at the Vatican court; the urban fabric of Rome from the Renaissance to the Baroque; the peculiar strains of Roman society; and the tumultuous relationship, both political and cultural, between Rome and the rest of Europe from the Reformation to the age of revolution. The course will proceed chronologically, but will pause frequently to examine special topics, including the Renaissance cardinal and his household; Michelangelo's Rome; the building of St. Peter's; Jesuit science; the trial of Galileo; archaeology and antiquarianism; the Roman Carnival; the Inquisition; Bernini's Rome; the Grand Tour; Rome in the Romantic imagination; and Napoleon's Rome.

ROIT 30310. Passage to Italy: Textual Analysis and Advanced Grammar

(3-0-3)

This is a fifth-semester, advanced grammar review and introduction to the critical analysis of Italian literary texts. It is recommended that this class be taken before ROIT 30711 or 30721 (formerly ROIT 371 and 372).

ROIT 30610. Rome: A Journey in Art and History

(3-0-3)

This class is an exploration of the history and culture of Rome from late medieval times through the 20th century, with an emphasis on art and architecture. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 30620. Italian Baroque Survey: Caravaggio to Guarini

(3-0-3)

This course surveys Italian painting, sculpture, and architecture of the 17th century, a period that also witnessed the expansion of the Jesuit Order, the Counter-Reformation, and absolute monarchy. Thus, the course begins with the "new Rome" of Pope Sixtus V, which attracted pilgrims and artists from all over Europe. From Northern Italy came Caravaggio and the Carracci, artists who were responsible for creating a new style based on High Renaissance principles and a new kind of naturalism derived from the study of life. There was Bernini, whose architectural and sculptural monuments almost single-handedly gave Rome its Baroque character. Other artists and architects of this era under discussion include such diverse personalities as Borromini, Guarini, Algardi, Artemisia Gentileschi (Caravaggio's only female follower), and the great ceiling painters Pietro da Cortona, Baciccio, Pozzo, and Maratti.

ROIT 30711. Medieval-Renaissance Italian Literature and Culture

(3-0-3) Moevs; Cachey

Prerequisite: ROIT 30310

An introduction to the close reading and textual analysis of representative texts from the Duecento through the Renaissance, including Lentini, Guinizzelli, Cavalcanti, Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Poliziano, Machiavelli, and Ariosto. We will trace the profile of Italian literary history in this period, setting the texts in their cultural and historical context (including music, art, and architecture), with attention to the changing understanding of human nature and the physical world in these centuries. Taught in Italian. Required for majors and supplementary majors in the literature and culture concentration; either this course or ROIT 30721 is required for majors in the Italian studies concentration.

ROIT 30721. Modern Italian Literature and Culture

This course introduces students to major writers and literary movements in 18th-, 19th-, and 20th-century Italy, including Goldoni, Leopardi, Foscolo, Manzoni, Verga, Pirandello, and many others. Taught in Italian. Required for majors and supplementary majors in the literature and culture concentration; either this course or ROIT 30711 is required for majors in the Italian studies concentration.

ROIT 30830. High Renaissance and Mannerist Art

(3-0-3) Coleman

Leonardo, Michelangelo, Bramante, and Raphael provide the basis of study of one of the most impressive periods of artistic activity in Italy—the High Renaissance in Rome and Florence. The course also investigates the origins of Mannerism in the excessive achievements of Jacopo Pontormo, Rosso Fiorentino, and the succeeding generation of late-Renaissance maniera artists who helped to formulate a new courtly style. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 37000. Special Studies

(3-0-3)

This course is designed with the purpose of allowing students to engage in an individual or small group study under the direction of a departmental faculty member. Permission of the department required. Prerequisite: Junior standing, dean's list.

ROIT 40115. Dante I

(3-0-3)

Dante I and Dante II are an in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical, and literary context, with selected readings from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, De vulgari eloquentia). Dante I focuses on the Inferno and the minor works; Dante II focuses on the Purgatorio and Paradiso. Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation. Students may take one semester or both, in either order.

ROIT 40117. Boccaccio

(3-0-3)

A textual analysis of The Decameron, with emphasis on structure and themes. Different critical approaches will be used in the analysis of individual tales, their relationships to the frames and their reflection on Boccaccio's society.

ROIT 40150. Amori Infelici, Amori Felici Tra Medioevo E Rinascimento

(0-3-3)

Conducted in Italian, this course explores various representations of unhappy and happy love in medieval and Renaissance Italian literature as they were shaped by six of the major Italian authors of those times, through a selection of texts of different genres: lyric poetry, short narrative, chivalrous epic, pastoral drama. The first part of the course will focus on stilnovistic poetic experiences in the late Duecento, Cavalcanti's destructive love and Dante's Vita nuova e Rime, and on its ripest fruits: Boccaccio's realistic paintings of happy and unhappy loves in days four and five of The Decameron, and Petrarch's tireless identification of love and poetry in his Canzoniere. The second part, focused on Quattrocento Florence and central Italy, will present texts by Poliziano, Lorenzo de Medici, and Boiardo. The third part will concentrate on the Cinquecento: Michelangelo's Rime, Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso", and Tasso's Aminta. The discussion of the texts will be accompanied by forays into visual arts (painting and sculpture) and music.

ROIT 40215. Petrarch: The Soul's Fragments

(3-0-3)

The course will explore fundamental themes in Petrarch's writings in Latin, especially the Secretum and the epistles, and in the Triumphs and the Canzoniere. Contemporary critical approaches will be employed in the analysis of the Canzoniere.

ROIT 40230. La Letteratura di Viaggio: storia e critica

(3-0-3)

This course examines major Renaissance Italian narratives of the Age of Discovery. It concentrates on the theoretical and practical problems involved in attempting to read historical texts as "literary artifacts."

ROIT 40231. Machiavelli and Guicciardini

(3-0-3)

This course will compare and contrast major works of these "classical" Italian Renaissance authors.

ROIT 40232. Renaissance Woman

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It considers the image of women in the writings of male authors, as well as the work of female authors. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 40505. Italian National Cinema

(3-0-3) Welle

Corequisite: ROIT 41505

Conducted in English, this course examines the concept and reality of "national cinema" in the Italian case. A history of one of the world's most renowned national cinemas focusing on the construction of national identity in film.

ROIT 40508. Cinema e letteratura

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ROIT 41508

Conducted in Italian, this course analyzes Italian films and literary works in studying points of intersection and divergence between film and literature.

ROIT 40512. Comedy, Italian Style!

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ROIT 41512

An exploration of comic traditions in Italy: the popular film genre known as "comedy, Italian style" is analyzed in its historical development in the 1950s and '60s, together with Italian film comedies from the silent period through the present. Roberto Benigni's new film version of Pinocchio, for example, released in the United States in December of 2002, extends a long line of comic genius. The commedia dell'arte, Goldoni's comedy of manners, and the political farce of Nobel Prize winner Dario Fo provide further examples of a comic tradition that continues to be a vital force of aesthetic pleasure and political comment. Requirements include attendance at mandatory film screenings, participation in class discussions, a number of short papers, and midterm and final exams. The class will be conducted in English.

ROIT 40520. Cinema e autori: Pasolini

(3-0-3)

This course presents one of Italy's greatest 20th-century humanists. Pier Paolo Pasolini was a poet, novelist, critic, and filmmaker whose works are among the most well known and highly debated of the last century. We will read and discuss a selection of his texts and analyze his use of literary adaptation and autobiographical reference film. Students will gain an idea of Pasolini's place within the larger context of Italian filmmaking in the '60s and '70s, and we will consider his interactions with other auteur filmmakers such as Fellini and Bertolucci.

ROIT 40530. Commedia all'italiana

(3-0-3)

Taught in Italian, this course explores Italian comic traditions in drama, literature, and film in relation to history, politics, and society from the 18th century until today. Authors, directors, and performers include Goldoni, Collodi, Marinetti, Pirandello, Fellini, Toto, Calvino, Wertmuller, Fo, and Benigni.

ROIT 40548. Italian Cinema: Realities of History

(3-0-3)

This course explores the construction and development of the Italian cinematic realist tradition from the silent era to the early 1970s, although its primary focus is on the period 1934–66, which stretches from the appearance of Blasetti's openly fascist "historical" reconstruction, La vecchia guardia, to Pasolini's eccentric exercise in left-wing commitment, Uccellacci e uccellini, with its mix of expressionist and hyper-realist techniques. At the centre of this period are found some of Italy's most highly regarded films made by directors, such as Vittorio DeSica, Roberto Rossellini, and Luchino Visconti, who belonged to the neo-realist movement (1945–53). These filmmakers rejected escapist cinema and tried to make films that examined the contemporary experiences of ordinary Italians. As well as analyzing the films in themselves, the course examines the formal and ideological continuities and differences between neo-realist films and their silent and fascist predecessors. In a similar way, it analyzes neo-realism's impact on later filmmakers, such as Federico Fellini, Pietro Germi, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Gillo Pontecorvo, Dino Risi, and Francesco Rosi, who attempted to develop new versions of cinematic realism. Finally, the course aims to locate the films in their historical and cultural contexts and to address theoretical issues arising from the concept of "realism."

ROIT 40610. Spotlight on Pirandello

(3-0-3)

The literary, theatrical, and cinematic works of Luigi Pirandello within the context of Italian culture and society between the 1880s and the 1930s, and as an integral force of Italian and European modernism.

ROIT 40650. Modern Italian Fiction

(3-0-3)

Major works of Italian fiction from the 19th century until the present are analyzed in relation to Italian society and culture within the contexts of European history and literary movements.

ROIT 40655. Italy in Modern Europe

(3-0-3)

The course will treat the cultural, literary, artistic, and political relationships between Italy and the rest of Europe in the modern period (since the Renaissance). Central concerns will be the presence and influence of masterpieces of Italian literature, both in translation and in the original Italian in other European countries, and the image of Italy (and in particular of Rome) in the religious polemics (Catholic/Protestant) of modern Europe. This course counts towards the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 40720. The Italian Lyric

(3-0-3)

An in-depth textual analysis of selected lyric masterpieces from the breadth of the Italian tradition, from Cavalcanti to Montale. Taught in Italian.

ROIT 40740. Teatro del Novecento

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the rich tradition of theatre, drama, and spectacle in modern Italian culture. Topics include: the verismo theatrical tradition of Giovanni Verga, Nino Martoglio, and Salvatore Di Giacomo; the Mediterranean tragedies of Gabriele d'Annunzio and the aesthetic and political implications of his poetics of spectacle; futurist theatre and the European avant-garde; Pirandello's theatrical art; and European modernism(s). In the second half of the 20th century, figures include Ugo Betti, Edoardo De Filippo, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Natalia Ginzburg, Dario Fo, and Dacia Maraini. The variety theatre, the dialect theatre, and the relationship between theatre and cinema will also be examined. Class requirements include thorough preparation of dramatic texts and critical materials, attendance at a number of film screenings outside of class, a number of brief papers and oral presentations, a midterm, and a final exam. The class will be conducted in Italian.

ROIT 40802. Italian Dialect Literature

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will discuss aspects of Italy's literary tradition in dialect across time, space, and genres. Following a brief introduction to Italy's dialect varieties, we will consider some major poets who wrote in Milanese, Roman, and Neapolitan dialect. We will also address the plurilingual theatrical tradition in dialect, centered primarily on Naples and Venice. Against the backdrop of Italy's sociolinguistic panorama in the last two decades, we will analyze the nature and function of dialects in the present revival of poetic dialects as well as in Italian narrative prose.

ROIT 40810. Topics in Medieval Art

(3-0-3)

The topic and format of this course will vary from year to year. Counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 40820. Seminar: Topics in Renaissance and Baroque Art

ROIT 40825. Fifteenth-Century Italian Art

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the century most fully identified with the Early Renaissance in Italy. Individual works by artists such as Brunelleschi, Donatello, Ghiberti, Botticelli, and Alberti are set into their social, political, and religious context. Special attention is paid to topics such as the origins of art theory, art and audience, Medician patronage, and art for the Renaissance courts of northern Italy and Naples. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 40828. Seminar: Venetian and Northern Italian Art

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on significant artistic developments of the 16th century in Venice, with brief excursions into Lombardy and Piedmont. Giorgione, Titian, and Palladio, the formulators of the High Renaissance style in Venice, and subsequent artists such as Tintoretto and Veronese are examined. An investigation of the art produced in important provincial and urban centers such as Brescia, Cremona, Milan, Parma, Varallo, and Vercelli also provide insight into the unique traditions of the local schools and their patronage.

ROIT 40908. Italian Women Writers

(3-0-3)

This course is taught in English and explores the role of women writers in the Italian literary canon across the centuries. Particular emphasis will be given to 20th-century women writers and the ways in which their works reflect specific social and cultural environments. Texts include poetry, prose and drama, and films, and discussions will include topics such as motherhood, female subjectivity, fascism, and feminism. This course counts toward the major as an Italian studies course.

ROIT 40920. Alfieri, Foscolo, and Leopardi

(3-0-3)

A study of selected works from the three greatest poets of the neoclassical and Romantic period, with particular attention paid to the tension and fusion in their thoughts between Enlightenment and Romantic conceptions of self, humanity, and nature.

ROIT 40921. Ariosto e Calvino: “un’ idea di letteratura”

(3-0-3)

This course examines Lodovico Ariosto’s “Orlando Furioso” in the light of Italo Calvino’s reading of the poem and the recent “Calvinian” reading of the poem by one of Italy’s leading philologist-critics, Corrado Bologna (La macchina del Furioso). This course will begin with a reading of Calvino’s “Six Memos for the Next Millennium” and then move on to a reading of “Furioso.”

ROIT 40935. Italian Short Story

(3-0-3)

Taught in Italian, this course treats the historical development of the short prose narrative in Italian literature. Beginning with the folktale and moving into selected novelle by such medieval and Renaissance writers as Boccaccio, Bandello, Firenzuola, and Machiavelli, the course also includes modern and contemporary contributors to the genre, including Verga, D’Annunzio, Pirandello, Moravia, Gozzano, Tozzi, Deledda, Serao, Maraini, Calvino, and Ginzburg. Students will be required to write a number of brief papers, to give brief oral presentations, and to participate in class discussions.

ROPO 30990. When Empires Fall

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Offered in Portuguese, "When Empires Fall" examines contemporary Luso-Brazilian literature and historiography that explore major shifts in Portugal's status from world power to semi-peripheral, European nation. We focus on responses to three major traumas: the end of the Luso-Brazilian empire in the early 1800s, the confrontation with Britain and the Ultimatum of 1890, and the fall of the African empire with the subsequent decolonization of 1974–75. The course seeks to evaluate the role that imperial decline plays as a theme in contemporary narrations of the nation; to investigate how literature contributes to interpretations of Portugal's imperial past; and to study the interconnections between history, memory, and national identity. This course is designed for students pursuing a minor in Portuguese and Brazilian studies and/or for students pursuing a minor in Latin American studies.

ROPO 32300. LAC Portuguese Discussion Group

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This course provides insights into 20th- and 21st-century Brazilian history, culture, and politics through film, photography, literature, and popular music. Topics discussed include Samba, Bossa Nova, Tropicalia, and the reception of Cinema Novo and of the new Brazilian Cinema. Special attention will be paid to Tropicalia (a movement with key manifestations in the visual arts, cinema, popular music, and literature) and the circumstances surrounding its creation, including the repressive military regime that governed Brazil from 1964 to 1985. This course is cross-listed in FTT. Offered in English.

ROPO 40950. Luso-Brazilian Literature and Society

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This course focuses on questions of national identity in the Luso-Brazilian world. We examine how social and cultural issues are perceived, conceptualized, represented, and understood in and by literature. Conducted in English with readings in Portuguese or English (discussion group available in Portuguese).

ROPO 40951. Immigrant Voices in Modern Brazilian Literature

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This course examines literary perspectives on the European and non-European immigrant experience in Brazil and addresses fundamental questions that have occupied major contemporary Brazilian authors: How do we recreate a sense of home after having lost it? What makes us feel at home in a new place or country? How do we adapt to relocations of home? We will search for answers in the fiction of Milton Hatoum, Elisa Lispector, Salim Miguel, Ana Miranda, Raduan Nassar, Nelida Pinon, Samuel Rawet, and Moacyr Scliar. Conducted in English with readings in Portuguese or English (discussion group in Portuguese).

ROPO 40955. Dictatorships in Luso-Brazilian Fiction and Film

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Prerequisite: (ROPO 20202 OR ROPO 202 OR ROPO 202P)

This course offers a literary and cinematic study of 20th-century dictatorships in Brazil and Portugal, with readings in Luso-Brazilian fiction, history, film, and cultural theory. ### ROPO 40956. Carnival in Cinema and Literature

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

Brazil has tantalized our imagination with images of Samba and Carnival. This course explores Brazilian culture by investigating the ways in which the celebrations of Carnival have been viewed, articulated, and unsettled by film and literature. Along with major films, documentaries, and literary works, we examine contemporary sociological and anthropological writing that contributes to our understanding of Carnivals within and beyond Brazil. We learn how key issues in Brazilian society (class, race and gender relations, national identity, rituals and symbols, values, and social roles) play out in Carnival. Course offered in English.

ROPO 40977. Portuguese Colonialism Revisited

(3-0-3)

With readings from Angola, Mozambique, Brazil and Portugal, this course examines colonialism and its aftermath in Africa in light of postcolonial fiction and contemporary sociological and anthropological writing from the Lusophone world. This course brings the Lusophone experience, with its important varieties yet overlooked implications, into broader debates in the field of postcolonial studies. Course conducted in English with readings in Portuguese and/or English.

ROPO 40995. Short Fiction Across the Atlantic: Brazil, Portugal, and Lusophone Africa

(3-0-3) Ferreira Gould

This is a comparative study of short prose fiction in the Portuguese-speaking world, with special emphasis on theoretical issues related to this literary genre. Authors studied include Machado de Assis, Joao Guimaraes Rosa, Clarice Lispector, Mario de Sa-Carneiro, Miguel Torga, Mia Couto, and Luandino Vieira. Conducted in English.

ROPO 40998. Fictions of the South Atlantic

Medieval Studies

MI 20001. The World of the Middle Ages

(3-0-3) Noble

Corequisite: MI 22001

The Middle Ages have been praised and reviled, romanticized and fantasized. The spectacular popularity of Harry Potter, The Lord of the Rings, and Narnia have brought a revival of interest in and curiosity about the Middle Ages. But what were they like, these ten centuries between Rome and the Renaissance? In this course, we will explore major themes and issues in medieval civilization in an attempt to offer some basic answers to that question. We will have in view three kinds of people: rulers, lovers, and believers. But we will also study carefully those who wrote about those kinds of people. We will constantly ask how can we know about the Middle Ages, and what kinds of things can we know? We will consider major literary texts as both works of art and historical documents. We will explore various kinds of religious literature. We will try to understand the limits, boundaries, and achievements of philosophy and theology. Some lectures will incorporate medieval art so as to add a visual dimension to our explorations. This course will constitute an extended introduction to the dynamic and fascinating world of the Middle Ages.

MI 20276. Introduction to Islamic Civilization

(3-0-3) Guo

This course is designed to introduce students to Islamic civilization and Muslim culture and societies. The course will cover the foundations of Islamic belief, worship, and institutions, along with the evolution of sacred law (al-shari'a) and theology, as well as various aspects of intellectual activities. The Koran and the life of the Prophet Muhammad will be examined in detail. Both Sunni and Shi'i perspectives will be considered. Major Sufi personalities will be discussed to illuminate the mystical, and popular, tradition in Islam. Topics on arts, architecture, literary culture, and sciences will be covered. Although the course is concerned more with the history of ideas than with modern Islam as such, it has great relevance for understanding contemporary Muslim attitudes and political, social, and cultural trends in the Muslim world today.

MI 20278. King Arthur in History and Literature

(3-0-3)

This course—intended to introduce undergraduates to one of the major themes as well as to the interdisciplinary approaches characteristic of medieval studies—is a team-taught examination of the development and influence of the legend of Arthur, King of Britain, both in history and in literature. The historical Arthur is very obscure, but he was probably a Romanized Celtic war-leader who fought the invading Angles and Saxons at the beginning of the history of what was to become England. His memory was preserved in the oral literature of his own people, now called the Welsh, but he was soon converted into a mythic hero surrounded by magical companions. In the 12th century this legendary Arthur was not only incorporated into the new historiography of England (since 1066 under the rule of French-speaking Normans) but into the new genre of literature created in France around 1150—the chivalric romance—that itself embodied a new ideal for the relationship between men and women derived from the songs of the troubadours of the south. The great majority of these tales of love and marvelous adventures written over the next four centuries were to be set in the court of the legendary Arthur, and the Round Table was invented in this period as the central focus of the ideals it was made to represent. History soon began to imitate literature, as kings and princes attempted to emulate the idealized Arthurian court in their tournaments and other court festivities, and from 1330 to 1469 actually founded orders of knights based on the Round Table. The class will read the relevant parts of some of the chronicles, histories, and epics in which Arthur was mentioned, as well as a representative sample of the Arthurian romances of the later period, and of related documents like the statutes of the chivalric orders. Two in-class tests, two short papers, and a final examination will be required.

MI 20406. The Mass of the Roman Rite

(3-0-3) Roy

An examination of the Catholic Eucharist as celebrated according to the Roman rite. Students explore the earliest witnesses of the Eucharist in Scripture and Tradition, then trace the emergence and development of the Eucharistic rite in Rome itself and in areas influenced by Rome. Attention is paid to the origins and formation of liturgical texts, and their compilation into various books; vestments and vessels; and the arrangement of church architecture over the centuries. The course follows the Roman liturgy from the Eternal City (ca. 700) over the Alps into the Frankish realms and even into southern England in the early Middle Ages; then traces its reintroduction to the City in the 11th and 12th centuries, through the pontificate of Innocent III (1198–1216), and its reform after the Council of Trent. The course finally examines the Liturgical Movement of the 20th century and developments after Vatican II. Due consideration is given to the role of Joseph Ratzinger-Pope Benedict XVI in the new liturgical movement with particular focus on his liturgical legislation (Summorum pontificum, 7-7-2007), the ars celebrandi, and “the hermeneutic of continuity.”

MI 20473. Regarding the Islamic Challenge to Christian Theology

(3-0-3) Reynolds

Prerequisite: (THEO 10001 OR THEO 100) OR (THEO 13183 OR THEO 180G) OR (THEO 20001 OR THEO 200) OR (THEO 24805 OR THEO 201)

While many Christians have described Islam as a Christian heresy, many Muslims consider Christianity to be an Islamic heresy. Jesus, they maintain, was a Muslim prophet. Like Adam and Abraham before him, like Muhammad after him, he was sent to preach Islam. In this view Islam is the natural religion—eternal, universal, and unchanging. Other religions, including Christianity, arose only when people went astray. Therefore, Muslims have long challenged the legitimacy of Christian doctrines that differ from Islam, including the Trinity, the incarnation, the cross, and the new covenant and the church. In this course we will examine Islamic writings, from the Qur'an to contemporary texts, in which these doctrines are challenged. We will then examine the history of Christian responses to these challenges and consider, as theologians, how Christians might approach them today.

MI 20476. The Monastic Way in the History of Christianity

(3-0-3) Young

In the history of the Eastern and Western churches, male and female monastics have composed a long and elaborate tradition of their collective life based on the imitation of Christ. A selection of the written sources attesting to the variety of the forms of monastic life and prayer, and theology and mysticism will form the syllabus for this class. It will explore the modes of life of the solitary monastic as well as those of monastic communities, from earliest Christianity through the present, by reading works from and about this form of life. It will discuss, among other themes, those of discipline, the meaning of the body and its labor, penance, suffering, humility, study and learning, the love of human beings, the love of God, union with God and participation in the life of God within the limits that the monastic life imposes.

MI 20482. Saints in Art and Icons

(3-0-3) Roy

A diachronic exploration of the lives and legends of the saints as depicted in art and iconography. Students will explore lives of the saints in select vitae as well as the most influential hagiographical collection of the Middle Ages, The Golden Legend of Dominican bishop James of Voragine. Due attention is paid to the arrangement of the sanctoral cycle, the compilation of calendars and martyrologies, and the theological underpinnings of classic iconography. Primary focus on identifying saints by iconographical attributes and conventions in both western and eastern iconography.

MI 20493. On Conversion

(3-0-3) Daley

For all believing people, faith is a journey: a lifelong movement of growth in understanding of the divine Mystery in whose presence we live, and of commitment to serving God. Christian faith begins in Jesus' call to each person to follow him as a disciple; and while the general shape of that journey of companionship is modeled in the Gospels, it takes on very different concrete features in each particular life. In this course, we will reflect on the theological importance of conversion and spiritual growth for the life of faith, and will consider the stories of several well-known Christians (Augustine of Hippo, Francis of Assisi, Ignatius of Loyola, John Woolman, Dorothy Day, C.S. Lewis) that reveal the long-term implications of conversion to faith. We will also reflect on loss of faith as a kind of anti-conversion peculiar to modern culture.

MI 20609. Reading and Writing Latin Prose

(3-0-3) Krostenko

This second-year language course continues the review of grammar begun in CLLA 20003 and introduces students to stylistic analysis through close readings of Latin prose authors such as Cicero and the younger Pliny. A special feature of the course is that students learn to write classical Latin for themselves.

MI 20671. Celtic Heroic Literature

(3-0-3) Fogarty

An exciting introduction to Celtic literature and culture, this course introduces the thrilling sagas, breathtaking legends, and prose tales of Ireland and Wales. Readings include battles, heroic deeds, feats of strength and daring, and dilemmas faced by the warrior heroes of the Celts. Celtic Heroic Literature, which requires no previous knowledge of Irish or Welsh, studies the ideology, belief system, and concerns of the ancient Celtic peoples as revealed in their saga literature. By examining the hero's function in society, students investigate the ideological concerns of a society undergoing profound social transformation and religious conversion to Christianity and the hero's role as a conduit for emotional and social distress. Among the heroes to be studied in depth are: Cu Chulainn, Lug, St. Patrick, and the king-heroes. Wisdom literature, archeological, and historical evidence will also be considered in this course. No prior knowledge of Irish required. All texts provided in English.

MI 20700. Introduction to Medieval Art

(3-0-3)

This course will provide an introduction to the visual arts of the period ca. 300 C.E. to ca. 1400 C.E. In the course of the semester, we shall devote much time to considering the possibility of a history of medieval art, as the objects and practices of the Middle Ages will be shown to problematize our assumptions about the nature of art history. Working from individual objects and texts we will construct a series of narratives that will attend to the varieties of artistic practices available to the Middle Ages. From these, it will be shown that art was a vital, complex, lucid, and formative element in the societies and cultures, both secular and sacred, which shaped this period.

MI 20702. Introduction to Art and Catholicism

(3-0-3)

This undergraduate lecture/discussion course will give students the opportunity to analyze and discuss the history of Catholic doctrine as it pertains to the visual arts. From the Council of Elvira in A.D. 306 to John Paul II's "Letter to Artists" of 1999, Catholicism has engaged with and debated the role of the arts as a legitimate vehicle for spiritual experience and theological knowledge. In this course, we will examine the changing, complex, and various ideas that have been brought to the question of the function of art in the Church. It will become clear that Catholic attitudes to the arts have been subject to a range of influences that have helped shape a still fluid and potential relationship between Catholicism and art. Among other topics we will examine the accommodation of traditional pagan practices in Late Antiquity; the impact of Byzantine and Carolingian theological discourse on the arts; mendicant thought and practice regarding the arts; lay piety in the later Middle Ages; issues raised by the Reformation; the Council of Trent and the Counter Reformation; the implications of modernism; neo-Thomist aesthetics; and the aftermath of Vatican II. In all instances the course will be shaped by the discussions of primary readings (in translation when necessary) that will set these texts in a context that is social, intellectual, theological, and cultural. Each reading will then lead to an examination of the artistic environment that preceded and succeeded the ideas shaped by these texts. It is expected that students will leave this course with a rich knowledge of the central ideas and works of art that have come to shape the continuing dialogue between Catholicism and art.

MI 20703. Introduction to Early Christian and Byzantine Art

(3-0-3) Barber

This course will introduce students to the visual arts of the period ca. A.D. 200 to ca. A.D. 1600. Our work will take us from the first fashioning of an identifiable Christian art through to the remarkable poetics of Late Byzantine painting. In so doing, the student will be introduced to the full array of issues that arise around the question of there being a Christian art. Working from individual objects and texts, we will construct a variety of narratives that will reveal a vital, complex, and rich culture that, in a continuing tradition, has done so much to shape the visual imagination of Christianity.

MI 20704. Introduction to Renaissance Art

(3-0-3) Rosenberg

This course will survey the major trends in the art of Italy and Northern Europe from roughly 1300 to 1575. It will concentrate on such major figures as Giotto, Donatello, Masaccio, Botticelli, Raphael, Michelangelo, and Titian in Italy, and the Limbourg Brothers, Jan van Eyck, Rogier van der Weyden, Hieronymus Bosch, Albrecht Durer, Mathias Grunewald, and Pieter Brueghel in the north. It will consider such themes as artistic production and technique, public and private spirituality, naturalism, narrative, and the changing status of the artist.

MI 20752. Art of the Medieval Codex

(3-0-3) Joyner

In classical times text and image were applied to papyrus and scrolls, in the mid-15th century movable type and woodcuts printed text and images into paper books. During the intervening millennium, text and images were written, drawn, and painted by multiple hands onto the bound parchment of medieval codices. As an introduction to the study of medieval manuscripts, this class will begin with an overview of codicological methods and then move through a series of thematic questions as they relate to specific manuscripts made in Western Europe between the 5th and 15th centuries. We will consider production methods, text-image relationships, issues of patronage and use, and many other questions as we examine the central role manuscripts played in the evolution of medieval European culture.

MI 20772. Medieval and Renaissance Music History I

(3-0-3) Blachly

A survey of music. The study of the major forms and styles in Western history. Required of music majors and minors, but open to students with sufficient musical background.

MI 22001. The World of the Middle Ages: Tutorial

(0-0-0)

Discussion section accompanying MI 20001.

MI 30203. Middle Ages I

(3-0-3) Perett

This course will examine the history of the Roman world from the time of the first incursions of barbarians into the Roman Empire in the third century to the time of the final invasions in the 10th. It will concentrate first on the crises of the third century, and on the consequent transformation of the relatively unified, urbanized, tolerant, polytheistic Roman Empire of Late Antiquity into the two distinct, deurbanized, intolerant, monotheistic, and politically divided civilizations of Latin or Catholic Christendom and Greek or Orthodox Christendom. Next, it will briefly examine the emergence in the seventh century of the new monotheistic religion of Islam and of the new civilization and empire centered on it, which quickly conquered not only the old Persian empire but most of the Asian and all of the African provinces of the continuing Roman empire, and in 711–18 conquered most of Spain as well. The remainder of the course will concentrate on the history of Latin Christendom and its pagan barbarian neighbors to the north and east between the beginning of the Germanic conquests of the western provinces ca.

400 and the final conversion of the peoples of central and northern Europe to Christianity and the simultaneous emergence of a new sociopolitical order in the older kingdoms around 1000. There will be two short papers, two tests, and a final examination.

MI 30204. Middle Ages II

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as a topical introduction to European history between 1000 and 1500. It will examine the evolution of various forms of economic systems, societies, and civilizations in Western Europe during this period, concentrating on France, Italy, England, and Germany. History majors as well as students interested in a historical introduction to medieval civilization are welcome.

MI 30210. Late Antiquity

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the transformation of the Roman world from about A.D. 300 to 600. We will ask: was the “fall” of the Roman Empire a civilizational catastrophe? Or was it a slow, messy process blending continuity and change? Or was Late Antiquity itself a dynamic and creative period? Our emphasis will fall on the changing shape of Roman public life; the barbarians and their relations with Rome; the emergence of the Catholic Church; the triumph of Christian culture; and literature, art, and architecture in the late imperial world. There will be a midterm and a final. Students will write either one term paper or a series of shorter papers. Readings will emphasize primary sources.

MI 30214. Italian Renaissance

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32500

This course examines the political, cultural, social, and religious history of Italy from about 1350 to 1550. Starting with an extended study of Florence, its economic foundations, social, and political structures, artistic monuments, and key personalities, the course then examines how the culture of the Florentine Renaissance spread to the rest of Italy, especially to the papal court of Rome and the princely courts of northern Italy, and, finally, to the new nation-states of northern Europe. Key topics will include the growth of the Italian city-state; the appearance of new, Renaissance “characters” (the merchant, the prince, the courtier, the mercenary, the learned lady, the self-made man); Renaissance humanism and the classical revival; the relationship between art and politics; and Renaissance ideas of liberty, virtue, historical change, and the individual’s relationship to God. The course will not tell a story of steady progress from medieval to modern institutions, societies, and modes of thinking; rather, we will consider the Renaissance as a period in flux, in which established traditions thrived alongside creative innovations and vigorous challenges to authority. Students will write one long paper and take a midterm and a final exam.

MI 30218. History of Christianity to 1500

(3-0-3)

A survey of the development of Christianity from Late Antiquity to the eve of the 16th-century Reformation. Emphases include processes of Christianization, definitions of prescribed and proscribed beliefs and practices, institutional elaboration, relations with imperial and royal authority, impact of and on culture, and varieties of religious behaviors. Although the history of the Latin (Catholic) church is highlighted, the dynamics and consequences of its separation first from the Oriental and then from the Orthodox churches will be examined. The course aspires to achieve a routine of interactive lectures.

MI 30221. The Reformation

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32352

A narrative history of Christianity in Western Europe from c. 1500 to c. 1650, which takes an international and comparative perspective, including Catholicism, Protestantism, and radical Protestantism. Topics covered include Christianity on the eve of the Reformation, Christian humanism, Luther and the German Reformation, the Peasants’ War and Anabaptism, the English Reformation, Calvin and Calvinism, Catholic Reform and the Council of Trent, the French Wars of Religion, confessionalization, the Thirty Years War, and the English Revolution. Major themes include matters of religious content (doctrinal positions and devotional sensibilities), the relationship between different Christian groups and political regimes, the impact of religious changes across the population, and the definitive emergence of Christian pluralism. Lectures plus discussion.

MI 30222. Tudor England: Politics and Honor

(3-0-3) Rapple

The period from 1485 to 1603, often feted as something of a “Golden Age” for England, saw that country undergo serious changes that challenged the traditional ways in which the nation conceived of itself. These included the break from Rome, the loss of England’s foothold in France, and the unprecedented experience of monarchical rule by women. Each of these challenges demanded creative political responses and apologetic strategies harnessing intellectual resources from classical, Biblical, legal, chivalric, and ecclesiastical sources. This course will examine these developments. It will also look at how the English, emerging from under the shadow of the internecine dynastic warfare of the 15th century, sought to preserve political stability and ensure a balance between continuity and change, and, furthermore, how individuals could use these unique circumstances to their own advantage.

MI 30231. Medieval Spain: Land of Three Religions

(3-0-3)

This lecture course will cover the history of medieval Spain from the Visigothic period (6th to the 7th centuries) until the time of Ferdinand and Isabella (15th century). The main focus of the course will be the interaction (both congenial and confrontational) of the three religious groups resident in the Iberian Peninsula: Christians, Jews, and Muslims. The course will proceed roughly chronologically, with pauses to consider particular topics in social, intellectual, and economic history. Interspersed with lectures, discussion sessions will concentrate on close readings of primary texts and consideration of some of the historiographical problems peculiar to Spanish history. There will be several short papers, a midterm, and a final exam.

MI 30233. Early Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3) Rapple

Consideration of the period between 950 and 1400 is of crucial importance in understanding Irish history. This course not only covers the range of continuities and radical discontinuities that marked Ireland’s development during this time, but charts the attempted conquest of the entire country by the English Crown. The lecture series also seeks to answer a number of questions. Why did the papacy give the English Crown sovereignty over Ireland? Why did a country like Ireland, on the verge of attaining political and economic centralization, not organize better resistance to English attempts to subdue it? Why did the English colony fail to prove more successful in exerting its will over indigenous Irish potentates? Culturally, the period also witnessed the growing assimilation of English invaders to the norms of Gaelic Irish politics and society. Lastly, events in Ireland had a serious influence on developments in England, Wales, and Scotland, provoking, amongst other things, the fall of the Plantagenet Dynasty and an attempted invasion by King Robert I of Scotland.

MI 30234. Early Modern Ireland

(3-0-3) Rapple

This course offers new perspectives on the struggle for mastery in Ireland from 1470 to 1660. Though keeping in mind the traditional view of the “English reconquest” (decades of rebellion, dispossession, and plantation until, in the aftermath of Cromwell, all Ireland was finally subjected to English rule) this course will take a different approach. By investigating a range of primary sources from the period, students will explore the interactions between the three different models of conquest: (1) descendants of the old Norman colonists (e.g., Fitzgeralds and Butlers) seeking to finish the job; (2) Tudor reform (inspired by Renaissance optimism), by which the English attempted to establish rule by means of legal, social, and cultural assimilation; and (3) unabashed exploitation by English private entrepreneurs on the make. The most important effect of these “contending conquests” was the way they shaped the diverse responses of the native Irish, ranging from accommodation and assimilation to outright rebellion and national war.

MI 30235. Medieval Middle East

(3-0-3)

This course offers a survey of Middle Eastern history from the rise of Islam in the seventh century C.E. until the rise of Mongol successor polities in the fifteenth century. The course is structured to cover political and cultural developments and their relationship with broader changes in society during the formative centuries of Islamic civilization. Specific topics include: the career of the Prophet Muhammad and the origins of the earliest Muslim polity; the creation and breakup of the Islamic unitary state (the Caliphate); the impact of Turkish migrations on the Middle East; social practices surrounding the transmission of learning in the Middle Ages; the diversity of approaches to Muslim piety and their social and political expression; popular culture; non-Muslims in Islamic society; the creation of the medieval Islamic “international” cultural order. Among the more important themes will be long-term cultural and social continuities with the Islamic and ancient Near East, and concepts of religious and political authority.

MI 30236. The Polish and Lithuanian Commonwealth

(3-0-3)

This course will survey the history of the Polish and Lithuanian Commonwealth from its origins in the 1386 dynastic union of Jogailo, Grand Duke of Lithuania, with Hedvig, the daughter of Polish king, Louis the Great (1370-82), through the transformation into a political union at Lublin in 1569 to the collapse of the Commonwealth which culminated in three partitions at the end of the 18th century. Special emphasis will be placed on the political processes which transformed the Commonwealth into one of the most democratic countries in the world, but also ultimately contributed to its decline. Attention, too, will be paid to the wars which ravaged the Commonwealth, including those with Muscovy, Sweden, the Ottoman Empire, and with the peoples of what today is modern Ukraine.

MI 30237. Medieval and Early Modern Russia

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the history of Russia from its medieval origins until the age of Catherine the Great in the 18th century. We will begin with the genesis of Orthodox Slavic civilization in medieval Kievan Rus and that state’s destruction in the Mongol invasion. Then we will study the rise of the tsardom of Muscovy and the fateful developments that nearly doomed it in the 16th/17th century: the reign of Ivan the Terrible, the Time of Troubles, the imposition of serfdom, the schism of the Orthodox Church, and widespread popular revolts. Lastly, we will see how Peter the Great and his 18th-century successors attempted to stabilize the social order, westernize the upper classes, and make Russia a great European power.

MI 30251. Medieval Cities

(3-0-3) Constable

Corequisite: HIST 32255

This course will cover the structure and development of urban centers in Europe and the Mediterranean World from the late Antique period until the 14th century. The course will begin with a general discussion of modern urban theory together with ancient and medieval conceptions of what makes a “city.” From this point, we will track the history of urban life in medieval Europe, Byzantium, and the Islamic World, with lectures devoted to urban geography, architecture, society, economy, and demography. We will also look in depth at medieval life in individual cities, including London, Paris, Cairo, and Constantinople, in order to consider variations in urban society and institutions in different regions.

MI 30255. Twelfth-Century European Renaissance and Reform

(3-0-3)

The thousand years of history we call “the Middle Ages” witnessed repeated efforts to reform and enlighten society through learning and religion. Such aspirations did not wait for the periods we call Renaissance and Reformation. This course will examine reform movements in the years 1050 to 1215, a time of great cultural expansion often called the “12th-century renaissance.” Here we find the invention of the university and also of chivalry, mystics as well as satirical mockers. We will read original sources dealing with ethics, politics, love, and religion in that society. We will ask what it means, historically, to speak of a society as undergoing renewal or reform: Can a whole society be reformed? By whom? By what means?

MI 30257. The Medieval Mind

(3-0-3)

This course offers an introduction to thought and culture in the European Middle Ages, the era of romance, scholastic theologians, and female mystics. After a relatively brief look at the early Middle Ages, the course will focus on the origins of the literature of love and chivalry, of schoolmen in universities, and of women religious writers. There is a general textbook to guide the course, but much of the reading will be in primary sources, that is, in the thinkers and poets and mystics of the medieval period.

MI 30269. The Late Middle Ages, 1300–1500

(3-0-3)

The course studies Europe in the time of the late Middle Ages, roughly 1300–1500, often called a time of crisis: plague, war, rebellion, economic upheaval. But it was also a time of enormous achievement, of Dante and Chaucer, of new techniques in warfare and government, of conciliar representation in church and state, of extravagant display in fashion and building. This course will proceed by way of both secondary and primary readings, with at least three short papers and student discussion required.

MI 30273. Muslims and Christians in the Medieval World

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32330

The encounter between Christianity and Islam began in the seventh century A.D., the time of the Prophet Muhammad. Within a few centuries, Islamic rule had spread across the southern Mediterranean world from Syria to Spain. This shift initiated a long-term relationship—sometimes hostile and sometimes peaceful—between Christians and Muslims in these regions. The neighboring presence of Islam had an enduring influence on medieval Christian theology, philosophy, medical knowledge, literature, culture, imagination, art, and material life. Likewise, developments in Christian Europe and Byzantium, especially the Crusades, affected the Islamic world. This course will trace the history of the Christian-Muslim relationship, from its beginnings in the early medieval period until the Renaissance (15th century). The heritage of this medieval encounter still has profound resonance in the modern world of today.

MI 30275. Castles and Courts in Medieval Europe

(3-0-3) Boulton

The expanded title of this course is Castles, Castellannies, and Courts in Latin Europe, 900–1650. This course will examine the high period in the history of the castle—a combination of fort and residence—of the castellany or district subjected to the domination of a castle, and of the household and court of the kings, princes, and barons who built such residences and organized their lives and their activities within their various structures. It will first consider the castle as a form of fortification, review briefly the history of fortifications before 900, and examine the ways in which lords and their builders steadily improved their defensive capabilities in response to new knowledge and to new methods and tools of siegecraft. It will then examine the relationship of the castle to the contemporary forms of non-fortified or semi-fortified house, and finally its relationship to the lordly household (the body of servants organized into numerous departments associated with particular rooms or wings of the castle) and with the court (or body of soldiers, officers, allies, students, and temporary guests) who filled the castle when the lord was present. The course will conclude with an examination of the history of the castellany as a form of jurisdiction. The course will concentrate on the castles of the British Isles and France, but will examine the great variety of types found throughout Latin Europe.

MI 30287. The Catholic Reformation

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32353

This course will examine some of the main historical realities, theological developments, and traditions of spirituality within Roman Catholicism c. 1450–c. 1700, the period of Catholic reform both before and after the emergence of the Protestant Reformation. The class format will be two lectures plus one discussion-based tutorial section per week, the latter based on the reading of primary sources in translation. Major topics to be discussed include the character of the late medieval church and reforming efforts within it (e.g., the Observantine movement, Christian humanism); Roman Catholic response to the Protestant Reformation, including the Roman Inquisition; the revival of existing and emergence of new religious orders (especially the Society of Jesus); the Council of Trent and its implementation among the clergy and laity; Catholic missionary activity in Asia and the Americas; post-Tridentine Catholic art and scholarship; the relationship between the Church and European states in the 16th and 17th centuries; Jansenism; and the flowering of Catholic spirituality in the 17th century.

MI 30290. Violence in Late Medieval and Renaissance Europe
(3-0-3)Rapple

Violence was a dominant feature of life in late medieval and Renaissance Europe, and students in this course will explore that violence in all its manifestations—political, economic, military, cultural, and social.

MI 30301. Ancient and Medieval Philosophy
(3-0-3)

This course will concentrate on major figures and persistent themes. A balance will be sought between scope and depth, the latter ensured by a close reading of selected texts.

MI 30404. Christianity in the Middle East
(3-0-3)

The spread of Christianity from Palestine to the West is well-documented. Less well-known is the development of Christianity in the lands of its origin, the Middle East. This course introduces students to the largely untold story of Christianity that expresses itself in the native Aramaic language and culture of the Semitic East. Topics include the origins of the indigenous Christian churches of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Armenia, Iraq, and Iran. The development of these traditions will be viewed in relation to Western/European forms of Christianity that have come to dominate and that are viewed as “mainstream” and “normative.” The course concludes with an assessment of the impact of religious “fundamentalisms,” the diaspora of Middle Eastern Christians throughout Europe and the United States, and the contemporary state of Christianity in the Middle East.

MI 30405. The History of Catholicism 300 to 1500
(3-0-3)

Course explores the evolution of Catholicism from 300 to 1500.

MI 30411. Christian Theological Traditions I
(3-0-3) Cunningham; Wawrykow

A survey of Christian theology from the end of the New Testament period to the eve of the Reformation. Through the close reading of primary texts, the course focuses on the Christology of such influential thinkers as Origen, Athanasius, Augustine, Anselm, and Aquinas. How do these thinkers understand the person and work of Jesus Christ? What are the Christological problems that they tried to resolve? How do the different Christologies of these thinkers reflect their differing conceptions of the purpose and method of “theology”? Some attention will also be given to non-theological representations of Christ. How does the art of the early and medieval periods manifest changes in the understanding of the significance of Jesus?

MI 30477. Reading the Qur’an
(3-0-3) Reynolds

To Muslims the Qur’an is the uncreated, eternal Word of God. As Jesus Christ is to Christians, the Qur’an to Muslims is the fullest expression of God’s mercy and concern for humanity. It is both the source of complete spiritual wisdom and the constitution for a more perfect society. In the present course, we will encounter this revered text with the following goals: to examine the history of the Qur’an’s composition and reception; to explore the major themes of the Qur’an; to discuss new theories on and debates over the Qur’an; and, finally, to research the Qur’an’s statements on issues of contemporary interest, especially sex, politics, and war.

MI 30500. Survey of Spanish Literature I
(3-0-3) Juarez-Almendros

A survey of Spanish literature through 1700. Readings of selected texts in prose, poetry, and theater from the medieval, Renaissance, and Baroque periods.

MI 30530. Survey of French Literature and Culture I
(3-0-3) Dawson

Reading of selections and complete works of outstanding French authors from major genres and periods. Students are expected to have already taken ROFR 30310.

MI 30577. Medieval-Renaissance Italian Literature and Culture
(3-0-3) Moevs

Prerequisite: (ROIT 202 OR ROIT 215 OR ROIT 20215) OR (ROIT 27500 OR ROIT 202E OR ROIT 20505 OR ROIT 235)

An introduction to the close reading and textual analysis of representative texts from the Duecento through the Renaissance, including Lentini, Guinizzelli, Cavalcanti, Dante, Petrarca, Boccaccio, Poliziano, Machiavelli, and Ariosto.

MI 30600. Latin Literature and Stylistics
(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (CLLA 20003 OR CLLA 103 OR CLLA 103A OR CLLA 201)
Provides an introduction to the advanced study of Latin literary texts through close reading of selected texts combined with practice in Latin composition.

MI 30607. The Roman Revolution
(3-0-3)

This course builds on the work of CLAS 30012 and CLAS 30022 and examines the climactic events in Roman history of the late first century B.C. and early first century A.D. that changed Rome from an open republic to a repressive military monarchy. Chronologically the course begins with the appearance on the Roman political stage of the unabashedly ambitious Julius Caesar, and ends with the accession of a hereditary autocrat in the person of the morose ruler Tiberius. Exploring a variety of sources, the course focuses on the political tensions and civil commotions of the revolutionary era associated with warlords such as Pompey, Crassus, Caesar, and Antony, and concentrates especially on the rise to power of Augustus, the most ruthless warlord of all, and his creation of a personal political regime that was to last in style for centuries.

MI 30610. Roman History-Writing
(3-0-3)

This third-year course builds on CLLA 20003 and CLLA 20004, and offers close reading of passages from the works of the historical writers Caesar and Sallust. Latin historiography is a sophisticated instrument for narrating past events, for showing how notions of cause and effect and change over time develop in historical thinking, and for indicating the relevance of the past to the present. The political and social conditions of Rome that informed the writings of Caesar and Sallust are discussed, and the compositional techniques of their works are examined. The course prepares students for advanced offerings in Latin literature, especially CLLA 40022, CLLA 40032, and CLLA 40052.

MI 30630. Introduction to the Latin Vulgate
(3-0-3)

Readings in the prose and poetry of the Latin Bible. The peculiarities of its Latin, influenced by Greek and Hebrew, will be analyzed from an historical linguistic perspective and also interpreted according to Christian exegetical tradition. Special stress on the Psalms with accompanying readings in Augustine’s Enarrationes. No knowledge of Hebrew or Greek required.

MI 30663. Historical Survey: Arabic Middle East

(3-0-3) Amar

This course will chart the history of the Arab Middle East from the formative period of the emergence of Islam in the seventh century through the fall of Constantinople in 1453 and the creation of the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Intended to be broad in its coverage and comprehensive in its scope, the course will introduce students to the social, cultural, and religious crosscurrents that came to define the Arab life and culture in the region.

MI 30672. Saints and Kings in Medieval Ireland

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on a series of encounters (in early Irish and Hiberno-Latin) between saints and kings or other royal characters. Through these stories and characters, tensions between the domains of spiritual and secular, the local and the “national,” the native and the external, are raised, explored, and (sometimes, though by no means always) resolved. Saints such as Patrick, Colmcille, Brigit, Ciarán, and Cainnech, together with kings such as Lóegaire Mac Néill, Diarmuid Mac Cerbaill, and Muirchertach Mac Erca will be studied.

MI 30673. Celtic Otherworld: Early Irish

(3-0-3)

In early Irish tradition, the everyday world (of men, women, kings, warriors, and cattle) and the Otherworld stand in unstable and uneasy relation to one another. The Otherworld has several aspects: it can be positive and beneficial—indeed it is viewed as the legitimating source of rule in this world—but also baleful and destructive. In this course, we will study a range of Otherworld encounters, seeking to understand the vast range of contacts between the human world and the other world (or worlds) of early Irish tradition.

MI 30674. The Irish Tradition I

(3-0-3)

Ireland possesses the oldest vernacular literary tradition in Europe, spanning over 1,500 years to the present day. This course will provide a survey of the origins and development of that literary tradition through more than a millennium from its beginnings until the 17th century, when political circumstances led to the collapse of the highly developed native system of learning, poetry, and patronage. The development of the Irish literary tradition will be traced against this background of political and cultural upheavals from approximately 500 to 1650.

MI 30680. Medieval German Literature

(3-0-3) Wimmer

This course constitutes a survey of German literature from its beginnings during Germanic times until the 16th century. Ideas, issues, and topics are discussed in such a way that their continuity can be seen throughout the centuries. Lectures and discussions are in German, but individual students' language abilities are taken into consideration. Readings include modern German selections from major medieval authors and works such as Hildebrandslied, Rolandslied, Nibelungenlied, Iwein, Parzival, Tristan, courtly lyric poetry, the German mystics, secular and religious medieval drama, Der Ackermann aus Bohmen, and the beast epic Reineke Fuchs. Class discussions and brief presentations in German by students on the selections are intended as an opportunity for stimulating exchange and formal use of German.

MI 30700. Introduction to Medieval Art

(3-0-3) Joyner

This course will introduce the visual arts of the period ca. A.D. 300 to ca. A.D. 1300. In the course of the semester, we shall devote much time to considering the possibility of a history of medieval art, as the objects and practices of the Middle Ages will be shown to make our assumptions about the nature of art history problematic. Working from individual objects and texts we will construct a series of narratives that will attend to the varieties of artistic practices available to the Middle Ages. From these, it will be shown that art was a vital, complex, lucid, and formative element in the societies and cultures, both secular and sacred, that shaped this period.

MI 30720. Late Antique and Early Christian Art

(3-0-3)

Art in Late Antiquity has traditionally been characterized as an art in decline, but this judgment is relative, relying on standards formulated for art of other periods. Challenging this assumption, we will examine the distinct and powerful transformations within the visual culture of the period between the third and the eighth centuries A.D. This period witnesses the mutation of the institutions of the Roman Empire into those of the Christian Byzantine Empire. The fundamental change in religious identity that was the basis for this development had a direct impact upon the visual material that survives from this period, such that the eighth century witnesses extensive and elaborate debates about the status and value of religious art in Jewish, Moslem, Byzantine, and Carolingian society. This course will examine the underlying conditions that made images so central to cultural identity at this period.

MI 30724. Gothic Art and Architecture

(3-0-3)

It was during the Gothic period, stretching approximately from the 12th to the 15th centuries, that artists raised their social status to a higher level and produced a greater quantity of works than ever before seen in the Christian West. The architectural forms that we identify as characterizing the Gothic style, such as pointed arches, flying buttresses, pinnacles, and quatrefoils were applied not only to buildings, but to altarpieces, illuminated manuscripts, liturgical objects, and even to domestic items such as spoons, beds, and chests. This style has a powerful legacy, and has been frequently revived to various purposes in the modern era. In this course we analyze representative examples of Gothic art and architecture in light of their production at a time of great social, intellectual, religious, and political dynamism and upheaval.

MI 30726. Northern Renaissance Art

(3-0-3)

This course traces the development of painting in Northern Europe (France, Germany, and Flanders) from approximately 1300 to 1500. Special attention is given to the art of Jan Van Eyck, Rogier van der Weyden, Heironymous Bosch, and Albrecht Dürer. Through the consideration of the history of manuscript and oil painting and the graphic media, students will be introduced to the special wedding of nature, art, and spirituality that defines the achievement of the Northern Renaissance.

MI 30753. Art into History: Reading the Art of Medieval Byzantium

(3-0-3)

Byzantine art has often been opposed to the traditions of Western naturalism, and as such has been an undervalued or little known adjunct to the story of medieval art. In order to develop a more sophisticated understanding of this material we will examine the art produced in Byzantium in the period from the ninth to the 12th century, a period marking the high point of Byzantine artistic production and influence. Stress will be placed upon the function of this art within the broader setting of this society. Art theory, the notions of empire and holiness, the burdens of the past, and the realities of contemporary praxis will be brought to bear upon our various analyses of material from all media. How we, as art historians, can write the history of this rich culture will be a central issue of this course.

MI 30757. Venetian and Northern Italian Renaissance Art

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on significant artistic developments of the 16th century in Venice with brief excursions to Lombardy and Piedmont. Giorgione, Titian, and Palladio, the formulators of the High Renaissance style in Venice, and subsequent artists such as Tintoretto and Veronese are examined. An investigation of the art produced in important provincial and urban centers such as Brescia, Cremona, Milan, and Parma also provide insight into the traditions of the local schools and their patronage.

MI 30758. Kingdom, Empire, and Devotion: Art in Anglo-Saxon, Ottonian, and Romanesque Europe

(3-0-3) Joyner

Although the Anglo-Saxon kingdom and Ottonian Empire overlap in time during the 10th and 11th centuries, the images and objects produced by both cultures manifest the different political, social, and religious identities being deliberately constructed. By the mid-11th century, the Normans had invaded England, the Salian emperors had succeeded the Ottonians, and European art is more cohesively and problematically labeled as Romanesque. This class will examine Anglo-Saxon and Ottonian art as individual visual traditions and trace their impact on images, objects, and monuments of the more loosely defined Romanesque era.

MI 30800. Ancient and Medieval Political Theory

(3-0-3)

What is the meaning of justice, and why should we care about it? Can politics ever perfectly establish justice? Which forms of government are best for human beings to live under, and why? What is the political relevance of religion and philosophy, family and ethnicity, war and peace, nature and freedom, law and right? What are the qualities of a good citizen and political leader? How should relations among diverse political communities be conducted? This course introduces students to theoretical reflection on these and related questions through the study of some of the great works of ancient and medieval political thought. Readings will include writings of authors such as Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Augustine, Farabi, Maimonides, and Aquinas.

MI 40003. Survey of Christian Latin

(3-0-3) Bloomer

Prerequisite: (CLLA 20004 OR CLLA 325)

This class surveys the development of Christian Latin language and literature from their origins through Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages. It introduces students to the various important linguistic, stylistic, and literary influences that contributed to Christian Latin poetry and prose. Students will also be introduced to the varieties of Christian Latin texts and the bibliographical and research skills needed to pursue research into these texts. All along we will be concerned to improve our abilities to read and understand the Latin of the tradition that stretches from the first translations of scripture to the treatises of Jerome and Augustine. The survey of Medieval Latin language and literature in the spring semester follows and builds upon this course.

MI 40004. Medieval Latin

(3-0-3) Mantello

This course is an introduction to the Latin language and literature of the late antique and medieval periods (ca. A.D. 200–1500). Designed to move students toward independent work with medieval Latin texts, the course will emphasize the close reading and careful translation of a variety of representative medieval Latin texts and documents with attention to vocabulary and word formation, orthography and pronunciation, morphology and syntax, and prose styles and metrics. The course will provide a review of the principal constructions of classical Latin and an introduction to some of the areas of medieval Latin scholarship, including lexis, bibliographies, great collections and repertoires of sources, and reference works for the study of Latin works composed in the Middle Ages.

MI 40028. Introduction to Meister Eckhart

(3-0-3)

This course will attempt to introduce Eckhart's thought by reading a selection of his most important Latin works. This close textual study will demonstrate the extent to which Eckhart presents a possibly unique combination of extreme technical exactitude and exegetical flexibility and how, thanks to these skills, he is able to develop a radically Neoplatonic (Dionysian) philosophy within the context of Augustinian readings and a methodology responsive to the demands of the Aristotelian or Scholastic traditions. Selections will be from works including Exposition of Genesis, the Book of the Parables of Genesis, the Exposition of John, the Parisian Questions, the Prologue to the Tripartite Work, and the Prologue to the Work of Propositions. Although the works to be selected for study are available at least in German and sometimes also in French or English translations, a reading knowledge of Latin is essential for this course. Requirements: regular translation exercises (written and oral) and one short oral presentation.

MI 40102. History of the English Language

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to introduce students to the historical development of the English language, from its earliest recorded appearance to its current state as a world language.

MI 40110. Old English

(3-0-3) Hall

Training in reading the Old English language and study of the literature written in Old English.

MI 40142. The Canterbury Tales

(3-0-3) Frese

The Canterbury Tales are read in the original Middle English, with the twin goals of obtaining a deepened knowledge of the text-world contained within it along with how applications of contemporary critical practices can be used to produce new insights into the work.

MI 40149. The Literature of Late Medieval England

(3-0-3)

This course will survey various kinds of late medieval English writing, from the chivalric romance, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, to the dream vision, Piers Plowman, to the spiritual autobiography of Margery Kempe. We will focus on the language of the period, reading several of these texts in Middle English or in facing-page translations, as well as relevant aspects of medieval culture, its modes of representation, its literary genres, and its social and political conflicts.

MI 40151. Book Under Suspicion: Censorship and Freedom of Expression in Medieval English Literature

(3-0-3) Kerby-Fulton

Late medieval writers operated in a world distressed by social injustice, political oppression, and church controversy. Although this period saw the rise of modern English literature, itself, it was also a time when starving peasants rebelled against their overlords, knights rode off on crusade amidst anti-war critique, English translations of the Bible were suppressed, women mystics struggled to be heard amidst gender prejudice, and the king Chaucer worked for was deposed and murdered. This course will examine how the major writers of late medieval England negotiated these troubled waters, writing sometimes candidly and sometimes secretly about dangerous or disturbing matters. Authors to be studied will include Geoffrey Chaucer, William Langland, the Wakefield Master playwright, Julian of Norwich, Margery Kempe, and Marguerite Porete (the only medieval woman author to have been burned at the stake for her writings). The aim is to help illuminate how literary writers sought to defend or enlarge their religious or political orthodoxies in response to the challenges of the time.

MI 40161. Arthurian Legends

(3-0-3)

An examination of the textual traditions surrounding the once-and-future-king, Arthur, through readings of Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain, Chretien de Troyes's The Story of the Grail, The Quest of the Holy Grail, selected short fictions from the Welsh Mabinogion, Marie de France's Lais, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, and selections from Malory's Morte D'Arthur, Tennyson's Idylls of the King, and T.H. White's The Once and Future King.

MI 40180. Medieval Drama

(3-0-3)

This class will exercise literary, theatrical, and religious imagination through readings, critical writing, discussion, and enactments of medieval dramatic texts. There also will be occasional viewings of filmed contemporary presentations of medieval plays. The goal of our individual and collective work aims at a deeper understanding and appreciation of what it was that medieval people meant to do when they “played” salvation history—altering, embellishing, at times “modernizing,” and sometimes “deforming” the text of sacred scripture on which these pre-Renaissance dramas were based. In the course of the semester, we will attend closely to the gradual, intricate movement from sacred liturgies to secular comedies, with special attention given to the relation of actors and audiences. In so doing, we will also observe and assess—theatrically and theologically—how the comic drama of everyday events and concerns has been subtly connected to the events of salvation history. We will also try to decide whether the development of farce, ribaldry, melodrama, and realism were a logical outgrowth of, or a deviation from, the original sacred traditions. All members of the class will take their occasional turn as producers and performers. In addition to periodic short written assignments of one to two pages, each student will submit a version of production notes and observations generated by the experience of serving as producer and/or actor in an extended scene or entire short drama. Everyone, including the teacher, will read with an open notebook: This informal reading journal will record ideas, thoughts, difficulties, insights, questions, frustrations, and illuminations that will serve simultaneously as a sourcebook for the papers and productions.

MI 40212. Age of Charlemagne

(3-0-3)

The Carolingian (from Carolus, Latin for Charles; Charles the Great—Charlemagne—was the most famous Carolingian) period, roughly the eighth and ninth centuries, was foundational for Western Europe. But this was also the time when the mid-Byzantine Empire consolidated its position and when the Abbasid family of caliphs introduced important and durable changes in the Islamic world. This course will focus on the West in the age of Charlemagne, but will draw frequent comparisons with and make continuous reference to Europe’s Byzantine and Islamic neighbors. The course will explore such themes as Europe’s Roman and Christian inheritances from antiquity; the peoples of the Carolingian world; kingship and empire; political and social institutions and ideologies; religious and secular law; war and diplomacy; agriculture and trade; the church—popes, bishops, monks, and nuns; theology; art and architecture; and Latin and vernacular literature. Reading assignments will combine modern scholarship and primary sources (in translation). Students will write midterm and final examinations and will choose between several short papers or one long paper. Graduate students will meet weekly with the professor, carry out reading assignments different from those of the undergraduates, and submit a series of short papers.

MI 40214. Renaissance Italy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: HIST 32500

This course examines the political, cultural, social, and religious history of Italy from about 1350 to 1550. Starting with an extended study of Florence, its economic foundations, social and political structures, artistic monuments, and key personalities, the course then examines how the culture of the Florentine Renaissance spread to the rest of Italy, especially to the papal court of Rome and the princely courts of northern Italy, and, finally, to the new nation-states of northern Europe. Key topics will include the growth of the Italian city-state; the appearance of new, Renaissance “characters” (the merchant, the prince, the courtier, the mercenary, the learned lady, the self-made man); Renaissance humanism and the classical revival; the relationship between art and politics; and Renaissance ideas of liberty, virtue, historical change, and the individual’s relationship to God. The course will not tell a story of steady progress from medieval to modern institutions, societies, and modes of thinking; rather, we will consider the Renaissance as a period in flux, in which established traditions thrived alongside creative innovations and vigorous challenges to authority. Students will write one long paper and take a midterm and a final exam.

MI 40215. History of Medicine to 1700

(3-0-3)

This class surveys the history of Western biomedical ideas, research, and health care practices from its ancient Mediterranean and Middle Eastern foundations to the medical reforms and materialistic theories of the mid-18th century. The canonical approach emphasizes the growth of rational medicine, focusing on the development of medical epistemology and method, but also considers how medicine as it has been practiced in the West reflected classical theory, embraced folk beliefs and treatments, and integrated the therapeutic and doctrinal knowledge of medieval Islam. Medical thought and practice was shaped by the intellectual, social, and religious changes that shook Europe in the late Middle Ages and early modern period, resulting in a profound transformation of natural philosophy and efforts to reform society during the scientific revolution and nascent Enlightenment. Many of the basic elements of modern medical ethics, research methodology, and the criteria for sound scientific thinking that first emerged in late classical Greek thought were refined during this period, and much of the diversity of healing paradigms in American and European national cultures today, as well as many of the reactions of Western medical authorities to non-Western ideas and practices, can be understood if viewed in the context of antecedent medical principles.

MI 40220. The Roman Empire

(3-0-3)

This advanced course in ancient history examines the Roman Empire from Augustus to Constantine. It deals with the establishment of the Augustan Principate and the progression of autocracy at Rome in the first two centuries of the imperial age, leading to discussion of what is generally called the third-century crisis and the new monarchy of Diocletian and Constantine. It investigates how the Roman Empire as a geopolitical unit was governed and administered (paying particular attention to the all-powerful figure of the Roman emperor), and how the diverse regional cultures of the greater Mediterranean world were affected by Roman rule. Among topics studied are contemporary debates on Roman society, economy, demography, and culture.

MI 40252. Medieval Nobilities

(3-0-3) Boulton

This course will introduce students to one of the major areas of historical investigation in Europe since 1945: the evolution and function of the hereditary élites now generally called “nobilities.” Although alien to the culture and legal system of the United States, an élite social category of this general type dominated the economic, political, social, and cultural life of every major European people and state throughout and often somewhat beyond the agricultural or pre-industrial era of its history—most commonly to about 1918—and may be seen as a characteristic feature of polities on the levels of chiefdom and agricultural state throughout the world. Thus some understanding of the phenomenon of nobility and its many variant forms is essential to an understanding of the history not only of Europe, but of the civilized world in general before the 20th century. The course will begin with an examination of both medieval and modern ideas of “nobility” (which designated at once an inherent condition, a legal status, and a social category), the words employed to express those ideas, the ways in which noble status could be acquired and lost, the attributes that might be used to express it (including heraldic emblems), and the approaches taken to the whole phenomenon by social, political, constitutional, and cultural historians of various schools. It will then examine the history of a few of the numerous different nobilities that developed in the countries of Catholic Europe between 400 and 1500, and finally examine what is currently known about such themes as noble privilege, power, wealth, and influence.

MI 40300. Early Medieval Philosophy

(3-0-3) Gersh

The course will provide an introduction to philosophy in the period before the translation movement of the 12th century and the rise of Aristotelianism in the universities (including the contributions of such major figures as Augustine, Boethius, Eriugena, and the “School of Chartres”). The arrangement will be predominantly thematic rather than chronological. We will consider such topics as (1) the legacy of ancient philosophy; (2) the relation between theology and philosophy; (3) the relations between the trivium, quadrivium, and philosophy; (4) the genres of philosophical writing (treatise, dialogue, letter, etc.); and (5) the influence of earlier medieval philosophical doctrines in the later Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Knowledge of Latin will be useful but not absolutely necessary, since many of the texts are also available in translation. Requirement: one final paper of ca. 20 pp.

MI 40321. Boethius: An Introduction

(3-0-3)

This course will attempt a study of Boethius, one of the foundational figures of medieval culture, in an interdisciplinary and open-ended manner. Our approach will be interdisciplinary in that we shall simultaneously study philosophical-theological and literary subject matter and simultaneously apply philosophical-theological and literary methods. It will be open-ended in that students will be expected to react creatively to the topics under review in terms of their own independent studies and research (e.g., in connecting Latin and vernacular materials). During the course, we shall read a broad selection of passages in Latin and in English translation drawn from Boethius's work in the fields of science (arithmetic, music), logic, and theology. Part of the course will be devoted to a close study of De Consolatio Philosophiae. We shall study Boethius as reading intertextually the Greek philosophers Plato and Aristotle and the Greek scientists Nicomachus and Ptolemy, without forgetting the Latin theology of Augustine. Turning from Boethius to Boethius in quotation marks and Boethius "under erasure," we shall study Boethius read intertextually by glossators, commentators, and other writers from the eighth to the 14th century. Requirement: one final essay (ca. 20 pp.)

MI 40322. Founders of the Middle Ages

(3-0-3)

One of the difficulties of studying medieval philosophy arises from the need to read, along with the medieval philosophers themselves, the various ancient sources on which they depend. Everybody knows that Plato and Aristotle enjoy a special status among these sources. It is also widely known that the philosophy of these Greek writers was transmitted to the medieval world through certain less well-known writers of Late Antiquity who sometimes overwhelmed what they were transmitting with their own thoughts and commentaries. This course is aimed at introducing the student to the three most important of these late ancient intermediaries: Augustine, Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and Boethius. In the first half of the semester, we will learn something of these writers themselves by reading some of Augustine's early dialogues, extracts from the Dionysian corpus, and Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy and theological treatises. After the midsemester break, the focus will shift to the medieval readings of these works: for example, in Eriugena, Anselm of Canterbury, Thierry of Chartres, Albert the Great, Meister Eckhart, and Nicholas of Cusa. Language requirement: Latin desirable but not necessary. Written requirement: one final essay (20 pp.).

MI 40324. Plotinus and Proclus

(3-0-3)

This course will (1) introduce students to the two major figures of ancient Greek Neoplatonism, and (2) provide a sketch of their influences on Latin, Byzantine, and Islamic thought. The multicultural approach of the second half of the project will be stressed.

MI 40325. Anselm and His Biographer

(3-0-3) Gersh

The course will be of a philosophical-theological, historical, and literary-philological nature. It will also have two more specific aims: (1) to introduce the philosophical work of Anselm of Canterbury, and investigate some of its sources and influences during the Middle Ages, and (2) to pursue Latin readings in works by Anselm himself, and in works by other medieval writers about Anselm. One session of each week will be devoted to Latin reading. Students will be required to prepare a Latin text for oral translation and be prepared to comment on philological issues. Texts will be distributed in advance by the instructor. The second session of the week will be devoted to lectures on Anselm and his milieu by the instructor, although students will be required to make a short oral presentation on a topic of their choice but approved by the instructor toward the end of the semester. Requirement: competence in Classical Latin (intermediate or advanced level).

MI 40340. Aquinas on God

(3-0-3)

A close reading of the first 43 questions of the first book of the Summa Theologiae. These questions, which deal both with the divine essence and with the three divine persons, provide a comprehensive survey of St. Thomas's Metaphysics.

MI 40361. Plato Christianus

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the philosophy of Plato, the "Platonism" (i.e., Middle Platonism, Neoplatonism) of antiquity, the transformation of Platonism by the Greek and Latin Church Fathers, and the medieval and Renaissance traditions derived from the above. In the first half of the semester, we shall survey the tradition as a whole and deal with a variety of general questions. However, particular attention will be given to two fundamental hermeneutic criteria employed by the followers of this tradition: namely, "radical selectivity" and "philosophical allegorization." In the second half of the semester, two specific texts that have arguably set the pattern for the Latin and Greek intellectual traditions respectively will be studied in more detail: Augustine's On the City of God and the works of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. The course is intended to be accessible to students without knowledge of Latin or Greek. Requirement: one final paper of approximately 20 pages.

MI 40362. Hermeneutics, Deconstruction, and Medieval Thought

(3-0-3) Gersh

The aims of this course are both methodological and historical. The methodological part will consist of an introduction to hermeneutics (in a broad sense) as theorized and/or practiced in certain areas of modern continental philosophy. After a brief look at the crucial innovations of Husserl, we shall study carefully chosen extracts (in English translation) of Heidegger: Being and Time and What is Called Thinking; Gadamer: Truth and Method; and Derrida: Of Grammatology, Writing and Difference, Dissemination in order to illuminate the different (even opposing) ways in which the idea of "hermeneutics" can develop. This general discussion will be combined with specific consideration of the themes of allegory and negativity. The historical part of the course will concentrate on late ancient, patristic, and early medieval readings (Origen: On First Principles; Augustine: On Christian Teaching, Literal Interpretation of Genesis; and Proclus: Commentary on Plato's Timaeus). Here, we shall attempt to advance our comprehension of ancient literature by (1) looking for parallels with modern hermeneutic techniques; and (2) applying the modern techniques in test cases. The course is intended to be relatively open-ended; i.e., students will be expected to think about the way in which these discussions are internally coherent and also relate to their own areas of interest (which may be elsewhere in philosophy, theology, or literature (Latin or vernacular). Requirement: one final essay of ca. 20 pp.

MI 40367. Medieval and Renaissance Platonism

(3-0-3)

This course aims to study the transition between medieval and Renaissance philosophy with special reference to the Platonic tradition. In order to achieve this aim, we will focus on a small group of central figures and study some of their works in detail. Texts to be studied, in whole or part, will include Nicholas of Cusa: On Learned Ignorance, On the Beryl, On the Vision of God; Marsilio Ficino: Platonic Theology, On Love, On Plato's Phaedrus; and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: On the Dignity of Man, On Being and Unity, Heptaplus. We will study not only the general question of the impact of Humanism on the scholastic method of the Middle Ages, but also such more specific questions as the expansion of the "Platonic" corpus and the new viewpoints on the history of philosophy. Knowledge of Latin will be helpful but not essential (since all above texts are available in English). Written requirement: one final paper of ca. 20 pp.

MI 40368. Allegory and Cosmology

(3-0-3)

During the Middle Ages in the Latin West, the Timaeus was the only work of Plato that achieved wide dissemination (in the translation by Calcidius). Especially when read in conjunction with other works of Late Antiquity such as Macrobius's commentary on Cicero's Dream of Scipio and Servius' commentary on Virgil's Aeneid, this dialogue came to be viewed as "cosmological" with regard to content and as "mythical" or "allegorical" with regard to style. Our course will be devoted to the influence of such a Timaeus in 12th-century Latin authors. Beginning with some discussion of the philosophical commentaries of Bernard of Chartres and William of Conches, we will engage in a sustained reading of Bernard Silvestris's Cosmography and Alan of Lille's On the Complaint of Nature, paying close attention to the themes of the disorder of matter, the harmony of the spheres, and the soul's celestial journey soul. Knowledge of Latin is desirable but not essential. Requirement: one final paper (ca. 20 pp.)

MI 40369. Medieval Negative Theology

(3-0-3) Gersh

The course will begin by examining the historical background in ancient and later ancient philosophy (Plato, the Neopythagoreans, the Neoplatonists) of the theological and philosophical method which later became known as "negative theology." Having extracted a kind of definition from the historical survey, we will look at four major figures of the early Christian and medieval periods in greater detail, reading selected works or parts of works in English translation but also paying attention to the original Latin (or Greek). The authors and works will be (1) Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (On Divine Names, On Mystical Theology, On the Celestial Hierarchy); (2) Iohannes Scottus Eriugena (Periphyseon, books I–III); (3) Meister Eckhart (Parisian Questions, selections from biblical commentaries, selected German and Latin sermons); and (4) Nicholas of Cusa (On Learned Ignorance, books I–II, On the Vision of God). The last part of the course will consist of a brief survey of the many other medieval writers who used the negative method, and also some notes on its influence in the Renaissance and later times. Knowledge of Latin will be useful but not necessary for the course. Written requirement: one final paper of ca. 20 pp.

MI 40407. Introduction to the Early Church

(3-0-3) Cavadini

This course offers a basic introduction to the theology and life of the early Church from the second to the fifth centuries. Special emphasis is given to the development of doctrine, the development of a spiritual theology, and the shape of the lives of Christians both ordinary and extraordinary.

MI 40433. Theology of St. Augustine

(3-0-3)

Augustine of Hippo was arguably the most influential theological thinker in the history of Western Christianity. A brilliant professional rhetorician and a profound student of Neoplatonic philosophy, Augustine brought his gifts and training to the service of the Church when he was baptized, after a long struggle of faith, in 387. Yet perhaps because of his gifts, he was always surrounded by controversy, and has remained so down to the present—appearing to many to be responsible for some of the main shortcomings of the Church's theology and practice, even as his writings largely set the agenda for later theological discussion in the West. In this course, we will read a representative sample of his major works—some of his early philosophical treatises, the Confessions, his homilies on I John and on some of the Psalms, some of his controversial works on grace and human freedom, and parts of On Christian Teaching, On the Trinity, and On the City of God. Our goal will be to discover Augustine's characteristic blend of exegesis, pastoral concern, philosophical speculation, and spirituality, and to let it challenge and nourish our own reflective faith.

MI 40442. Thomas Aquinas and the Pursuit of Wisdom

(3-0-3)

This course offers an orientation to the theology of Thomas Aquinas through his account of "wisdom," which in Thomas refers to the contemplation of divine things and the ordering of all else in that light. The theme of "wisdom" threads its way through the entire range of Thomas's theology, and attention to "wisdom" will make clear many of Thomas's most important convictions about the nature of the theological enterprise; the interrelated doctrines of God, and, of Christ; and, the specific character of Christian discipleship.

MI 40481. Mysticism and Morality

(3-0-3)

Is mysticism (variously described as the presence of God, a direct experience of God, a consciousness of God, or pure love of God) the culmination of the moral life or its true beginning? To what extent should our moral decisions be guided by our personal experiences of the divine? Given the frequent appeals that thoughtful Christians make to the judgments of conscience, how if at all can we distinguish between the true voice of God in the human heart and self-consoling delusion? Are those who claim to have had, and write sweetly about, an "experience" of God real guides to be trusted by the Christian community, or are they dangerous spiritual individualists who threaten the coherent moral witness of the Church? How, if at all, are we to reconcile the teachings of Christian mystical writers with the sacramental life of the Church and the cultivation of Christian virtue? Is a life of intense asceticism, or even an explicitly Christian faith, necessary for mystical knowledge? We will examine these and other questions in the four parts of the course: (1) Maps of the Soul (through a comparison of Augustine's Confessions and Teresa of Avila's Interior Castle); (2) Reasons of the Soul (through a comparison of Bonaventure's Journey of the Mind into God and Marguerite Porete's Mirror of Simple Souls); (3) Loves of the Soul (through a comparison of Catherine of Siena's Dialogue and Ignatius of Loyola's Spiritual Exercises; and (4) Questions of the Soul (through a comparison of Simone Weil's Waiting for God and The Dark Night of the Soul by John of the Cross). Course requirements include two class presentations and a final paper comparing two of the authors examined during the semester.

MI 40491. The Holy Land

(3-0-3) Reynolds

This course will investigate the manner in which Christians and Muslims through the centuries have understood the religious dimension of Palestine, and of Jerusalem, in particular. In the first section of the course we will analyze classical religious texts, including: the New Testament prophecies of Jerusalem's destruction; the narratives surrounding Saint Helen's recovery of the true Cross and sacred relics; the traditions of Muhammad's night journey to Jerusalem, and Muslim narratives on the conquest of Palestine and the construction of the Dome of the Rock. In the second section of the course, we will turn to the memories and visions of individual believers, such as the descriptions of medieval Muslim geographers, the travelogues of European Christian pilgrims, the writings of Eastern Orthodox monks of the Palestinian desert, and the popular religious pamphlets and websites of the Muslim and Christian faithful today.

MI 40502. Renaissance and Baroque Poetry of Spain

(3-0-3) Juarez-Almendros

A close reading of traditional and Italianate poetry that includes villancicos, romances, and the works of Garcilaso de la Vega, Fray Luis de Leon, San Juan de la Cruz, Gongora, Quevedo, and Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz.

MI 40504. Cervantes: Don Quixote

(3-0-3)

A close reading of Cervantes's novel in relation to the prose tradition of the Renaissance: novella, the pastoral romance, the romance of chivalry, the humanist dialogue, and the picaresque novel. We will also pay attention to the historical, social, and cultural context of the work. Students in this seminar must participate actively in class discussions. Each student will be required to make a presentation (15 minutes) upon the subject of his/her term paper. The term paper, of approximately 8–10 pages, will be on a topic individually agreed upon and discussed by each student with the instructor. No prior knowledge of Cervantes is necessary to take this course, but a solid knowledge of Spanish is required.

MI 40509. Spanish Golden Age Short Novel

(3-0-3)

A close reading of traditional peninsular narratives.

MI 40531. Introduction to Old French

(3-0-3) Boulton

This course is designed to be an introduction to the language and dialects of medieval France, including Anglo-Norman. Readings will include texts written between the 12th and the 14th centuries, such as the Lais of Marie de France, trouvère poetry, the prose Lancelot, Machaut, and Froissart.

MI 40532. From Roland to the Holy Grail

(3-0-3)

This is a survey of medieval French literature from 1100 to 1300, including the epic, the romance, drama, and poetry.

MI 40533. Life, Love, and Literature in Renaissance Lyons

(3-0-3) Della Neva

The city of Lyons was a cultural center of Renaissance France. This course will focus on the literature that arose from that location, most especially (but not exclusively) the love poetry of three French Renaissance lyricists: Maurice Scève's Délie, the Rymes of Pernette Du Guillet, and the Oeuvres Poétiques of Louise Labé. Excerpts from other authors associated with Lyons, including Rabelais, Marot, and Du Bellay will also be treated. This course will take a "cultural studies" approach, and students will be expected to work on topics such as the presence of Italians, royal pageantry and celebrations, the presence of the court, industry, fairs, banking and trade, architecture, art and music, intellectual circles, and the Reformation in the city of Lyons. Special attention will be given to the role of women in Lyonnais society and the Querelle des Amyes generated in that city. This course will be taught in French. ROFR 30310 (Textual Analysis) or prior experience with textual analysis highly recommended. NOTE: If there is sufficient interest, it may be possible to arrange a "field trip" to Lyons over spring break. Please contact the professor immediately if you have an interest in pursuing this possibility.

MI 40538. La femme a la Renaissance

(3-0-3)

This course will consider the image of women in the works of Renaissance male writers as well as the literary production of women in Renaissance France. Authors to be discussed include Jeanne Flore, Hélienne de Crennes, Marguerite de Navarre, Louise Labé, and Pernette Du Guillet. Taught in French.

MI 40552. Dante I

(3-0-3) Cachey

An in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical, and literary context, with selected reading from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, De vulgari eloquentia). Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation. Students may take one semester or both, in either order.

MI 40553. Dante II

(3-0-3)

An in-depth study, over two semesters, of the entire Comedy, in its historical, philosophical and literary context, with selected readings from the minor works (e.g., Vita Nuova, Convivio, De vulgari eloquentia). Lectures and discussion in English; the text will be read in the original with facing-page translation. Students may take one semester or both, in either order.

MI 40554. Petrarch

(3-0-3)

The course will explore fundamental themes in Petrarch's writings in Latin, especially the Secretum and the epistles and in the Triumphs and the Canzoniere. Contemporary critical approaches will be employed in the analysis of the Canzoniere.

MI 40555. Boccaccio

(3-0-3)

A textual analysis of the Decameron, with emphasis on structure and themes. Different critical approaches will be used in the analysis of individual tales, their relationships to the frames, and their reflection on Boccaccio's society.

MI 40581. Renaissance Woman

(3-0-3)

This course is designed as an introduction to the study of women and literature of the Renaissance period in Europe. It will treat the subject of the "Renaissance woman" in three ways. First, there will be a brief historical overview of the condition of women of different social classes during this period, focusing on topics such as their education, the role of marriage, and the convent as an alternative to married life. Secondly, it will survey how women were viewed in the literature written by men in various European countries. Here we shall read excerpts from Dante and the courtly love tradition, Petrarch and the Petrarchists, Shakespeare, and Rabelais, among others. We shall also consider the portrayal of women in artistic works of this time, comparing this to their literary representation. Next, we shall study the literature created by women during the Renaissance in Europe. During this part of the course, we shall consider some of the problems generated by women's writing, using Virginia Woolf's A Room of One's Own as a point of departure for our discussions. At the end of the course, we will resume our study of the image of woman in the Renaissance by reading a modern play set at that time (Peter Whelan's The Herbal Bed on the trial of Shakespeare's daughter) that treats some of the issues facing women at that time. All foreign texts will be read in English translation.

MI 40601. Ovid

(3-0-3) Bloomer

Prerequisite: (CLLA 20004 OR CLLA 325)

This advanced course provides an introduction to the poetry of the prolific author Ovid. It explores the creative history of the one writer who can truly be called a poet of the Augustan age through close reading of passages from his love poetry (the Amores and the Ars Amatoria, a handbook on seduction), his great mythological poem, the Metamorphoses, and the poems written after Ovid was exiled by Augustus to a remote spot on the shores of the Black Sea (the Tristia and Epistulae ex Ponto). Special attention is paid to the contexts in which Ovid composed his works, and current and traditional interpretations of his poetry are considered.

MI 40632. Medieval Latin Survey

(3-0-3) Muller

The aim of this course is to experience a broad spectrum of Medieval Latin texts. Readings representative of a variety of genres (literary and subliterary), eras, and regions will be selected. Students planning to enroll in this course should be completing Introduction to Christian Latin Texts, or they must secure the permission of the instructor.

MI 40634. St. Augustine's Confessions

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (CLLA 20004 OR CLLA 325)

This course provides an introduction to St. Augustine's Confessions, through reading of extensive selections from the Latin text, a careful reading of the entire work in English translation, and the application of a variety of critical approaches, old and new.

MI 40636. Augustine and the City of God

(3-0-3)

The aim of the course is to gain a detailed understanding of one of the world's important works of historical and political theology. Writing in response to the destruction of the City of Rome by Visigothic invaders in A.D. 410, Augustine devoted the first half of this "long and difficult work" to a refutation of Roman religion and ancient philosophy (Books I–X). In the second half (Books XI–XXII) he explained what he meant by City of God and Terrestrial City and traced the evolution through time of the two cities in relation to each other. We will study the City of God in light of the sources Augustine engaged with. For the first part, these include the philosophers Plato, Apuleius, Plotinus, and Porphyry; the historians Sallust and Livy; and also the statesman Cicero and the poet Vergil. In the second part, Augustine builds on biblical theology, history, and chronology. To conclude, we will devote some time to the influence of this very long book. It will be studied in English, but those with viable Latin will be encouraged to use it.

MI 40661. Islam: Religion and Culture

(3-0-3)

This introductory course will discuss the rise of Islam in the Arabian Peninsula in the seventh century of the Common Era and its subsequent establishment as a major world religion and civilization. Lectures and readings will deal with the life of the Prophet Muhammad, the Qur'an and its role in worship and society, early Islamic history, community formation, law and religious practices, theology, mysticism, and literature. Emphasis will be on the core beliefs and institutions of Islam and on its religious and political thought from the Middle Ages until our own time. The latter part of the course will deal with the spread of Islam to the West, resurgent trends within Islam, both in their reformist and extremist forms, and contemporary Muslim engagements with modernity.

MI 40681. Der Artusroman/Arthurian Epic

(3-0-3)

Come and explore the enduring legend of King Arthur and his court as interpreted by German authors of the high Middle Ages (late 12th and 13th centuries). We spend the majority of the semester on the three best-known and most complete Arthurian epics in the German tradition: Erec and Iwein by Hartmann von Aue, and Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival, as well as other later German adaptations they influenced. These tales are among the most imaginative and fascinating in the German canon, full of the adventures and exploits of knights and ladies. Our exploration of these texts focuses on their relationship to their French and English predecessors, on the many twists and turns in story line and character development that each individual author creates, and on the information they suggest about "real" life in the medieval world. We also take a look at some of the most interesting modern literary and film adaptations of the Arthurian legend.

MI 40720. The Formation of Christian Art

(3-0-3)

Art in Late Antiquity has traditionally been characterized as an art in decline, but this judgment is relative, relying on standards formulated for art of other periods. Challenging this assumption, we will examine the distinct and powerful transformations within the visual culture of the period between the third and sixth centuries A.D. This period witnesses the mutation of the institutions of the Roman Empire into those of the Christian Byzantine Empire. Parallel to these social changes we can identify the emergence of a Christian art that defines our basic assumptions about the role of art in a Christian society. The fundamental change in religious identity that was the basis for this development had a direct impact upon the visual material that survives from this period. This course examines the underlying conditions that made images so central to cultural identity at this period.

MI 40723. Byzantine Art

(3-0-3)

Byzantine art has often been opposed to the traditions of western naturalism, and as such has been an undervalued or little known adjunct to the story of medieval art. In order to develop a more sophisticated understanding of this material we will examine the art produced in Byzantium in the period from the ninth to the 12th century, a period that marks the high point of Byzantine artistic production and influence. Stress will be placed upon the function of this art within the broader setting of this society. Art theory, the notions of empire and holiness, the burdens of the past and the realities of contemporary praxis will be brought to bear upon our various analyses of material from all media. How we, as art historians can write the history of this rich culture will be a central issue of this course.

MI 40725. Fifteenth-Century Italian Renaissance Art

(3-0-3)

Open to all students. This course investigates the century most fully identified with the early Renaissance in Italy. Individual works by artists such as Brunelleschi, Donatello, Ghiberti, Botticelli, and Alberti are set into their social, political, and religious context. Special attention is paid to topics such as the origins of art theory, art and audience, portraiture and the definition of self, Medician patronage, and art for the Renaissance courts of northern Italy and Naples.

MI 40784. Vocal Sacred Music II

(3-0-3)

Vocal Sacred Music II is devoted to Renaissance polyphony (ca. 1400–1600). The course will cover matters of liturgy, performance practice, musical forms, notation, sources, and major composers. The course is open to upper-class music majors and graduate students in the Medieval Institute and Master of Sacred Music Program.

MI 40806. Early English Theatre

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on English theatre during the two-century "run" from c. 1350 to 1576 of the great civic religious dramas known as cycle plays, which depict the breadth of cosmic and human history from the Creation to Doomsday. The study of drama and theatre of this period will help to establish the context for Shakespeare and his contemporaries by examining not only the surviving plays but also the sources that provide external evidence of drama, secular music, and other communal entertainment and ceremony.

MI 43201. Seminar: The Pearl Poet

(3-0-3) Frese

Close readings of the Arthurian romance of Gawain, Patience (the whimsical, pre-Pinnocchio-and-Gepetto paraphrase of the story of Jonah and the whale), Cleanness (a series of homiletic reflections of great power, beauty, grim wit, and compassionate insight centered on varying conceptions of "purity"), and Pearl (the elegiac dream-vision that begins with the mourning father who has lost a young daughter, then moves with amazing grace from the garden where he grieves into a richly envisioned earthly paradise where he is astonished to re-encounter his lost "Pearl," who then leads him to the vision of a New Jerusalem whose post-apocalyptic landscape is populated exclusively by throngs of beautiful maidens).

MI 43285. Knighthood and Chivalry in Medieval Europe, 750–1625

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the history of knighthood (the status of noble heavy cavalryman) and chivalry (the distinctive ethos and code of the knightly class) from their emergence in Western Europe between 950 and 1180 through their apogee between 1180 and 1380 to their slow decline between 1380 and 1625 (and their revival in the 19th century). It will deal first with the knight as warrior, vassal, and monk (in the religious orders of knighthood), then with the knight as nobleman and landowner, and finally with the knight as courtier and civil servant in the emerging state. It will next proceed to an examination of knightly games, festivals, and iconography, and conclude with a look at the survival and revival of chivalry in the post-Gothic period.

MI 43326. Anselm

(3-0-3) Flint

An examination of the major philosophical and theological writings of St. Anselm. His Monologion, Proslogion, and Cur Deus Homo will be of central concern, but several lesser known texts will also be read. Topics discussed in these writings include arguments for the existence of God, the divine nature, the Trinity, the Incarnation, freedom (and its compatibility with divine foreknowledge), and truth.

MI 43341. Aquinas's Philosophy and Theology

(3-0-3)

A close examination of the philosophical arguments within the first 13 questions of Aquinas' Summa Theologiae, including arguments about the distinction between philosophy and sacred theology; the existence of a god; divine simplicity; divine perfection; divine goodness; divine infinity; divine immutability; divine eternity; divine unity; how God is known by us; and how God is spoken about by us.

MI 43342. Aquinas on Creation

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the central metaphysical questions involved in the claim that God creates the entities in the world ex nihilo, along with an examination of hermeneutical questions involved in the interpretation of Genesis 1. The main texts for the course will be the treatment of creation and of the work of the six days found in St. Thomas's Summa Theologiae, supplemented by the treatment of creation in Francisco Suarez's Disputationes Metaphysicae.

MI 43343. Aquinas on Human Nature

(3-0-3)

A close study of St. Thomas Aquinas's philosophical anthropology, based on questions 75–101 of the First Part of the Summa Theologiae. Some topics include the human soul and its powers, the sentient appetite, higher human cognition and willing, and the production of the first human beings in the state of innocence.

MI 43583. King Arthur in European Literature

(3-0-3) Boulton

We will read representative works chosen from the major medieval European literary traditions, including, for example Latin (Geoffrey of Monmouth), English (Lawman, Malory), French (Chrétien de Troyes, the Vulgate Cycle), Spanish (La Tragèdia de Lançalot, Tristán), German (Hartmann von Aue, Gottfried von Strassburg), and Italian (La Tavola Ritonda, Tristan Panciatichiano).

MI 43638. Augustine: Selected Readings

(3-0-3) Muller

In this course, we will read select passages from Augustine's earliest extant works, the so-called Cassiciacum dialogues. Augustine spent the winter between his conversion (386) and his baptism (Easter 387) at a friend's villa in Cassiciacum near Milan, where he wrote four philosophical works, Contra Academicos, De Beata Vita, De Ordine, and Soliloquia. In choosing the form of the philosophical dialogue, he paid homage to his pagan predecessors, above all Cicero. The influence of pagan philosophy, especially Neoplatonism, is present throughout the dialogues, as is the interest in classical literature and in the liberal arts. The dialogues represent Augustine's first attempt to express and structure his newfound belief (as well as the experience of his conversion), and the views and sentiment expressed in them sometimes widely differ from his later works; yet it is unmistakably Augustine who is speaking. We will discuss the position of the dialogues in the course of Augustine's intellectual development by comparing them to selections from later works (above all, Confessions) and from pagan philosophers (Cicero, Plotinus). Prerequisite: 3 years of college Latin or by permission of the instructor.

MI 46020. Directed Readings—Undergraduate

(V-0-V)

Offers advanced undergraduate students a possibility to work closely with a professor in preparing a topic mutually agreed upon.

MI 47801. NSF-REU Biocultural Research Program

(6-0-6)

The Jerusalem field school will engage students in an experiential learning environment that immerses them in anthropological method and theory. Using the large Byzantine St. Stephen's skeletal collection as the cornerstone, historical and archaeological information will be synthesized in a biocultural reconstruction of ancient monastic life. Students will conduct original research, share in a field trip program visiting numerous Byzantine sites and area research institutions, and will participate in a lecture program delivered by top scholars in the fields of biological anthropology, classics, and Near Eastern studies.

MI 50001. Introduction to Medieval Studies

(1-0-1) Constable

A 1-credit-hour course designed to introduce students to the basic bibliographies, handbooks, and research tools in medieval studies. Professors from various disciplines will participate. Open only to honors track majors in medieval studies.

MI 50783. Vocal Sacred Music I

(3-0-3)

Vocal Sacred Music I is devoted primarily to Gregorian chant, with some study toward the end of the semester of medieval polyphonic works based on chant. The course will cover matters of liturgy, performance practice, musical forms, notation, and sources.

MI 58001. Senior Honors Thesis I—Research

(3-0-3)

This course is part of a two-semester sequence open only to seniors in the medieval studies honors program. Guided by a faculty adviser, students will research and write a thesis that results in a scholarly examination of a clearly defined topic. In the fall semester, students formalize the choice of a topic initially selected at the end of their junior year and complete the research begun on the project during the preceding summer. Specific deadlines for a thesis proposal and bibliography are available from the director of undergraduate studies.

MI 58002. Senior Honors Thesis II—Writing

(3-0-3)

This course is part of a two-semester sequence open only to seniors in the medieval studies honors program who have completed MI 58001 successfully. Guided by a faculty adviser, students will use the research completed in the fall to write drafts and a final version of their senior honors thesis. Specific deadlines and requirements for the written stages of the thesis are available from the director of undergraduate studies.

Department of Music

MUS 10010. Rudiments of Music

(1-0-1)

A course designed for students with little or no musical background. Topics covered include musical notation, scales, keys, key signatures, triads, seventh chords, rhythm, and meter.

MUS 10090. Theory for Non-Majors

(3-0-3)

A one-semester survey of the structure of tonal music. Topics covered include chord formation, voice leading, harmonic progression, cadences, dissonance treatment, and form.

MUS 10111. Introduction to Eighteenth-Century Music

(3-0-3) Frandsen

Introduction to the major composers and musical genres of the 18th century. Composers studied include Vivaldi, Bach, Handel, C.P.E. Bach, Gluck, Mozart, and Haydn; musical genres studied include the cantata, concerto, sonata, fantasia, quartet, opera, and oratorio. Readings include reactions and criticisms of 18th-century listeners, and writings of modern music scholars.

MUS 10112. Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, and Brahms

(3-0-3)

Music in its historical context.

MUS 10120. Introduction to Romantic Music

(3-0-3)

Music from Beethoven to Mahler. No musical background required.

MUS 10121. Introduction to European Romanticism

(3-0-3)

A survey of 19th-century European Romanticism in art and music. No musical background required.

MUS 10125. Literature and Opera

(3-0-3)

In this course, the full title of which is Taking Liberties: From Book to Libretto, or French Literature Goes to the Opera and which is being taught in ENGLISH for the first time, we will be looking a series of “parent” texts, written originally in French, and their operatic “offspring.” Our objective will be less to highlight textual difference, although in certain cases that is far from being an uninteresting area of investigation, than to appreciate the theme and variation of, let us say, Merimée’s Carmen and the treatment she gets in Bizet’s opera. Among the text/operas we will examine as books (in English translation or in the original French depending on individual student preference and as operas (DVD projections with subtitles) will be The Barber of Seville (Beaumarchais/Rossini); The Marriage of Figaro (Beaumarchais/Mozart); Don Juan (Molière) and Don Giovanni (Mozart); Manon Lescaut (Prévost/Puccini), and Carmen (Mérimée/Bizet). We may try for one more: either Le roi s’amuse (Hugo)/“Rigoletto” (Verdi) or La dame aux camélias (Dumas)/ La Traviata (Verdi). As a so-called “appreciation” course, students need not necessarily know French or music theory. What are required are open minds, eyes, and ears. There will be two papers, the second being more ambitious than the first, and a final exam. Prerequisite: 300-level literature or music course or permission of instructor. This course does fulfill a 400-level requirement for French majors. This course does not fulfill a 20000-level class for music majors.

MUS 10131. Introduction to Jazz

(3-0-3) Dwyer

A music appreciation course requiring no musical background and no prerequisites. General coverage of the significant musicians, styles, and structures of jazz music. Receive permission from the instructor (ldwyer@nd.edu).

MUS 10132. Modern Jazz

(3-0-3)

A study of the jazz performers and practices of the latter half of the 20th century to today—the roots, stylistic developments, and directions of individual artists, small combos, and big bands, using recordings, videos, and live concerts. No musical experience is required.

MUS 10133. Gender, Sexuality in Pop Media

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on predetermined gendered roles and sexuality in our culture as represented in popular media. Special emphasis will be placed on film as we look at, among other things, issues of sexuality and homosexuality on the silver screen. We will also look closely at music, the emergence of a female presence, music videos, and hip-hop culture.

MUS 10150. Music of the Catholic Rite

(3-0-3) Frandsen

A study of the music composed for the Mass, the Office Hours (primarily Vespers), and the Requiem Mass from the Middle Ages to the present day. The musical repertoire of each era is examined both from a purely musical standpoint and in light of the reactions of various popes, from John XXIII through Pius X, to the sacred music of their day. Documents on sacred music issued after Vatican II also are examined in relation to postconciliar church music for both the choir and the congregation.

MUS 10164. Topics: Film/Popular Music

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: FTT 10101 OR FTT 20101

Corequisite: MUS 11164

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of pre-recorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and biopics. We will see films using popular music of all kinds—Tin Pan Alley, ’50s rock ’n roll, jazz, disco, country, French pop, and more. We will consider the role of the star—ranging from Astaire to Travolta, Dylan to Madonna—and films by directors such as Scorsese and Welles. Looking at films from the 1930s to the present, we will consider the narrative function and meaning of music, industrial practices, changing social values, how songs get Academy Awards, how soundtracks circulate, and how film relates to various other musical media, such as radio and MTV. Throughout, we will pay special attention to how pop music affects film’s ideologies of gender, race, and sexuality. Students do not need a background in music. Films will include The Band Wagon, American Graffiti, A Man and A Woman, Saturday Night Fever, Touch of Evil, Truth Or Dare, The Umbrellas of Chergourg, Round Midnight, and Nashville.

MUS 10190. Introduction to Classical Music

(3-0-3)

Historical survey of Western art music from the Middle Ages to the present, with emphasis on the study of selected significant vocal and instrumental works.

MUS 10201. Brass Ensemble

(1-0-1) O’Leary

Special groups of brass instruments meeting weekly. Literature covered will depend upon the nature of the ensembles organized and student enrollment. Will not apply to overload.

MUS 10203. Percussion Ensemble

(V-0-V) Sanchez

This ensemble is organized according to the needs of those who audition through the regular process at the beginning of each semester. It consists of those for whom the larger ensembles are inappropriate. Examples include clarinet choir, percussion ensemble, and other band instrument ensembles.

MUS 10210. Chorale

(1-0-1) Blachly

A select group devoted to the singing of diversified sacred and secular literature. Performs at Notre Dame and on tour.

MUS 10221. Glee Club

(1-0-1) Stowe

Notre Dame's traditional all-male choir.

MUS 10222. Collegium Musicum

(1-0-1) Stowe

A select choir that concentrates its performances in the medieval and Renaissance repertoire.

MUS 10230. Jazz Band

(1-0-1) Dwyer

Open through audition.

MUS 10231. New Orleans Brass Band

(1-0-1) Merten

An ensemble performing the traditional and new music of New Orleans-style brass bands.

MUS 10233. Jazz Improvisation

(1-0-1) Dwyer

Students will study scales, key centers, and chords, in order to develop improvisation skills using melodic and rhythmic variation, chordal and modal techniques, and aural transcriptions of recorded solos.

MUS 10240. Symphonic Winds

(1-0-1) Dye

This ensemble prepares and performs traditional and contemporary works for band in a smaller, wind ensemble setting, rehearsing twice per week, with a short concert tour and two concerts during the semester.

MUS 10241. Wind Ensembles

(1-0-1) Dye

Wind and brass ensembles assembled for performance with special instrumentation.

MUS 10242. Symphonic Band

(1-0-1) Sanchez

This ensemble prepares and performs traditional and contemporary works for band in a large concert ensemble setting, rehearsing twice per week, with a short concert tour and two concerts during the semester.

MUS 10244. Fall Concert Band

(1-0-1) Sanchez

This ensemble prepares and performs traditional and contemporary works for band in a large concert ensemble setting, rehearsing once per week with one concert near the end of the semester.

MUS 10245. University Band

(1-0-1) Dye

This ensemble will provide a traditional concert band experience for brass, woodwind and percussion players in the Notre Dame community. Under the direction of Kenneth Dye and the Notre Dame band staff, the University band prepares and performs a wide variety of music, including everything from marches, overtures, and pop melodies to the traditional Notre Dame favorites. Rehearsals take place in the Band Building. Those who are able may register for MUS 10245, University Band, for one credit, although registration is not required to participate. Application for membership can be made by contacting the band office.

MUS 10361. Contemporary Song Writing

(1-0-1)

Prerequisite: (MUS 20001 OR MUS 231)

Exploring fundamentals of song writing, composing and performing vocal or instrumental songs.

MUS 11164. Topics in Film/Popular Music Lab

Prerequisite: MUS 10101 OR MUS 20101*Corequisite:* MUS 10164

This course examines the relationship between popular music and film through an examination of film scores, the genre of the musical, musical performance, the use of prerecorded pop songs in films, rockumentaries, music video, and pop biopics. We'll see films using popular music of all kinds—Tin Pan Alley, '50s rock 'n roll, jazz, disco, country, French pop, and more. We'll consider the role of the stars—ranging from Astaire to Travolta, Dylan to Madonna—and films by directors such as Scorsese and Welles. Looking at films from the 1930s to the present, we'll consider the narrative function and meaning of music, industrial practices, changing social values, how songs get Academy Awards, how soundtracks circulate, and how film relates to various other musical media, such as radio and MTV. Throughout, we will pay special attention to how pop music affects film's ideologies of gender, race, and sexuality. Students do not need a background in music. Films will include The Band Wagon, American Graffiti, A Man and A Woman, Saturday Night Fever, Touch of Evil, Truth Or Dare, The Umbrellas of Cherbourg, Round Midnight, and Nashville.

MUS 13182. Fine Arts University Seminar

(3-0-3) Johnson

This course will use the aesthetic of "impressionism," an aesthetic that suffused the art and music of the early-20th century, to understand the artistic creations of a number of the most important composers, painters, and filmmakers of the years 1870–1980. Though sited mostly in France and England, side trips to Russia, the Soviet Union, and the United States will reveal the broad scope of impressionism. Through readings that cover biography, criticism, politics, and aesthetics we will begin to assemble a fairly complete picture of what impressionism was, and what its continuing influence is. No knowledge of music or musical notion is necessary, but listening and video assignments will be components of the course.

MUS 20001. Harmony and Voice Leading (Theory I)

(3-0-3) Johnson; Smith

A systematic approach to the understanding and manipulation of the basic materials of music. Required of and intended for music majors and minors, but open to students with sufficient musical background.

MUS 20002. Music Theory II

(3-0-3) Haimo; Smith

Prerequisite: (MUS 20001 OR MUS 231)

A systematic approach to the understanding and manipulation of the basic materials of music. Required of and intended for music majors and minors, but open to students with sufficient musical background.

MUS 20011. Musicianship I

(1-0-1) Tidback

Exercise and mastery of basic skills in music: melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and keyboard. To be taken along with Theory I and II. Required of all students intending to major in music.

MUS 20012. Musicianship II

(1-0-1) Tidback

Exercise and mastery of basic skills in music: melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and keyboard. To be taken along with Theory I and II. Required of all students intending to major in music.

MUS 20041. Counterpoint

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MUS 20001 OR MUS 231) OR (MUS 10090 OR MUS 230)

This course will focus on the practice of counterpoint—the writing of independent voices and their polyphonic combination. This course is designed primarily for music majors, but qualified non-majors are also welcome. (The prerequisite for the course is normally Theory I, but Theory for Non-Majors can also serve as a prerequisite.) For more than 400 years, the polyphonic vocal music of the 16th century (and the music of Palestrina, in particular) has been viewed as an ideal. Ever since the 18th century, the craft of counterpoint has been learned using a pedagogic method called "species counterpoint." (When Beethoven came to Vienna to study with Haydn, he studied species counterpoint with Haydn). Species counterpoint is a graded set of compositional problems that take the student from the simplest rhythmic situations for two voices, progressively through more complicated rhythmic situations, all the way to free writing for four or more voices. Students will be assigned species counterpoint exercises for every other class. In class, the assignments will be put up on the board and critiqued. The final project for this course will be the writing of a motet for four voices in the style of Palestrina. Essential for any student interested in composition, species counterpoint is also invaluable as a tool to understand the inner workings of polyphonic music and the treatment of dissonance throughout the Baroque, Classical, and Romantic eras.

MUS 20101. Medieval and Renaissance Music History I

(3-0-3) Blachly

A survey of music. The study of the major forms and styles in Western history.

Required of music majors and minors, but open to students with sufficient musical background. MUS 20001 and MUS 20002 recommended before taking this class.

MUS 20112. Baroque Music (History II)

(3-0-3) Frandsen

A survey of music. The study of the major forms and styles in Western history.

Required of music majors. A survey of the styles and forms of Baroque music (ca. 1600 and 1750). Restricted to music majors; non-majors with sufficient musical background who wish to enroll in the class should contact the professor. Prerequisites: MUS 20001 and MUS 20002 (Theory I and II). It is strongly recommended that students also take MUS 20101 (History I) before enrolling in MUS 20112.

MUS 20141. Understanding World Music

(3-0-3)

This course introduces a wide variety of musical systems, emphasizing the integration of culture-specific concepts about musical sound with the particular historical, social, and political contexts that shape and are shaped by that sound. Select musical case studies from South Asia, Africa, and Latin America will be explored and juxtaposed to reveal relationships to relevant themes such as nationalism, migration/diaspora, spirituality, the social position of music/musicians, improvisation, and social protest. No background in music is required, only open ears and minds.

MUS 20145. Appreciating World Music

(3-0-3) Ng

Prerequisite: (MUS 20001 OR MUS 231 AND MUS 20002 OR MUS 232)

This course introduces students to the methods for conducting field research, reviewing live musical events and evaluating world music recordings. Through discussions about music from South Africa, Mexico, the Philippines, Indonesia, and China, students learn about the musical practices of these other cultures and understand their motivations for musical production. Challenges faced by musicians from colonialism, racism, nationalism, cultural imperialism, and commercialism are also engaged. In addition, students are encouraged to "discover" world music among the diasporic communities within their own societies and get the opportunity to perform music of some of the cultures studied.

MUS 20146. Music and Globalization in Asia

(3-0-3) Ng

This course explores musical production in India and China, the "new cultural cores" that are gradually replacing the United States and Western Europe in cultural influence in Asia and the Asian diaspora. Taking into account these countries' colonial and semi-colonial histories, their political and economic development, and the increasing transnational movement of their citizens, this course charts the development of commercially successful music from these countries—bhangra; Bollywood; Chinese pop; and fusion music popularized by bands such as Twelve Girl Band and composers such as Tan Dun in Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon—that have not only captured Asia, but the West as well, and shaped the imagination of what Indian-ness and Chinese-ness are, both to the Chinese/Indians and non-Chinese/Indians. In addition, this course examines Filipino entertainers, a group of musicians who provide live entertainment of a transnational capacity throughout Asia. They represent important channels for the dissemination of Indian and Chinese popular music in that region. Globalization and cosmopolitanism theories will be discussed in this course.

MUS 20147. Music of Africa and the African Diaspora

(3-0-3)

Students explore music from West Africa, Southern Africa, East Africa, and the Caribbean, South America, and the United States, paying close attention to how their reception and performance inform and influence each other historically and contextually. The seminar emphasizes an interdisciplinary approach to the subject, drawing from the ethnomusicology, African and African American studies, anthropology, and colonial and postcolonial studies.

MUS 20148. Music and World Religions

(1.15-0-3)

Through this ethnomusicology course, students will learn the roles music occupies in world religions. More than a world music course, we will examine the creative expression of the divine through the universal language of organized sound as music, as music plays a major role in the in the practice of most religions worldwide. This study involves all the major continents, highlighting new perspectives as to the confluence between religious culture and musical expression. Knowledge of music beneficial but not required; just ears and minds open to the diverse ontological understandings comprising various worldviews.

MUS 20491. Instrumental Techniques

(3-0-3) O'Leary

A hands-on music and liberal arts course designed to teach students instrumental techniques in preparation for experiential learning experiences within the local community and abroad. Students will receive instruction on wind and percussion instruments that will enable them to excel while outside the classroom. Students will apply these skills as directors and mentors in the Bandlink program and service opportunities overseas.

MUS 20651. Ensemble Management

(3-0-3) Dye

Students will learn pedagogical techniques to help them manage a large ensemble rehearsal. Students will receive one-on-one instruction from faculty as well as have extensive hands-on opportunities to practice these techniques. Students will serve as directors within the Bandlink program and share responsibility for classroom management, literature selection, instruction, logistics, and budget.

MUS 20691. Instrumental Pedagogy

(1-0-1) Dye

Notre Dame students will learn teaching techniques on their instruments through hands-on instruction of local students in the Bandlink program. Instruction will be in individual lessons and small-group rehearsals.

MUS 20890. The Business of Music

(3-0-3) Dye

A historical survey of the synergistic relationship between music and business. Covering major technological, legal, and economic forces influencing the musical arts. This class will address the latest developments by studying historical practices, cutting-edge technologies, emergent business practices, and global trends in both business and music.

MUS 20941. Vocal Physiology and Pedagogy

(1-0-1)

In this class, students will learn in detail the anatomical structures and processes that are involved in singing. They will also be introduced to important concepts and issues involved in vocal pedagogy. Coursework will involve class participation, reading assignments, tests, and a small project.

MUS 30141. Music, Religion, and Media in South Asia

(3-0-3)

This course explores the meaning of musical sound across a range of spiritual and mass-mediated contexts from North and South India, Pakistan, and Nepal. Special attention is paid to the ecstatic and spiritual uses of music in the rituals and performances of various Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim (especially Sufi), Christian, Sikh, and agnostic communities. An underlying focus of the course is the relationship between the sacred and the secular, and between commercial and devotional practices of music making and music listening: How do musical and spiritual practices become commercialized by mass-mediated production and reception? Conversely, are there ways in which the uses of mass-mediated music are ritualized and take on a spiritual dimension? We will approach these and other related questions through case studies, such as Muslim-Hindu relations as depicted in “Bollywood” movies, cassette-playing as a devotional act on Himalayan pilgrimages, and classical music performance as the expression of religious sentiment. Musical experience and ability to read music are preferred, but not required.

MUS 30142. Post-Nineteenth-Century Music of Africa and the Diaspora: Its Influences on Religious and Social Change

(3-0-3)

Students explore music from North, East, Central, Southern, and West Africa in the contexts of both 19th- and 20th-century colonialism and post-colonialism. Additionally, students will be exposed to the music of the African Diaspora in South America, the Caribbean, the United States, and Europe, paying close attention to how religious and socio-political themes infuse and inform performance practices as well as societal change. Many musical genres—from reggae to rap and salsa to funk—will be covered. The course emphasizes an interdisciplinary approach to the subject, drawing from ethnomusicology, African and African American studies, Diaspora studies, anthropology, history, religious, and colonial and post-colonial studies. Although not a prerequisite, this is a continuation of Music of Africa and the Diaspora (MUS20147). Preparation for lectures includes select readings and occasional listening. Please bring open ears as much listening will be done in class.

MUS 40023. Twentieth-Century Russian Composers: Skryabin, Stravinsky, Prokofiev, and Shostakovich

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: MUS 30003 AND MUS 30004

The analysis of works by Skryabin, Stravinsky, Prokofiev, and Shostakovich, with particular attention to theories that have been developed to explain their music.

MUS 40024. Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky

(3-0-3) Johnson

Study and analysis of the music of Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky up to 1920.

MUS 40025. Music Theory V

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: MUS 30003

A study of the procedures for harmonic, melodic, rhythmic, and formal analysis.

MUS 40052. Orchestration and Synthesiation Through Songwriting

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: MUS 10090 OR MUS 20001

This course will investigate first the standard orchestral and popular instruments by arranging and performing student songs, from liturgical to popular to art-song. The second half of the course will investigate MIDI synthesis, notation, and recording as it applies to songwriting. Students will be assigned different song-form projects in various genres and instrumental combinations. Arranging those songs for instruments and synthesizers, notating them efficiently and clearly, and communicating their intentions to performers will constitute the bulk of the course. Special emphasis will be placed on techniques for orchestrating piano music.

MUS 40122. Goethe and Song

(3-0-3) Youens

Prerequisite: MUS 20002

A study of 19th- and 20th-century songs to poetry by the great German writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), including music by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Hugo Wolf, and many others.

MUS 40124. Schubert: His Life and Works

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: MUS 20002

A comprehensive survey of the life, cultural, and historical contexts and music of Franz Schubert (1797–1828).

MUS 40125. Shakespeare and Verdi

(3-0-3) Youens

An in-depth study of 19th-century Italian operatic adaptations of Shakespeare, with particular focus on Macbeth, Othello, and Falstaff by Giuseppe Verdi.

MUS 40160. Words and Music

(3-0-3) Jeffery

Prerequisite: MUS 20002

We'll investigate three areas: (1) new psychological research on relationships between music and language, (2) how composers of many eras and cultures have set texts to music, and (3) the uses of linguistic concepts in music theory and analysis. Units will include phonology (classification of sounds), prosody and rhythm, speech and melody, syntax and grammar, and rhetoric and semantics (meaning).

MUS 40402. Piano Collaboration

(1-0-1) Blacklow

For advanced piano students only, by permission of instructor. Pianists in this course have an opportunity to develop the specific skills and abilities needed for accompanying vocalists and/or instrumentalists, and are encouraged to bring their colleagues to class.

MUS 40441. Diction I - German

Elements and expressive techniques of German diction, utilizing the International Phonetic Alphabet.

MUS 40442. Diction II - English, Italian

(1-0-1) Lancaster

Elements and expressive techniques of English and Italian diction, utilizing the International Phonetic Alphabet.

MUS 40443. Diction III-French

(1-0-1)

Elements and expressive techniques of French diction, utilizing the International Phonetic Alphabet.

MUS 40444. French Vocal Literature

(1-0-1)

A survey of vocal literature in France from the 16th century to the present, with an emphasis on comparative listening.

MUS 40490. Orchestral Excerpts

(1-0-1) Plummer

Excerpts from the standard orchestral literature encompassing styles from the 18th century through the 20th century. Instructed by individual members of the faculty.

MUS 40500. Music Through Technology

(3-0-3) Dye

Music through Technology is a lecture/lab course open primarily to CAPP and music majors, with consideration of other talented students. Lecture topics include the historical evolution of technology in music, surveying the influence that technology had on the music world, both from a creative standpoint to the accessibility and distribution of music to the masses. Other examples of technology's influence in music may include the development of multi-track recording on popular music, synthesizer, and midi technology, technology's applications for musical composition, and the adaptation of CD and mp3 formats to musical performers. The historical influence of technology is an illuminating foundation to current developments in the creative processes of music. Lab topics cover an introduction to current music technology including digital audio recording and editing, midi technology (sound and notation) and the digital management and distribution of music. Students will experience all of these technologies on an introductory level, but focus their interests on a technology-based final project to develop and display their acquired skills.

MUS 40941. Vocal Physiology and Pedagogy

(1-0-1) Lancaster

In this class, students will learn in detail the anatomical structures and processes that are involved in singing. They will also be introduced to important concepts and issues involved in vocal pedagogy. Coursework will involve class participation, reading assignments, tests, and a small project.

MUS 41300. Piano Lessons for Junior Majors

MUS 43140. The Politics and Economy of Music

(3-0-3)

Using relevant case studies, this course explores various issues pertaining to music: its commodification; use in advertising and to promote tourism; its representation of gender identities and sexuality; its function in furthering nationalism and transnationalism; its role in projecting class, racial and ethnic identities; and its power to ignite political and social change. A wide range of music will be engaged with, from Chopin and Celtic music to Balinese dance and the music of the Australian Aborigines."

MUS 43991. Issues in Film and Media

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: FTT 41601

This course serves as a capstone course for film, television, and media students, and an elective course for music students. It combines theoretical and historical reading and the opportunity for applied research, either as a 20-page term paper or as a creative project in film or music. There is a class topic that varies each semester. Readings will highlight the historical and aesthetic development of the acoustic dimension of cinema (and to some extent, television and video) from pre-cinema to contemporary sound design to the video iPod. The student projects may concentrate on some aspect of the class topic, or compose an accompaniment for a film, or create a sound design for a film. The course will be conducted as the kind of seminar that one might encounter in a graduate program, with students giving oral presentations based on readings and screenings. The class meets in weekly 150-minute sessions, with a short mid-session break. There will be guest faculty visiting the class. The term projects are developed over the semester in close consultation with the instructor. For the music students in the class, there is the possibility of traveling to a silent film and music festival in Italy, Oct. 7–14. (This is contingent on a successful grant application for the course, on the students' eligibility for international travel, and on the permission of their instructors for them to miss classes during that week.) Lab attendance at weekly screenings, Tuesday at 7:00–9:30 p.m., is required.

MUS 48390. Senior Recital

(1-0-1)

One full-length (one hour) or two half-length (30 min.) recitals required for all performance majors. An additional full-length recital required for honors.

MUS 48900. Senior Thesis

(V-0-V)

Music history and theory majors in the honors program must write a senior thesis. They will be assigned an advisor with whom they will work.

MUS 50021. Tonal Forms

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MUS 30003 OR MUS 251)

A systematic study of the principal forms of tonal music (sonata, rondo, variation) with in-depth analysis of selected works by Haydn, Beethoven, and Brahms.

MUS 50022. Schenkerian Analysis

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (MUS 30003 OR MUS 251)

This course will focus on techniques of analysis for music of the common practice era (Bach to Brahms) through study of the groundbreaking methodology developed by the Viennese music theorist Heinrich Schenker (1868–1935). Schenker's theory focuses on the interaction of harmony and voice leading on local, chord-to-chord levels of musical organization—what he termed the foreground—to the most global levels of large-scale structure—the background—and the intermediary levels through which he relates these two extremes—the middle ground. But the theory is much more than a study of harmony and voice leading: it confronts these musical dimensions through their relationship with rhythmic, formal, and motivic aspects of musical organization, in essence aspiring to a holistic method of analysis that traces both the interrelatedness and tension among multiple aspects of musical structure. The class will engage Schenke's method primarily through hands on application of his approach to actual music. In the process, students will learn to express analytical insights through Schenke's own novel method of musical "graphing," which reinterprets aspects of traditional musical notation to communicate interpretive perceptions about actual pieces. We will also read from Schenker's own published analyses and theoretical writings and from select publications drawn from the enormous body of scholarship that has followed in his wake. In addition to the readings, the course will require weekly graphing assignments, classroom presentation of analytical work and individual research, and a final analysis project. The course is open to all students who have completed Theory III (MUS 30003) as a prerequisite.

MUS 50023. Rhythm, Harmony, and Form in the Nineteenth Century

(3-0-3)

Studies in theoretical issues arising from 19th-century musical techniques.

MUS 50024. The Chamber Music of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms

(3-0-3) Smith

Prerequisite: MUS 30003

The course focuses on the practice of hands-on analysis of the chamber music of these three 19th-century masters of the genre. Our engagement with the music will be holistic, with light cast on each composer's diverse yet related approaches to aspects of form, tonal-harmonic language, thematic process and motivic development, and rhythmic-metric characteristics. Secondly, we will study the important historical relationships among Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, as exhibited in the technical characteristics of their music. Much of the course will address the music itself, but there will also be readings from select secondary sources, which will provide background on the relevant analytical methodologies. Assignments will include weekly listening and score study, readings from the scholarly literature, periodic analysis assignments and short essays, and a final exam and final paper.

MUS 50060. Band Arranging

(3-0-3)

Covers the basic orchestrational, technical, and formal problems associated with arranging pre-existing material for band. This course will be project-oriented, and instruction will focus on the student's own arrangements.

MUS 50100. Introduction to Medieval Plainchant

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the genres and sources of medieval liturgical chant. Genres will be examined within the context of the history of liturgy and as musical forms and styles. Manuscript sources will be studied as documents in the history of musical notation and as foundations for establishing viable editions of melodies and texts. A basic knowledge of musical notation is a prerequisite. Some knowledge of German or French or Latin is highly desirable.

MUS 50101. Vocal Sacred Music I

(3-0-3)

Vocal Sacred Music I is devoted primarily to Gregorian chant, with some study toward the end of the semester of medieval polyphonic works based on chant. The course will cover matters of liturgy, performance practice, musical forms, notation, and sources. The course is open to upper-class music majors and graduate students in the Master of Sacred Music Program.

MUS 50102. Vocal Sacred Music II

(3-0-3) Blachly

Vocal Sacred Music II is devoted to Renaissance polyphony (ca. 1400–1600). The course will cover matters of liturgy, performance practice, musical forms, notation, sources, and major composers. The course is open to upper-class music majors and graduate students in the Medieval Institute and Master of Sacred Music Program.

MUS 50113. Vocal Sacred Music III

(3-0-3) Frandsen

This is a seminar designed for graduate students in the Master of Sacred Music program. Senior music majors may also register for this course (under this number only). The course covers sacred art music composed for performance within a liturgical context as well as in public concerts between ca. 1600 and 1750, or from Monteverdi and Schütz to Bach and Handel, and examines this repertoire both from an analytical perspective and in relation to its various performance contexts. Students will read a variety of studies from the disciplines of musicology, music theory, and church history (including papal legislation on music), and will be expected to be able to discuss the works under consideration in class from a variety of perspectives, including musical form, musical style, harmonic language, and liturgical use. Questions of the relationship between music and liturgy, devotion, spirituality, and contemporary culture will also be considered. The hymnody of this era will also be examined. The course will also include the examination of contemporary musical sources, both print and manuscript. Students will be asked to make several class presentations throughout the semester, and to write a research paper of at least 15 pages. Grading will be based on class participation, class presentations, and the research paper.

MUS 50120. Studies In Lied

(3-0-3) Youens

The study of selected German art-songs for solo voice and piano by the masters of the genre.

MUS 50121. Nineteenth-Century Sacred Music

(3-0-3)

A study of sacred music between 1750 and 1900. The course will examine the sacred art music of this period, both that composed for liturgical use and that composed for the concert stage, and will also cover important developments during this period such as the Cecilian Reform Movement. The course is open to upper-class music majors and graduate students in the Master of Sacred Music Program.

MUS 50122. Vocal Sacred Music V

(3-0-3)

Survey and analysis of Christian sacred music of the 20th and 21st centuries, including both sacred art music and repertoires composed for the congregation. Official denominational directives for, scholarly assessments of, and pastoral evaluations concerning these repertoires. The course is open to upper-class music majors and graduate students in the Master of Sacred Music Program.

MUS 50123. Heinrich Heine and the Lied

(3-0-3)

The history of German Romantic song in the late 19th century through the poetry of Heinrich Heine (1797–1856).

MUS 50190. Opera

(3-0-3) Youens

Topics relating to the history of opera.

MUS 50220. Twentieth-Century Analysis: Schoenberg

(3-0-3) Haimo

Techniques of composition employed by composers of the 20th century.

MUS 50400. Organ Music of J.S. Bach

(3-0-3) Cramer

An exploration of the 18th-century composer's work.

Department of Philosophy

PHIL 10100. Introduction to Philosophy

(2-0-3) David

Corequisite: PHIL 12100

A general introduction to philosophy, with emphasis on perennial problems such as the existence of God, human freedom, and moral obligation. The course is also intended to sharpen the student's skills of critical thinking.

PHIL 10101. Introduction to Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A general introduction to philosophy, with emphasis on perennial problems such as the existence of God, human freedom, and moral obligation. The course is also intended to sharpen the student's skills of critical thinking.

PHIL 13185. Philosophy University Seminar

(3-0-3)

A general introduction to philosophy, taught in a seminar format, with emphasis on perennial problems such as the existence of God, human freedom, and moral obligation. The course is also intended to sharpen the student's skills of critical thinking.

PHIL 13195. Honors Philosophy Seminar

(3-0-3)

A general introduction to philosophy, taught in a seminar format for students in the science and arts and letters honors program, with emphasis on perennial problems such as the existence of God, human freedom, and moral obligation. The course is also intended to sharpen the student's skills of critical thinking.

PHIL 20101. Introduction to Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A general introduction to philosophy, with emphasis on perennial problems such as the existence of God, human freedom, and moral obligation. The course is also intended to sharpen the student's skills of critical thinking.

PHIL 20201. Philosophy of Human Nature

(3-0-3) Reimers

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

An examination of some competing views of human nature based on classical readings ranging from Plato to the present day.

PHIL 20202. Existentialist Themes

(3-0-3) Ameriks

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

This course will provide an introduction to existentialism by focusing on the writings of Dostoevski, Søren Kierkegaard, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Jean-Paul Sartre. Topics covered will include the nature of human freedom and creativity, the relation of religion and morality, and the meaning of existence. Classes will focus on a close analysis of the text, with lectures to fill in the appropriate philosophical background. There will also be in-class screenings of three to four parts of Kieslowski, Dekalog series.

PHIL 20203. Death and Dying

(3-0-3) Warfield

Prerequisite: PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101 OR PHIL 10100

Corequisite: PHIL 22203

This course examines metaphysical and ethical issues associated with bodily death. Metaphysical issues taken up in this course include the following: What is death? Is death a bad thing? Is there any hope for survival of death? Ethical issues to be discussed include suicide, euthanasia, and abortion.

PHIL 20204. Women: Alternative Philosophical Perspectives

(3-0-3)

An examination of some of the most pressing problems currently confronting women, the more important theories, from the ultraconservative to the radical feminist, that have been proposed to explain these problems and the concrete proposals for change in society suggested by such theories.

PHIL 20205. Theories of Sexual Difference

(3-0-3) Kourany

An examination of the following questions: What kinds of differences separate men and women? Are these differences natural, or are they socially produced? And are these differences beneficial to us, or are they limiting? What does equality mean for people characterized by such differences?

PHIL 20207. Self and World

(3-0-3) Keller

A general introduction to the fundamental questions about the nature of the world and our place in it, the area of philosophy called metaphysics.

PHIL 20208. Minds, Brains, and Persons

(3-0-3)

This course will treat some central issues in the philosophy of mind, such as freedom of the will, personal identity, and the relationship between mind and body.

PHIL 20209. Knowledge and Mind

(3-0-3)

This lecture course concerns a range of philosophical problems about the nature of our knowledge of the world and our place in the world. Topics include skepticism about human knowledge, the problem of induction, epistemic foundationalism, types of knowledge (of facts, of what we should do, of ourselves), and the relationship between the knower and the known.

PHIL 20213. Images of Humanity in Modern Philosophy

(3-0-3)

An examination of some philosophers from the 17th and 18th centuries and the implications of their views for ways in which we can conceive of ourselves as relating to the world around us, and as relating to God.

PHIL 20214. Ancient Wisdom and Modern Love

(3-0-3) O'Connor

An examination of contemporary issues of love and friendship from the perspective of ancient philosophy. Course materials range from Plato and Aristotle to Shakespeare and contemporary film.

PHIL 20215. Ways of Peacemaking: Gandhi/King

(3-0-3)

An intensive study of the philosophy and spirituality of two of the greatest activists and peace educators of our century, M. Gandhi and M. Luther King. We will be especially concerned with the way each of these human beings came to construct new, yet quite ancient, images or controlling myths that they hoped would lead us to think and act in revolutionary ways.

PHIL 20217. Education of the Spirit

(3-0-3)

An introduction to issues in philosophy of education such as religion and education, education and politics (including global politics), the value of social and empirical sciences for the study of education, the problem of indoctrination, etc.

PHIL 20218. Chinese Ways of Thought

(3-0-3) Jensen

This is a special topics class on religion, philosophy, and the intellectual history of China that introduces the student to the world view and life experience of Chinese as they have been drawn from local traditions, as well as worship and sacrifice to heroes, and the cult of the dead. Through a close reading of primary texts in translation, it also surveys China's grand philosophical legacy of Daoism, Buddhism,

"Confucianism," and "Neo-Confucianism" and the later religious accommodation of Christianity and Islam.

PHIL 20229. Paradoxes

(3-0-3)

Bertrand Russell suggested that philosophical theories can be tested by their ability to deal with puzzles. This is the approach to philosophy taken in this course. The puzzles with which we will be concerned are paradoxes: sets of propositions, each member of which is intuitively true, which are nonetheless jointly inconsistent.

PHIL 20230. Philosophy of Culture

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

The plurality of cultures in the modern world, along with the conflicts that so often occur between them, makes the question of culture central to our experience. This course is devoted to an exploration of the meaning of culture within the Catholic intellectual tradition.

PHIL 20401. Ethics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

An examination of the relationship between thought and action in light of contemporary and traditional accounts of the nature of ethics.

PHIL 20402. Moral Problems

(3-0-3) Rabbitt; Wicks

An introduction to the field of moral philosophy, with major emphasis on contemporary moral issues.

PHIL 20404. Ethics and Business

(3-0-3)

This course aims at helping the student recognize the moral aspects of business decisions on the personal level and of business institutions on the social level.

PHIL 20406. Basic Concepts in Political Philosophy

(3-0-3)

An introduction to important thinkers and problems of political philosophy. Basic concepts to be considered are equality, liberty, and authority.

PHIL 20407. Classics of Political and Constitutional Theory

(3-0-3) Flint

Prerequisite: PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101 OR PHIL 10100

An examination of a number of the fundamental texts in political and constitutional theory, with an emphasis on works of special importance to the British and American political systems.

PHIL 20408. Philosophy of Law

(3-0-3)

An examination of the relationship between fair procedures and just outcomes in the judicial process, a study of the conditions under which punishment is morally defensible, an investigation of the extent to which the state may regulate the private affairs of its citizens, and a consideration of the role that moral theory has to play in the process of constitutional interpretation.

PHIL 20411. Aesthetics and the Philosophy of Art

(3-0-3) Mulherin

An introductory course in the application of philosophical methods to questions of aesthetics and art. The first part of the course will concern the history of aesthetics, concentrating on the views of Plato, Aristotle, Horace, Aquinas, Kant, and Hegel. The second part of the course will consider contemporary approaches to problems such as the nature of aesthetic properties and categories, what distinguishes art from other things, and the role of critical interpretation in the experience of art.

PHIL 20412. Philosophy and the Arts

(3-0-3)

A consideration of the nature of art and the aesthetic using both philosophical texts and works of art drawn from a wide variety of media (painting, literature, film, architecture, etc.).

PHIL 20413. Ethics and Imagination

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

The aim of this course is to underscore the importance for moral reasoning of the moral imagination through a vivid juxtaposition of classic texts in moral and political philosophy with works of art, principally narrative art, but not excluding music, painting, architecture, sculpture, and dance.

PHIL 20415. Morality and Modernity

(3-0-3) Solomon

Corequisite: PHIL 22415

An examination of the many of the deepest contemporary moral disputes that rest on philosophical disagreements about the nature of modernity. These disputes focus particularly on the modern commitments to individualism and the idea of progress.

PHIL 20418. Living the Virtues

(3-0-3) McNerny

What would make me happy? What is the point of my existence? No human being can avoid asking himself these questions, and for many philosophers, especially in the pre-modern age, these questions admit of a clear answer: happiness and meaning come from living the virtues. This course will be devoted to examining this answer; that is, to inquiring into the nature of virtue in general, and to the distinction and connection between the various virtues in particular. Guidance will be principally taken from works of Plato, Aristotle, and St. Thomas Aquinas, though some modern and contemporary conceptions of the virtues will be discussed by way of counterpoint. As part of a final course project, each student will be required to employ a work of literature in a discussion of the virtues.

PHIL 20419. The Natural Law: An Introduction

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the claim that the standard of right action in ethics and politics is to be found, in some sense, in nature, and is a “natural law.” Our exploration of the claim will take us through history, from the first developments of natural law theory in ancient Greece and Rome, to the medieval understanding of natural law epitomized in the work of St. Thomas Aquinas, and finally to some modern conceptions of natural law as found in the work of Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau.

PHIL 20420. Agency, Responsibility, and Determinism

(3-0-3) Rhoda

This course will carefully explore some main philosophical problems involving human agency and moral responsibility. The course has four parts. First, we will assess main arguments for and against the compatibility of human freedom and causal determinism (roughly, the view that physical laws and present physical facts jointly necessitate all future facts). Second, we will critically examine numerous substantive, competing analyses of human freedom. Third, we’ll consider the question of what’s required for moral responsibility. Fourth and finally, we will explore the question whether human freedom is compatible with divine foreknowledge.

PHIL 20421. Political Theory

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: PHIL 22421

This course is an introduction to political theory as a tradition of discourse and as a way of thinking about politics. The course surveys selected works of political theory and explores some of the recurring themes and questions that political theory addresses. This introductory course fulfills the political theory breadth requirement for the political science major. For additional information about this course, please visit the following website: nd.edu/~governme/undergrad/Summer05CourseDescriptions.htm.

PHIL 20422. Just War Theory

(3-0-3)

An examination of contemporary accounts of Just War Theory. Some of the questions considered will include: What is terrorism? Are pre-emptive wars just? How should prisoners of war be treated? And what are the duties of an occupying nation?

PHIL 20423. Self and Society

(3-0-3)

A survey of leading ideas in political and social philosophy primarily from the 18th–20th centuries. Problems considered will be the relation of individual to society, the relation of society to state, liberalism, the relation of economics to politics, versions of socialism, etc.

PHIL 20424. Friendship and the Good Life

(3-0-3) Watkins

An examination of the history of the concept of friendship as it figures in philosophical discussions about the best kind of life.

PHIL 20425. Contemporary Political Philosophy

(3-0-3) Weithman

Prerequisite: ALHN 13950

This course will survey the books and papers that have set the agenda for political philosophy in recent decades. Topics covered will include, but not be limited to, the foundation of rights, economic justice, and international justice. The course is intended for first year honors students, and will allow them to satisfy the second philosophy requirement.

PHIL 20426. Greek Ethics

(3-0-3) Jech

An examination of Greek virtue theory, Greek political theory, and Greek action theory. Authors to be covered include Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, Epicurus, and Cicero.

PHIL 20427. The Ethics of Eating

(3-0-3) Garcia

Numerous difficult but important ethical questions concern the production, distribution, marketing, and consumption of food. In this course, we will explore these questions in a philosophically rigorous way. Some of these questions concern one’s relationship to oneself: Does one have a duty to oneself to eat in a healthy manner? Is it morally wrong to care too much—or too little—for the pleasures of food? More generally, what role does eating play in the (morally) good life?

PHIL 20602. Medical Ethics

(3-0-3) Solomon

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

Corequisite: PHIL 22602

An exploration from the point of view of ethical theory of a number of ethical problems in contemporary biomedicine. Topics discussed will include euthanasia, abortion, the allocation of scarce medical resources, truth-telling in the doctor-patient relationship, the right to medical care and informed consent, and human experimentation.

PHIL 20603. Environmental Ethics

(3-0-3)

The course will be an attempt to come to grips critically with the moral significance of contemporary concern for ecology and the environment.

PHIL 20604. Modern Physics and Moral Responsibility

(3-0-3) Howard

An examination of such questions as: What are the moral responsibilities of the scientist? Should the scientist be held accountable for what might be done with the results of his or her scientific research? Does the scientist have any special role to play, as a citizen, in public debate about science policy? Should the scientist sometimes simply refuse to engage in some kinds of research because of moral concern about the consequences of research of that area? No special background in physics will be assumed.

PHIL 20606. Science, Technology, and Society

(3-0-3) Peterson

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

Corequisite: STV 22556

This course focuses on the many ways in which science and technology interact with society and explores the character of the value-laden controversies that such interaction frequently produces.

PHIL 20608. Philosophy of Technology

(3-0-3)

Topics covered will be early philosophy of technology, recent philosophy of technology, technology and ethics, technology and policy, technology and human nature, and technology and science. Readings will be principally derived from David M. Kaplan (2004) Readings in the Philosophy Of Technology and Francis Fukuyama (2002) Our Posthuman Future.

PHIL 20609. Environmental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

A philosophically integrated examination of current environmental issues, drawing on familiar literature from ecology (Leopold), economics (Boulding), and ethics (Singer), as well as recent fiction (Tolkien, Herbert).

PHIL 20612. Philosophy and Cosmology: A Revolution

(3-0-3) Bland

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

In the 17th century, there was a revolution in our view of the cosmos and of our own place in it. Most vivid, perhaps, was the change from believing that the Earth is at the center of everything to believing that the Earth is just one planet among many orbiting the sun. This course will consider how and why these changes took place.

PHIL 20613. Science and Religion

(3-0-3)

An examination of the interrelation and tension between contemporary science and traditional religious belief.

PHIL 20614. Introduction to Philosophy of Biology

(3-0-3)

An examination of key concepts and controversies in contemporary biology. The meaning of gene, organism, and environment and their interrelationships in the context of development, evolutionary theory, and ecology are closely considered.

PHIL 20615. Practicing Medical Ethics

(1-0-1)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

This is a one-day, 1-credit course. The purpose of this course is to give students who may have a vocation in health care the opportunity to engage in conversation with physicians, philosophers, and theologians familiar with medical ethics. Participants will be looking at real case studies and real situations they might encounter in practicing medicine. Does not satisfy University requirement.

PHIL 20617. Philosophy of Science

(3-0-3)

A detailed consideration of the central methodological and epistemological questions bearing on science.

PHIL 20618. Biomedical Ethics, Scientific Evidence, and Public Health Risk

(3-0-3)

Designed for pre-med, science, and engineering students, the course will survey ethical issues associated with current public health problems, such as pollution-induced cancers; universal health care; occupational injury and death; and inadequate medical attention to prevention, nutrition, and environmental health.

PHIL 20620. Philosophy and Science Fiction

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

Corequisite: PHIL 22620

The goal of this course is to introduce students to some central philosophical problems via reflection on classic and contemporary works of science fiction in conjunction with classic and contemporary texts in philosophy.

PHIL 20623. Scientific Images of Humanity

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

Attempts to “biologize” everything from religion and morality to love and friendship appear continuously in the popular and scientific media. Genes for traits as various as homosexuality and chocolate consumption are proposed. How should we revise our understanding of human nature in light of these claims? This course examines the tensions between our images of ourselves as human beings and the portraits that the sciences—especially biology—provide.

PHIL 20624. Science and Religion in Historical Perspective

(3-0-3) Pitts

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

The relationship between science and religion (especially Christianity) has attracted much attention recently. Historians have shown that this relationship has not been primarily a matter of conflict. It has been claimed that the relationship between science and religion can be characterized by conflict, independence, dialog, and/or integration, for example. This course aims to survey some important events and themes in the relationship between science and Christianity.

PHIL 20625. The Ethics of Technology

(3-0-3) Reed

An examination of the role of technology in our lives and whether and in what ways technological innovations make us better or worse.

PHIL 20626. Ecology, Ethics, and Economics

(3-0-3) Sayre

Prerequisite: PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101 OR PHIL 10100

Corequisite: PHIL 22626

An examination, through literature and reasoned argument, of (a) social values behind the economic excesses that have led to our ecological crisis and (b) alternative values by which the crisis might be alleviated.

PHIL 20801. Philosophy of Religion

(3-0-3) Newlands

Prerequisite: PHIL 10100 OR PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101

This course introduces some of the key themes in the philosophy of religion (the nature and existence of God, the rationality of theistic faith, the nature of religious language, miracles, immortality, and religious pluralism) by means of a close study of classic texts in the discipline.

PHIL 20802. Philosophical Reflections on Christian Belief

(3-0-3)

An examination of some of the most philosophically fascinating features of the Christian faith, including the Christian conception of God, the doctrine of the incarnation, and the cogency of a Christian world-view.

PHIL 20803. Faith and Reason

(3-0-3)

This course will deal with the relation between faith and reason. Some questions to be discussed are: Can the doctrines of the faith conflict with the deliverances of reason found in philosophy and science? Is it possible to defend the doctrines of the faith against the objections of nonbelievers in a non-question-begging way? How might one go about constructing an apologetics for the Christian faith? Authors to be read include St. Thomas Aquinas, G.K. Chesterton, and C.S. Lewis.

PHIL 20804. God and Persons

(3-0-3) O'Callaghan

Members of Western culture living in the present age are, whether they like it or not, inheritors of a long history of reflection upon the stellar achievements of human reason and the demands of revealed religion. The purpose of this course is to engage that history philosophically. A number of traditions of reflection will be considered: contemporary, modern, ancient, and medieval.

PHIL 20806. Philosophy of Judaism

(3-0-3) Neiman

Prerequisite: PHIL 10101 OR PHIL 13185 OR PHIL 13195 OR PHIL 20101 OR PHIL 10100

An attempt to come to a reasonable understanding of the philosophy of Judaism as presented in Abraham Joshua Heschel's masterwork, God in Search of Man: A Philosophy of Judaism.

PHIL 20808. Ethical and Religious Obligations

(3-0-3)

What is the source of our various obligations and how do they arise? How does a person determine what his or her obligations are? What is the relationship between religious duty and ethical and social duty? Can a person be obligated to hold certain beliefs or to cultivate particular character traits? In this lecture course, we will explore these questions about the nature of obligation through the writings of Plato, Cicero, Maimonides, and Kant. We will study how these thinkers answered these questions as well as how their answers influenced the specific obligations they understood us as having.

PHIL 20810. Philosophical Theology

(3-0-3) O'Callaghan

An examination, from a philosophical perspective, of issues concerning religious faith and the exercise of reason, the existence and nature of a god, language about a god, divine and natural causality, miracles, the problem of evil, human free will and divine determinism, divine eternity and creaturely temporality, life after death, science, and religion.

PHIL 26999. Special Topic: Philosophical Issues

(V-0-V)

In exceptional circumstances with written permission of instructor and approval of philosophy director of undergraduate studies, students are permitted to take a tutorial with a faculty member on a particular issue in philosophy. Readings will be assigned and writing assignments required.

PHIL 30301. Ancient and Medieval Philosophy

(3-0-3) Dumont

This course will concentrate on major figures and persistent themes. A balance will be sought between scope and depth, the latter ensured by a close reading of selected texts.

PHIL 30302. History of Modern Philosophy

(3-0-3) Jauernig

An examination of the perennial tension between reason and experience as exemplified in classical modern rationalism and empiricism; its subsequent synthesis in Kant.

PHIL 30303. Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Philosophy

(3-0-3) Ameriks

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

A survey of developments in philosophy since Kant. Readings in both the Continental and Anglo-American traditions.

PHIL 30313. Formal Logic

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the fundamentals and techniques of logic for majors.

PHIL 30315. A Chinese Mosaic: Philosophy, Politics, and Religion

(3-0-3)

This is a special topics class that provides an introduction to the diverse lifeways constituting the puzzle of the Chinese people. The course will chart this terrain of current Chinese imagination as it has been shaped from the contending, and often contentious, influences of religion, philosophy, and politics, introducing students to the heralded works of the Chinese intellectual tradition while requiring critical engagement with the philosophic and religious traditions animating this culture. Thus, as they learn about China, students also will reflect on how Chinese and Westerners have interpreted it.

PHIL 30326. God, Philosophy, and Universities

(3-0-3) MacIntyre

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

Enquiry and teaching in Catholic universities have aimed at understanding how the universe physical, animal, and human is ordered to God. One task of philosophy in the Catholic tradition has been to show how the various secular disciplines both contribute to such understanding and remain incomplete without theology. This course examines the question of how this task is to be carried out.

PHIL 30354. Gender and Science

(3-0-3) Kourany

An exploration of the ways in which science is gendered, starting with the ways in which women have been excluded from science, and moving through such issues as the invisibility and shabby treatment of women with the products of scientific research, the contributions of women to science and whether these are different in kind from the contributions of men, and the differential effects of science on men's and women's lives.

PHIL 30389. Philosophical Issues in Physics

(3-0-3) Bland

This course is intended for non-science students who desire to begin an examination of the origins of the modern laws of physics and for science students who wish to know the actual route to the discovery and the broader implications of the formal theories with which they are already familiar. The historical background to and philosophical questions associated with major laws of physics will be discussed, in large measure by examining directly relevant excerpts from the writings of some of the creators of seminal concepts and theories in physics. The latter part of the course will concentrate on historical and philosophical issues related to relativity and especially to quantum theory and its interpretation. This course is accepted as a science elective in the College of Science.

PHIL 30390. Environmental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A philosophically integrated examination of current environmental issues drawing on familiar literature from ecology, economics, and ethics, as well as recent fiction.

PHIL 40314. Morality and Modernity

(3-0-3) Solomon

Corequisite: PHIL 42314

An examination of many of the deepest contemporary moral disputes that rest on philosophical disagreements about the nature of modernity. These disputes focus particularly on the modern commitments to individualism and the idea of progress.

PHIL 43101. Plato

(3-0-3) Sayre

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

A detailed and systematic reading, in translation, of the fragments of the pre-Socratics and of the following Platonic dialogues: Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, Meno, Protagoras, Phaedo, Republic, Phaedrus, Symposium, and Theaetetus.

PHIL 43102. Aristotle

(3-0-3)

An examination and evaluation of Aristotle's philosophy, with special emphasis on the logical, physical, and metaphysical writings.

PHIL 43103. Plato's Phaedrus

(3-0-3)

An advanced seminar focused on reading Plato's Phaedrus in Greek. Undergraduates must have completed CLGR 20004. Graduate students must have completed at least three semesters of Greek. Class meetings will be about equally divided between translations and interpretations.

PHIL 43104. Socrates and Athens

(3-0-3)

A study of the moral upheaval in Athens during the Peloponnesian War, using Thucydides, Aristophanes, Euripides, and Sophocles as primary sources. Then an examination of Socrates as responding to that crisis, using Alcibiades I, Gorgias, and other dialogues.

PHIL 43105. Plato Before the Republic

(3-0-3)

After a general introduction to the main problems and positions of Plato scholarship today, we will read some of his dialogues written before his most important work, The Republic, dealing with as various topics as virtues, the nature of art, the relation of ethics and religion, the politics of Athens, and the essence of knowledge.

PHIL 43107. Plato on Death and Love

(3-0-3)

A close reading of two Platonic dialogues, the Phaedo and the Symposium.

PHIL 43108. Aristotle's Ethics and Politics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 OR PHIL 30302 OR PHIL 30313

An examination of Aristotle's ethical and political views through a close reading of his Nicomachean Ethics and Politics.

PHIL 43134. History of Medieval Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A semester-long course focusing on the history of medieval philosophy. It provides a more in-depth consideration of this period than is allowed in PHIL 30301, Ancient and Medieval Philosophy, and may be considered a follow-up to that course.

PHIL 43135. Anselm

(3-0-3) Flint

An examination of the major philosophical and theological writings of St. Anselm. His Monologion, Proslogion, and Cur Deus Homo will be of central concern, but several lesser known texts will also be read. Topics discussed in these writings include arguments for the existence of God, the divine nature, the Trinity, the Incarnation, freedom (and its compatibility with divine foreknowledge), and truth.

PHIL 43136. Augustine and Aquinas on Mind

(3-0-3)

Aquinas's early discussion of mind displays a significant Augustinian structure that disappears by the time of his last works, a shift that can be described as a more robust Aristotelianism. This course examines the philosophical significance of that shift in Aquinas's thought, and will relate it to questions about the nature of contemporary philosophy of the mind.

PHIL 43137. Augustine and Bonaventure

(3-0-3)

A course devoted to what used to be called philosophical psychology. The goal will be to understand some of the ways the Augustinian tradition in philosophy attempts to make sense of the soul, in terms of mind, spirit, will but especially in terms of the heart. To be read are Augustine's Confessions and De Trinitate, and Bonaventure's The Mind's Road To God.

PHIL 43138. Augustine and William James

(3-0-3)

A course devoted, for the most part, to a careful reading of significant parts of Augustine's Confessions and James's The Variety of Religious Experience. The goal is to come to an understanding of what these two great philosophers and psychologists can teach us about the spiritual quest.

PHIL 43141. Aquinas: Moral Thought

(3-0-3)

A systematic discussion of the main features of the moral teaching of Thomas Aquinas. The Summa Theologiae, Prima Secundae, and Aquinas's commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics will be the principal sources.

PHIL 43143. Dante and Aquinas

(3-0-3)

A comparative study of two giants of medieval Catholicism. The course will be a chance to make a tour of the Summa Theologiae and the Divine Comedy, supplemented with looks at other works of these two giants of Western culture. The dependence of the Divine Comedy on the Summa is a cliché, but a close look at the theological and poetic visions of the whole of reality as seen through the eyes of faith is an essential component of cultural literacy.

PHIL 43144. Aquinas on Angels

(3-0-3)

A close study of what St. Thomas Aquinas has to say in Summa Theologiae about the nature, cognition, and action of purely spiritual substances.

PHIL 43145. Augustine and Wittgenstein

(3-0-3)

A careful reading of two of the greatest of all philosophical autobiographies, Augustine's Confessions and Wittgenstein's Philosophical Investigations. The goals of the course are to better understand the works themselves and to understand the nature and values of this genre of philosophical writing.

PHIL 43146. Philosophy of Duns Scotus

(3-0-3)

Duns Scotus (1266–1308) was, along with Thomas Aquinas and William of Ockham, one of the three major, scholastic thinkers. This course will examine Scotus's major contributions in metaphysics, pistemology, and ethics, including the univocity of the transcendental concepts, the modal proof for the existence of God, the formal distinction, intuitive cognition, the elimination of the illumination theory of knowledge, and his strong voluntarism, particularly as the origin of the so-called synchronic theory of contingency. Attention will be given to how Scotus develops his views in reaction to his contemporaries, especially Henry of Ghent.

PHIL 43147. Maimonides and the Crisis of Faith

(3-0-3) Neiman

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

A careful reading of Maimonides's philosophical classic A Guide for the Perplexed. Close attention will be paid to its influence on Aquinas.

PHIL 43148. Aquinas on Virtue and Law

(3-0-3)

A close study of virtue and law, and of their relation to one another, in the moral theory of St. Thomas Aquinas, as laid out in the First Part of the Second Part of the Summa Theologiae.

PHIL 43149. Aquinas's Philosophical Theology

(3-0-3)

A close examination of the philosophical arguments within the first 13 questions of Aquinas's Summa Theologiae, including arguments about the distinction between philosophy and sacred theology, the existence of a god, divine simplicity, divine perfection, divine goodness, divine infinity, divine immutability, divine eternity, divine unity, how God is known by us, and how God is spoken about by us.

PHIL 43150. Aquinas on Creation

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the central metaphysical questions involved in the claim that God creates the entities in the world ex nihilo, along with an examination of hermeneutical questions involved in the interpretation of Genesis 1. The main texts for the course will be the treatment of creation and of the work of the six days found in St. Thomas's Summa Theologiae, supplemented by the treatment of creation in Francisco Suarez's Disputationes Metaphysicae.

PHIL 43151. Aquinas on Human Nature

(3-0-3)

A close study of St. Thomas Aquinas's philosophical anthropology, based on questions 75–101 of the First Part of the Summa Theologiae. Some topics include the human soul and its powers, the sentient appetite, higher human cognition and willing, and the production of the first human beings in the state of innocence.

PHIL 43152. The Philosophy of Thomas Aquinas

(3-0-3)

The course surveys the principal themes of Aquinas's philosophy, focusing on close readings of relevant texts.

PHIL 43167. Cartesian Doubt and Certainty

(3-0-3)

This lecture and discussion course is about Rene Descartes's theory of knowledge. The course is centered on the first three of Descartes's six Meditations on First Philosophy. In these "meditations," Descartes seems to believe that taking seriously a kind of radical doubt that most thinkers typically ignore can deepen the certitude of our knowledge. We will try to understand what kind of doubt Descartes entertains, what the value is of the type of certainty he seeks, and how the first is supposed to lead to the second. To sharpen our appreciation of Descartes's project, we will compare it to a couple of contemporary reflections on the relationship between doubt and certainty.

PHIL 43168. Hume's Ethics and Philosophy of Mind

(3-0-3)

An exploration of how modern philosophers in the British empiricist tradition developed new theories of moral psychology and human action. Chief among them was the Scottish philosopher David Hume.

PHIL 43169. Kant

(3-0-3) Rush

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

An overview and critical assessment of Kant's transcendental idealism as it is presented in his main work, the Critique of Pure Reason.

PHIL 43170. Hegel

(3-0-3)

An intensive reading of Hegel's Phenomenology of the Spirit. Issues discussed will be Hegel's conception of self and society; his treatment of culture, art, and religion; the nature of dialectic; his views on systematic holism and critique; etc.

PHIL 43171. Kierkegaard

(3-0-3)

This course will be devoted to a central theme in Kierkegaard's ethics, i.e., his discussion of the religious commandment to love God and thy neighbor as thyself. We will proceed by way of a slow and careful reading of his Works of Love.

PHIL 43172. Kierkegaard and William James

(3-0-3)

An examination of the views of Kierkegaard and James on the traditional philosophical ideas of meaning and truth, knowledge, and explanation.

PHIL 43173. Nietzsche

(3-0-3)

A close consideration of Nietzsche's thought beginning with his early work under the influence of Schopenhauer, through his "naturalistic" or "positivistic" works, and on to his mature work of the 1880s.

PHIL 43176. Wittgenstein

(3-0-3)

A careful reading and detailed discussion of several key works of Wittgenstein such as Tractatus-Logico-Philosophicus and Philosophical Investigations.

PHIL 43177. Kierkegaard and Newman

(3-0-3)

An examination of the thought of two 19th-century figures of fundamental importance: Soren Kierkegaard (1813–55) and John Henry Newman (1801–90).

PHIL 43178. Individuation and Identity in Early Modern Philosophy

(3-0-3)

This course focuses primarily on ontological and epistemological problems associated with the individuation and identity of the material bodies and souls that are the basic entities of early modern mechanical philosophy. Themes addressed include transubstantiation, alchemical transformation, cohesion, the laws of nature, and the possibility of vacuum. Readings include extracts from Descartes, Boyle, Leibniz, Locke, Hobbes, Berkeley, Newton, and Hume.

PHIL 43179. Hegel and Kierkegaard

(3-0-3)

This course is an investigation of central themes in Hegel's thought and Kierkegaard's reaction to them. Concentration is on Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit and the opening sections of his Logic and on Kierkegaard's Philosophical Fragments and portions of his Concluding Unscientific Postscript.

PHIL 43180. Hume

(3-0-3)

A careful reading of the Treatise of Human Nature.

PHIL 43181. Goethe to Nietzsche to Kafka

(3-0-3)

One of the peculiarities of German culture is the strong connection between philosophy and literature; another, the heroic attempt to develop a religion no longer based on authority, but on reason. We will discuss the main steps in this German quest for God, alternating philosophical and literary texts by authors such as Lessing, Goethe, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, and Kafka. Texts and discussions in English.

PHIL 43182. Socrates, Nietzsche, and Kierkegaard

(3-0-3)

Socrates is often understood to have invented philosophy as an art of examination and way of life. In this course we will examine the nature of the Socratic art, along with a few critical appropriations of it by Nietzsche and Kierkegaard among others. The key question of the course is: Is philosophy as Socrates understood it possible today?

PHIL 43183. The Rationalists

(3-0-3)

This seminar will critically examine the leading rationalists of the 17th century, most especially Descartes, Malebranche, Spinoza, and Leibniz. Time and interest permitting, it may also consider the applications of the rationalist commitments in contemporary philosophy and examine some criticisms of rationalism (both historical and contemporary).

PHIL 43201. Continental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

An examination of leading issues in contemporary movements in continental philosophy (e.g. existentialism, hermeneutics, poststructuralism) in authors such as Habermas, Gadamer, Sartre, Derrida, and Foucault.

PHIL 43202. Phenomenology

(3-0-3)

An introduction to the arguments and themes of phenomenology, a school of philosophy based on the description of lived experience that had a broad impact on 20th-century philosophy.

PHIL 43203. Heidegger's Being and Time

(3-0-3)

A close reading of Heidegger's seminal work Being and Time.

PHIL 43205. Existentialism: Philosophy and Literature

(3-0-3)

We will read representative literary and philosophical texts by Sartre (excerpts from Being and Nothingness, Nausea, a few plays), Beauvoir (The Philosophy of Ambiguity, excerpts from The Second Sex, A Very Easy Death), a novel and/or excerpts from A Memoir), and Camus (Myth of Sisyphus, excerpts from The Rebel, The Stranger, The Plague and/or The Fall).

PHIL 43206. Hermeneutics, Deconstruction, and Medieval Thought

(3-0-3)

The aims of this course are both methodological and historical. The methodological part will consist of an introduction to hermeneutics (in a broad sense) as theorized and/or practiced in certain areas of modern continental philosophy. After a brief look at the crucial innovations of Husserl, we shall study carefully chosen extracts (in English translation) of Heidegger: Being and Time and What is Called Thinking, Gadamer: Truth and Method, and Derrida: Of Grammatology, Writing and Difference, Dissemination in order to illuminate the different (even opposing) ways in which the idea of hermeneutics can develop. This general discussion will be combined with specific consideration of the themes of allegory and negativity. The historical part of the course will concentrate on late ancient, patristic, and early medieval readings (Origen: On First Principles, Augustine: On Christian Teaching, Literal Interpretation of Genesis, Proclus: Commentary on Plato's Timaeus). Here, we shall attempt to advance our comprehension of ancient literature by (1) looking for parallels with modern hermeneutic techniques, and (2) applying the modern techniques in test cases. The course is intended to be relatively open-ended; i.e., students will be expected to think about the way in which these discussions are internally coherent and also relate to their own areas of interest (which may be elsewhere in philosophy, theology, or literature (Latin or vernacular)). Requirement: one final essay of ca. 20 pages.

PHIL 43208. Existentialism and Beyond

(3-0-3)

Beginning with selections from Sartre, the goal of this course is to see just what his existentialism amounted to and what role it played in his thought as a whole. We will then examine the significance of Sartre for several other French philosophers (some possibilities are Levinas, Foucault, and Derrida).

PHIL 43301. Ethical Theory

(3-0-3) Warfield

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

A systematic study of philosophical foundations of morality, drawing from major historical developments. Basic concepts of classical ethics will be developed—human nature, happiness or fulfillment, freedom, virtue—and their place in relation to moral judgment will be examined. Special attention to subjectivism vs. objectivism on the question of ethical norms and principles.

PHIL 43302. Twentieth-Century Ethics

(3-0-3)

A survey of a number of central positions and issues in contemporary ethical theory. The course will begin with an examination of the main meta-ethical positions developed from 1903 to 1970 intuitionism, emotivism, prescriptivism, and the various forms of ethical naturalism. This will provide a background for a discussion of issues arising from the more recent revival of classical normative theory. This is the core course for ethics. (Each academic year)

PHIL 43306. Advanced Moral Problems

(3-0-3)

An in-depth discussion of three very important moral problems of our time: affirmative action, animal rights, and sexual harassment.

PHIL 43308. Environmental Justice

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

This course will survey environmental impact assessment (EIA), ecological risk assessment (ERA), and human-health risk assessment (HHRA); ethical and methodological issues related to these techniques; then applying these techniques to contemporary assessments for which state and federal governments are seeking comments by scientists and citizens.

PHIL 43310. Animal Minds and Animal Rights

(3-0-3)

An examination of competing views of the moral status of nonhuman animals. Particular attention is given to views of the relation between the mental lives of animals and their moral status.

PHIL 43312. Aesthetics

(3-0-3)

A consideration of some of the fundamental questions in aesthetics and philosophy of art; e.g., the nature of aesthetic representation, expression in art, the concept of beauty, what distinguishes art from "mere things," and the structure and function of imagination.

PHIL 43313. Philosophy and Literature Seminar

(4-0-4) Weinfield

This intensive 4-credit seminar is the introduction to the concentration in philosophy and literature and will pursue interdisciplinary approaches to literary, theoretical and philosophical texts.

PHIL 43314. Abortion, Euthanasia, and Capital Punishment

(3-0-3) Warfield

This course involves an examination of recent philosophical work on abortion, euthanasia, and capital punishment. Though the focus is on the philosophical debates, some attention is given to relevant legal and public policy discussions.

PHIL 43315. The Question

(3-0-3)

This course addresses the question of the meaning of life. Its aim is not to arrive at a definitive answer, but rather to examine a range of possible responses. The first half of the course will focus on discussions by prominent philosophers (Plato, Boethius, Bentham, Bergson, and others), the second on major literary writings (e.g., by Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, Wilde, J.R.R. Tolkien, and T.S. Eliot) that illustrate possible answers.

PHIL 43316. Science and Ethics

(3-0-3)

A course that considers how scientists' methodological, logical, and epistemic flaws (in the way they do science) leads to serious ethical problems that compromise rationality and objectivity, as well as threaten public health. Course work will focus on philosophy of science, epistemology, ethics, and science.

PHIL 43317. Thomistic Ethics

(3-0-3)

An examination of the commentary on Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, with attention paid to Thomas's way of dealing with issues that have vexed later Aristotelians. The morals of the Summa Theologiae, and the claim that Thomas had no ethics. The course will seek a balance between locating Thomas's work in his time and relating it to ours.

PHIL 43318. The Ethics of Gender

(3-0-3)

We observe gender differences between men and women, but these differences vary over time and place, depending on the customs and practices of different societies and depending on the choices individuals make. To the degree that gender differences are a product of social and individual choice, we can raise the question, as we will in this course, of what, if any, gender differences, we should have in society. This question is of particular ethical significance in light of our commitment to the equality of men and women.

PHIL 43319. Moral Skepticism and Intuitionism

(3-0-3)

A careful reading of Walter Sinnott-Armstrong's Moral Skepticism and Michael Huemer's Ethical Intuitionism.

PHIL 43320. History of Ethics

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on theories of moral psychology in ancient philosophy, modern philosophy, and contemporary philosophy. It analyzes the changing conceptions of human nature and human action that are the basis of Aristotle's ethics, Hume's ethics, and Kant's ethics. It then discusses what happened to these conceptions in 20th-century ethical theory.

PHIL 43321. The Ethics of Gender and Race

(3-0-3)

This course is concerned with two central ideas—equal opportunity and discrimination. It focuses on what constitutes equal opportunity with respect to gender and race and how best to achieve it, as well as what constitutes sexual and racial discrimination and how best to avoid it. It begins by considering arguments of those who hold that feminist causes discriminate against men and that affirmative action programs discriminates against whites, and then considers opposing arguments. The goal of the course is to help students make up their own minds about which views on these topics are most morally defensible.

PHIL 43401. Political Liberalism

(3-0-3)

A seminar on "the later Rawls" involving a close reading of Political Liberalism and the Laws of Peoples, together with some critical articles assessing this perspective on political philosophy.

PHIL 43403. Philosophy of Law

(3-0-3)

An overview of central topics in philosophy of law, followed by consideration of a range of theoretical issues in general criminal law.

PHIL 43404. Justice Seminar

(3-0-3) Roos

An examination of major theories of justice, both ancient and modern. Readings include representatives of liberal theorists of right, such as John Rawls, as well as perfectionist alternatives. The course also serves as the core seminar for the philosophy, politics, and economics concentration.

PHIL 43426. God, Philosophy, and Politics

(3-0-3) MacIntyre

This is the capstone seminar for the interdisciplinary minor in philosophy in the Catholic tradition. It is normally open only to undergraduates registered for that minor. The central concern is to understand the various ways in which Catholic philosophers have brought theology to bear on the study of politics and vice versa. Authors studied include Augustine, Aquinas, Robert Dahl, and Maritain.

PHIL 43427. Social and Political Philosophy

(3-0-3)

An investigation of the major concepts and historical movements in political philosophy. Themes treated are state of nature, relationship of society to state, conception of democracy, rights theory, economic justice and justice between groups, and alternatives to liberalism. Readings are drawn inter alia from Plato, Aristotle, Locke, Smith, Rousseau, Marx, Mill, Weber, Lenin, Berlin, Rawls, Nozick, MacIntyre, Taylor, and Habermas.

PHIL 43428. Contemporary Political Philosophy

(3-0-3) Weithman

The last four decades have been an extraordinarily exciting time in the development of political philosophy. Many of the central questions in the subject have received their most authoritative formulation and treatment since the 19th century. This course will survey developments in English-speaking philosophical world in that period. Topics to be covered include the foundations of constitutional and human rights, the grounds of economic justice in domestic and global settings, and the point and demands of equality. Other problems to be surveyed include the conditions of just war in the contemporary world (including preemptive war) and moral problems connected with torture. Authors to be covered include John Rawls, Robert Nozick, Michael Sandel, Ronald Dworkin, T.M. Scanlon, Amartya Sen, Martha Nussbaum, Elizabeth Anderson, Jeremy Waldron, and Samuel Scheffler. The course will be run as a seminar. This course will be of special interest to students in philosophy and political science. It has no prerequisites except a willingness to work hard and take part in class discussions. Requirements include frequent writing assignments, a class presentation, and a comprehensive final examination. A substantial writing project will be required of graduate students in lieu of a final. Other students may substitute a substantial paper for the final with the permission of the instructor.

PHIL 43501. Metaphysics

(3-0-3) van Inwagen

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

An examination of the nature of metaphysics and of those metaphysical issues that have proved central in Western philosophical tradition. Topics discussed will include mind-body problem, freedom of will, universals, substance, time, categories, and God.

PHIL 43503. Philosophy of Action

(3-0-3) Speaks

The course will be a study of the major philosophical topics relating to human action and the relations between them, including the nature of intentional action, weakness of will, freedom of the will, and practical rationality.

PHIL 43601. Epistemology

(3-0-3) Stubenberg

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

The aim of this class is to provide an understanding of the fundamental issues and positions in the contemporary theory of knowledge.

PHIL 43602. Philosophical Arguments

(3-0-3)

This course will reflect on the nature of arguments for philosophical claims in contemporary analytic philosophy. We will proceed by close readings of key articles in current debates on metaphysical, epistemological, and ethical topics.

PHIL 43603. Philosophy in a Different Voice: Feminist Perspectives on Knowledge

(3-0-3)

Traditional epistemology and philosophy of science analyze the prospects and conditions of knowledge in a very abstract, general way—as though our individual characteristics (gender, race, etc.) and the sociopolitical situation in which we find ourselves have no bearing on such knowledge. In contrast, this course will consider such issues as the epistemic resources and liabilities of particular social locations, the ideological role of epistemic norms, and the relation between social values and objectivity.

PHIL 43604. Philosophy Against Itself

(3-0-3)

In this lecture and discussion class, we will study philosophy as a discipline paying close attention to the origins of its several contemporary streams and its place within explanatory and introspective thought more broadly.

PHIL 43701. Philosophy of Science

(3-0-3) Pitts

A detailed consideration of the central methodological and epistemological questions bearing on science.

PHIL 43702. Philosophy of Biology

(3-0-3)

Central issues in the philosophy of science from the perspective of the life sciences with particular emphasis on topics in evolution theory and sociobiology and upon the topic of inter-theoretical integration in the life sciences (from organic chemistry to cognitive neuroscience). Topics to be covered include: teleology, reductionism and supervenience, the biological basis of cognition, explanation, scientific realism, theory change, and the critical appraisal of alternate research strategies.

PHIL 43703. Philosophy of Cognitive Science

(3-0-3)

A course in philosophy of mind utilizing recent work in the area of cognitive science.

PHIL 43704. Science and Social Values

(3-0-3)

A consideration of such questions as: Should science be value-free, or should it be shaped by the needs and ideals of the society that supports it? If the former, how can scientists shaped by society contribute to it, and what claim to the resources of the society can scientists legitimately make? If the latter, how can scientists still claim to be objective?

PHIL 43708. Biomedical Ethics, Scientific Evidence, and Public Health Risk

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

Designed for pre-med, science, and engineering students, the course will survey ethical issues associated with current public health problems, such as pollution-induced cancers; universal health care; occupational injury and death; and inadequate medical attention to prevention, nutrition, and environmental health.

PHIL 43711. The Life and Works of Darwin

(3-0-3) Ramsey

Through Darwin's work and biographic material about Darwin, we examine his ideas as well as the social context in which these Ideas were developed.

PHIL 43712. Darwin, Philosophy, and Religion

(3-0-3) Ramsey

Corequisite: THEO 40835

This course examines the life and work of Darwin in its historical context and investigates the continuing impact of Darwinism on how we see the natural world and our place in it.

PHIL 43802. Philosophy of Religion

(3-0-3) Rea

A critical examination of some classical philosophical theories of religion. The central focus of the course will be issues concerning justification and explanation in religion.

PHIL 43804. Faith and Reason

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: PHIL 30301 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30302 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY) OR PHIL 30313 (MAY BE TAKEN CONCURRENTLY)

An examination of some key theoretical issues concerning faith and reason. Among these issues are the nature of faith, the nature of intellectual inquiry, the role of affections in intellectual inquiry, the main competing accounts of intellectual inquiry, and of the philosophical life. Authors to be read include Aquinas, Descartes, Hume, Mill, Nietzsche, Chesterton, and Pope John Paul II.

PHIL 43806. Aquinas on God

(3-0-3)

A close reading of the first 43 questions of the first book of the Summa Theologiae. These questions, which deal both with the divine essence and with the three divine persons, provide a comprehensive survey of St. Thomas's Metaphysics.

PHIL 43807. Divine Attributes

(3-0-3)

A consideration of the attributes Christians have traditionally ascribed to God, such as omnipotence, omniscience, omnibenevolence, eternity, and simplicity. The course will examine both the reasons for attributing such properties to God and the ways in which philosophers have tried to explicate these concepts.

PHIL 43808. Philosophy and Theology of the Body

(3-0-3)

The first half of the course will focus on key concepts, such as solitude, gift, communion, shame, and nuptial significance, in relation to human sexual being and behavior. The second half will focus on the application of these theological concepts to ethics and vocation (marriage and celibacy), including John Paul's reflections of the encyclical Humanae Vitae.

PHIL 43809. Christian Theism and Problems in Philosophy

(3-0-3)

How, if at all, does Christian belief bear on the traditional concerns of philosophers? Is there such a thing as Christian philosophy? After considering the bearing of some common views of faith and reason on these questions, we turn to more specific questions in epistemology, ethics, and philosophical anthropology.

PHIL 43810. Religion and Science

(3-0-3)

An examination of the nature and limits of both scientific and religious knowledge, and a discussion of several cases in which science and religion seem to either challenge or support one another.

PHIL 43811. Chesterton

(3-0-3)

An exploration of the thought of Gilbert Keith Chesterton (1874–1936) perhaps the best Catholic apologist of his time. The course will feature Chesterton's two greatest apologetic works, Orthodoxy and The Everlasting Man.

PHIL 43812. Divine Providence

(3-0-3)

An examination of the view of providence offered by the proponents of middle knowledge, and the objections raised against this Molinist view by both Thomists and contemporary analytic philosophers.

PHIL 43813. Phenomenology and Theology

(3-0-3)

In recent years, phenomenologists have sought to develop new phenomenologies of Christianity. This seminar examines the attempts of three such thinkers: Michel Henry, Jean-Luc Marion, and Jean Louis Chretien. Can God properly be called "Life"? Of what use is the distinction between the icon and the idol? How far can the model of call and response go in either phenomenology or theology? These are the questions that will mainly interest us.

PHIL 43901. Philosophy of Mind

(3-0-3)

Dualist and reductionist emphases in recent analyses of mind. Topics covered will include identity of mind and body, intentionality, actions and their explanation, and problems about other minds.

PHIL 43902. Philosophy of Language

(3-0-3)

The aim of this course is to provide an overview of the field. Major topics include the relation between truth and meaning; truth-conditional semantics; the meaning of sentences, proper names, definite descriptions, general terms and indexicals; and the relations between expressing a belief, making a statement, and uttering a sentence.

PHIL 43904. The Origins of Analytic Philosophy

(3-0-3)

An examination of fundamental writings at the beginning of the 20th century that ushered in the linguistic and logical tradition of analytic philosophy.

PHIL 43905. Postmodern Analytic Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A study of several philosophers who combine an analytic commitment to clarity and argument with an interest in the history and critique of modern thought. Philosophers to be considered are Richard Rorty, Charles Taylor, Bernard Williams, and Martha Nussbaum.

PHIL 43906. Philosophy of Mathematics

(3-0-3) Bays

A survey of central issues in the philosophy of mathematics.

PHIL 43907. Intermediate Logic

(3-0-3) Blanchette

Prerequisite: PHIL 30313 OR MATH 10130

An introduction to the basic principles of formal logic. The course includes a study of inference, formal systems for propositional and predicate logic, and some of the properties of these systems. The course will concentrate on proving some of the major results of modern logic; e.g., the completeness of first-order logic, the undecidability of first-order logic, the Lowenheim-Skolem theorems, and Goedel's incompleteness theorems.

PHIL 43908. Topics in Philosophical Logic: Modal Meta-Theory

(3-0-3) Franks

Prerequisite: PHIL 30313 OR MATH 10130

This course will cover topics in the meta-theory of modal logic. We will start with some basic correspondence theory, and then move on to discuss completeness and the finite model property. Also covered is recent work on the relationship between modal logic and classical logic.

PHIL 43909. Perception

(3-0-3)

There are many theories of perception: naive (or direct) realism, the sense-datum theory (and representative theories in general), the causal theory of perception, adverbialism, the theory of appearing, intentionalism, and disjunctivism. We will try to get an initial grasp of these theories by viewing them as different answers to the problems posed by illusions and hallucinations. To achieve a better understanding of them we will address a number of questions to each theory: Does it provide an explicit analysis of perception? Does it tell us what the objects of perception are? Does it commit us to nonphysical objects of perception? Does it provide an account of the content of perception? Does it account for the phenomenology of perception? Does it explain how perception can serve to justify beliefs about the physical world? Is it compatible with the results of the scientific study of perception?

PHIL 43910. Personal Identity and Unity of Consciousness

(3-0-3)

What sort of a thing am I? What is it to be a person? Can one living human body count as two or more persons (split-brain cases, multiple personality disorder)? Through which sorts of changes can a person persist (how much physical and mental change is survivable)? We shall study some of the traditional answers to these questions, especially Descartes's ego-theory and Hume's bundle theory.

PHIL 43911. Logic Seminar

(3-0-3)

A seminar offered periodically on various topics in logic and philosophy of logic.

PHIL 43912. Between Mathematics and Philosophy

(3-0-3)

The aim of this course is to introduce the student to important interactions between mathematics and philosophy throughout history. After a brief look at examples from antiquity, the middle ages and the renaissance, we'll focus on the modern era, where we'll pay particular attention to Hobbes, Descartes, the Port Royal logicians, Galileo, Leibniz, Berkeley, Kant, and others. If time permits we'll also consider certain ideas of the early-19th-century mathematician-philosopher Bernard Bolzano.

PHIL 43913. Modal Logic

(3-0-3) Bays

This course covers topics in the meta-theory of modal logic. We will start with some basic correspondence theory, and then move on to discuss completeness and the finite model property. If we have time, we'll also cover some recent work on the relationship between modal logic and classical logic.

PHIL 46497. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

With consent of instructor and approval of department, advanced students are permitted to take a tutorial with a faculty member. Readings will be assigned in a particular area and writing assignments required.

PHIL 46498. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

With consent of instructor and approval of department, advanced students are permitted to take a tutorial with a faculty member. Readings will be assigned in a particular area and writing assignments required.

PHIL 48499. Senior Thesis

(3-0-3)

An opportunity for senior philosophy majors to work on a sustained piece of research in a one-to-one relationship with a faculty member.

Program of Liberal Studies*PLS 13184. History University Seminar

(3-0-3)

The goals of this seminar, which will be interdisciplinary in character, are simultaneously to provide students with an introduction to the intellectual history of the West from the Greeks to the present and to focus on one issue widely debated from antiquity to the present: the question of the existence, nature, and possible significance of extraterrestrial intelligent life. Authors whose writing will be read in the course include Aristotle, Lucretius, Aquinas, Cusa, Bruno, Kepler, Pascal, Newton, Huygens, Fontenelle, Pope, Voltaire, Franklin, Kant, Swedenborg, Paine, the Herschels, Wordsworth, Shelley, Comte, Emerson, Tennyson, Whewell, and Twain, as well as various 20th-century authors. Scientific, religious, philosophical, and literary aspects of the debate will all be discussed.

PLS 13186. Literature University Seminar

(3-0-3)

This seminar functions as an introduction to the Program of Liberal Studies. It is designed to develop habits of careful reading, discussion, and writing through the reading of classic texts. These seminars serve as an introduction to the “Great Books” style of education fostered by the Program of Liberal Studies.

PLS 20201. Literature I: The Lyric Poem

(3-0-3)

An introduction to poetry through intensive study of several lyric poets writing in English. Through close reading of selected poems, students will become familiar with central literary devices, including rhythm and meter, image, metaphor, symbol, paradox, and irony. Poems studied will range from the Renaissance to the 20th century, and may include Shakespeare’s sonnets and Keats’ odes, along with the works of other major poets such as Donne, Herbert, Marvell, Gray, Wordsworth, Dickinson, Hopkins, Yeats, Eliot, and Stevens. Fall.

PLS 20301. Philosophical Inquiry

(3-0-3)

This course introduces philosophical inquiry, both as distinct from and as it relates to other disciplines, through the exploration of primary texts representative of its different forms and questions, and within the context of an integrated liberal education. It also investigates the formal and informal principles of logical reasoning. Readings include selections from the pre-Socratics, Plato’s Meno, selections from Aristotle, beginning with his Organon and Physics, and such authors as Boethius, Descartes, and Aquinas. Fall.

PLS 20302. The Bible and Its Interpretation

(3-0-3)

A close study of selected books of the Bible. The course will consider the role of the Bible in the life of the church, the history of its interpretation, and the various approaches of modern scholarship. Spring.

PLS 20412. Fundamental Concepts of Natural Science

(3-0-3)

This course raises questions fundamental to our experience of the physical world. Questions such as “What is space?” and “What is time?” and broader issues about the nature of life are initially raised through a close reading of Plato’s Timaeus and Aristotle’s Physics, along with excerpts from other ancient texts. In attempting to answer these questions over the course of the semester, we will read a wide variety of sources: principally ancient and modern primary texts, with some secondary readings. These readings will include Euclid’s Elements, Descartes’ Principles of Philosophy, and Einstein’s Theories of Relativity. Spring.

PLS 23101. Great Books Seminar I

(4-0-4)

The first in a series of six Great Book seminars, and the first in the sophomore sequence, this course focuses on ancient Greek literature and is designed to introduce students to the great books seminar method, which emphasizes discussion, close reading, and the communication of complex ideas. The texts include Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Herodotus's Histories, Aeschylus's Oresteia, Sophocles's Theban Plays, Aristotle's Poetics, Euripides's Medea and The Bacchae, Thucydides's Peloponnesian War, Aristophanes's The Clouds, and three early dialogues by Plato: the Apology, Crito, and Symposium.

PLS 23102. Great Books Seminar II

(4-0-4)

The second seminar in the sophomore sequence, this course represents a continuation of Great Books Seminar I. The material studied extends from ancient Greece through the Roman period through early Christianity and into the Middle Ages. The texts include Plato's Republic and Phaedrus, Aristotle's On the Soul, Lucretius's The Way Things Are, Cicero's On The Republic, Vergil's Aeneid, Epictetus's Handbook, Augustine's Confessions and City of God, St. Anselm's Proslogion, and St. Bonaventure's Journey of the Mind to God.

PLS 30202. Literature II: Shakespeare and Milton

(3-0-3)

Building on the techniques of close reading developed in Literature I, this course will focus on the expressive power of literary genres, modes, and conventions and will take up the question of the unity and coherence of long works. The reading list will include several plays by Shakespeare and Milton's Paradise Lost. In some years, another major English narrative poem may be substituted for Paradise Lost (such as Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, Spenser's Faerie Queene, or Wordsworth's Prelude). Spring.

PLS 30204. Survey Course of Modern Drama

(3-0-3)

Taught by the former chair of the English Department at Princeton University, this course will offer a broad survey of several major and influential works of modern theatre from both a literary perspective and a performing one. Class discussion will be combined with readings in class and an assigned scene performance. Authors under consideration: Ibsen, Shaw, Chekhov, Oscar Wilde, Tennessee Williams, Arthur Miller, Tony Kushner, and Harold Pinter.

PLS 30301. Ethics

(3-0-3)

An examination of modes of moral reasoning and what constitutes the good life, based primarily on the study of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics and the moral philosophy of Kant. Readings may also include a selection from the utilitarian ethical tradition as well as from works in moral development and in moral theology, such as by Augustine, Aquinas, and Newman. Fall.

PLS 30302. Political and Constitutional Theory: Ancient and Modern

(3-0-3)

An approach to understanding the fundamental problems of political community and the nature of various solutions, especially that of democracy. Readings will include, but are not limited to, Aristotle's Politics, Locke's Second Treatise, and selections from The Federalist Papers and American founding documents. Spring.

PLS 30411. Scientific Inquiry: Theories and Practices

(3-0-3)

Using major historical texts as primary material, students will investigate crucial philosophical and methodological issues that arise in modern scientific inquiry, especially in the physical and life sciences. What can cause scientists to adopt (or resist) new theories? What relationships has science held to other intellectual disciplines, and how have those relationships changed over time? What fundamental assumptions about the natural world are adopted in much of modern science? What methods have scientists advocated for creating reliable knowledge? Students will grapple with these questions as we study and discuss central texts in the development of modern science, including the works of Ptolemy, Copernicus, Galileo, Descartes, and Newton.

PLS 30501. Music as a Liberal Art

(3-0-3)

The study of music has occupied a central position in the liberal arts curriculum since the foundation of the earliest universities in the Western world. Music is studied in this PLS tutorial in line with that tradition, taking into account the way the liberal arts have developed during our contemporary era. This course will focus on (a) the scientific and philosophical foundations of harmonic principles from the pre-Socratic philosophers to post-tonal theory; (b) the aesthetic, social, and political relevance of music during selected historical epochs; and (c) the syntactical and formal structures through which composers organize sound in such relevant genres as the Mass, the opera, and purely instrumental musical forms such as the symphony and sonata.

PLS 33101. Great Books Seminar III

(4-0-4)

Continuing from Great Books Seminar II, and the first in the junior seminar sequence, this course focuses on great works of the High Middle Ages and the Renaissance. The texts include two treatises from Aquinas's Summa Theologiae (On Law and On Faith), Dante's Divine Comedy (in its entirety), Petrarch's Ascent of Mont Ventoux and On His Own Ignorance and That of Others, selections from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, Julian of Norwich's Showings, Erasmus's Praise of Folly, Machiavelli's The Prince, More's Utopia, essays by Montaigne, St. Teresa of Avila's Interior Castle, and Cervantes's Don Quixote.

PLS 33102. Great Books Seminar IV

(4-0-4)

Continuing from Great Books Seminar III, and the second in the junior seminar sequence, this course focuses on works from the Renaissance to the Enlightenment period. The texts include Shakespeare's Tempest, Bacon's New Organon, Descartes' Discourse on Method and Meditations on First Philosophy, Hobbes's Leviathan, Pascal's Pensees, Swift's Gulliver's Travels, Hume's Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, Rousseau's Discourse on the Origin of Inequality, Smith's Wealth of Nations, Kant's Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics, Malthus's Essay on the Principles of Population, Austen's Pride and Prejudice, Goethe's Faust, and Mozart's Don Giovanni.

PLS 40301. Christian Theological Tradition

(3-0-3)

A study of the major Christian doctrines in their development, including God, creation and humanity, incarnation and redemption, and the sacraments. The course moves toward a historical and systematic understanding of Christianity, especially the Roman Catholic tradition. Readings typically include patristic authors, medieval authors such as Aquinas, and the documents of Vatican II. Fall.

PLS 40302. Metaphysics and Epistemology

(3-0-3)

An engagement with philosophical conceptions of the nature of knowledge, reality, and the relation between them. Selections from the Platonic tradition, Aristotle's Metaphysics, and Kant's Critique of Pure Reason form the basis of the course. Other readings may include works by such thinkers as Aquinas, Heidegger, and other 20th-century authors. Spring.

PLS 40412. Science, Society and the Human Person

(3-0-3)

In this course students will explore two interrelated questions: what can science tell us about human nature and what can historical and philosophical reflection tell us about science. By reading and discussing important historical and contemporary texts, students will engage the conundrums, challenges and insights created through scientific study or human beings and society. Readings will include works by Charles Darwin, Thomas Kuhn and Jean Piaget. Spring.

PLS 40601. Intellectual and Cultural History

(3-0-3)

This course will deal with the issue of historical consciousness and with the limits and possibilities of historical understanding. The first portion of the course will examine the issues of historiography and the use of historical analysis in the contextualized reading of texts. From this foundation, the issue of history will be explored with reference to authors such as Augustine, Bossuet, Montesquieu, Kant, Hegel, Ranke, and Eliade. Fall.

PLS 43101. Great Books Seminar V

(4-0-4)

The first in the senior Great Books seminar sequence, this course focuses on classic texts from the 19th-century literature, and, in addition, on important works from the Eastern tradition that entered the European canon during the 19th century. The works studied include Tolstoy's War and Peace, Confucius's Analects, The Way of Lao Tzu, the Bhagavad Gita, Hegel's Philosophy of History, Kierkegaard's Philosophical Fragments, Newman's Idea of a University, De Tocqueville's Democracy in America, Melville's Moby-Dick, Thoreau's Walden, Mill's On Liberty, and Darwin's Descent of Man.

PLS 43102. Great Books Seminar VI

(4-0-4)

The second in the senior Great Books seminar sequence, this course focuses on works of seminal importance from the 19th and 20th centuries. The texts studied include Dostoevsky's Brothers Karamazov, Marx's Capital and Communist Manifesto, Flaubert's Madame Bovary, Nietzsche's Beyond Good and Evil, William James's Varieties of Religious Experience, Freud's Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis, Jung's Analytical Psychology, Weber's Protestant Ethic and The Spirit Of Capitalism, Wittgenstein's Blue Book, Heidegger's What Is Philosophy?, and Ellison's Invisible Man.

PLS 43313. Philosophy and Literature Seminar

(4-0-4)

This intensive 4-credit seminar is the introduction to the concentration in philosophy and literature and will pursue interdisciplinary approaches to literary, theoretical, and philosophical texts.

PLS 46000. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

Instructor's written permission and permission of chair required. Reading courses in areas of interest to the student.

PLS 47002. Special Studies

(3-0-3)

Instructor's written permission and permission of chair required. Reading courses in areas of interest to the student.

PLS 47012. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Instructor's written permission and permission of chair required. Reading courses in areas of interest to the student.

PLS 48702. Essay Tutorial

(3-0-3)

This course provides the framework in which seniors in the program prepare a substantial essay, as the culmination of their three years in the program. Faculty members working with small groups of students help them define their topics and guide them, usually on a one-to-one basis, in the preparation of their essays. Spring.

Department of Political Science*POLS 10100. Introduction to American Politics

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the basic institutions and practices of American politics. It examines the institutional and constitutional framework of American politics and identifies the key ideas needed to understand the subject and develop a basis for evaluating American politics today. This introductory course fulfills the American politics breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 10200. Introduction to International Relations

(3-0-3) Rosato

Corequisite: POLS 12200

This course provides students with an understanding of historical and current events in world politics. As such, the course has three central objectives: to introduce various theoretical frameworks for analyzing international political and economic events; to provide an overview of substantive topics in international relations; and to supply a basic understanding of contemporary international events. We explore substantive issues such as cooperation and conflict in international relations, the causes of war, nuclear proliferation, regional free trade agreements, the causes and effects of economic globalization, and the role of international law and institutions. Discussion sections use historical case studies and current events to illustrate concepts introduced in lectures. This introductory course fulfills the international relations breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 10400. Comparative Politics

(3-0-3) McAdams

Corequisite: POLS 12400

This course is a general introduction to the major political institutions and conflicts that shape our world today. Rather than focusing on any particular country or time period, we will use a shocking event—the birth of the modern nation-state—to organize our thinking about a diverse range of political movements and ideologies, including feudalism, colonialism, Leninism, and liberal democracy. This introductory course fulfills the comparative politics breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 10600. Political Theory

(3-0-3) Kaplan

This course is an introduction to political theory as a tradition of discourse and as a way of thinking about politics. The course surveys selected works of political theory and explores some of the recurring themes and questions that political theory addresses. This introductory course fulfills the political theory breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 13105. Introduction to Globalization and International Studies

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: POLS 12105

This course has two purposes. First, it will examine the economic, political, and cultural impacts of easy movement of money, goods, and people that are collectively known today as “globalization.” The course will consider the “pros” and “cons” of the roles played by the institutions that enforce growing financial trade integration and the international promotion by governments and transnational activists of democracy and human rights. It will also highlight the cultural reactions to globalization, including the resurgence of ethnic identities and religious fundamentalism. A second purpose is to introduce the educational opportunities at Notre Dame in international studies and international career options. Representatives of regional study programs and foreign languages, the Study Abroad Office, and several international institutes and the Center for Social Concerns will visit the class to explain the requirements for various undergraduate majors and minors and study-abroad programs, as well as international internship and research opportunities for undergraduates. Visits by career professionals in international diplomacy, journalism, human rights, and business will also be arranged.

POLS 13181. Social Science University Seminar

(3-0-3)

A seminar for first year students devoted to an introductory topic in political science in which writing skills are stressed.

POLS 13195. Mary Wollstonecraft and Mary Shelley

(3-0-3) Botting

Prerequisite: (POLS 13181 OR POLS 13190 OR POLS 195)

This political theory seminar explores the intellectual relationship of Mary Shelley, the author of the novel Frankenstein, to her mother, Mary Wollstonecraft, the author of the first book on women's rights, A Vindication of the Rights of Woman. Traditionally, scholarship has emphasized how the mother's death as a result of childbirth profoundly affected the daughter's psyche. Many scholars have then drawn the conclusion that the novel Frankenstein (1818) is the embodiment of Shelley's anxiety that she was the orphan monster responsible for her own mother's untimely demise. While not denying the psychological power of this thesis, this seminar will explore how Shelley's devoted, even compulsive and passionate, reading of Wollstonecraft's works—including A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) and Letters Written during a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark (1796)—around the time that she composed Frankenstein, meant that the novel engaged the major themes of her mother's writings, including Enlightenment views of sex and gender, social and political revolution, equality and freedom, democracy, science, and human progress. Shelley's substantive and often critical engagement of her mother's enlightened political theory shaped her own Romantic politics as represented by the novel Frankenstein. In this way, Wollstonecraft can be seen as contributing to the birthing of Frankenstein's monster, not just through her daughter's psychological reaction to her tragic death from childbirth, but, even more importantly, through her profound philosophical impact on the political stories that are told by her daughter's momentous novel. These political stories—the egalitarian transformation of the family, the viciousness of class conflict, the desire and demand for social and political revolution, the power of science in politics, the human need for respect and recognition, and the longing for progress—were embodied in Frankenstein and his monster.

POLS 20100. Introduction to American Government

(3-0-3) Wolbrecht

Corequisite: POLS 22100

This course examines the institutional and constitutional framework of American politics and identifies the key ideas needed to understand politics today. Although the course will prepare prospective political science majors for further study of American politics, its primary aim is to introduce students of all backgrounds and interests to the information, ideas and academic skills that will enable them to understand American politics better and help them become more thoughtful and responsible citizens.

POLS 20200. International Relations

(3-0-3) Lindley; Rosato

The study of international relations (IR) is the study of human organization at its highest and most complex level. The goal of IR scholarship is thus to try to manage this complexity intellectually by devising theories which help us to understand and predict state behavior. The main purpose of this course, therefore, will be to introduce students to the most important IR theories. These theories will then, in turn, be applied to real-world IR events in order to test their utility in helping us to understand the world as it actually is. By the end of the course, therefore, the student will have a grounding in both theoretical and factual aspects of IR analysis.

POLS 20400. Comparative Politics

(3-0-3) Gould

Corequisite: POLS 22400

This course teaches students how to think comparatively about politics. We study how nation-states emerged as the dominant form of political organization, explain the differences among various states, and explore diverse responses to economic, cultural, and military globalization. The empirical material is drawn from around the globe. This introductory course fulfills the comparative politics breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 20600. Political Theory

(3-0-3) Villa

Corequisite: POLS 22600

This course is an introduction to political theory as a tradition of discourse and as a way of thinking about politics. The course surveys selected works of political theory and explores some of the recurring themes and questions that political theory addresses, especially the question of justice. This introductory course fulfills the political theory breadth requirement for the political science major.

POLS 30001. Presidential Leadership

(3-0-3) Arnold

Prerequisite: POLS 10100 OR POLS 20100

This course examines the role of the presidency in the American regime and its change over time. Particular attention will be given to expectations about presidential leadership through the course of American political history. Beginning with questions about the original design and role of the presidency, the course turns to consideration of the role of leadership styles for change and continuity in American politics. Finally, cases of presidential leadership are studied to comprehend the way leadership and political context interact.

POLS 30005. American Congress

(3-0-3) Griffin

Prerequisite: POLS 10100 OR POLS 20100

This course will examine such phenomena as legislative organization, roll call behavior, representation, congressional elections, and the role of political parties and interest groups in Congress. This course will approach the United States Congress from several perspectives. First Congress will be viewed from the perspective of the American founding and constitutional theory. Then students will be exposed to a detailed study of the actual workings of Congress, its rules, procedures, and organizations. Then we will read several major studies of Congress, including Mayhew's Congress the Electoral Connection, Cox and McCubbins's Legislative Leviathan, and Jacobson's Congressional Elections. Students will also learn how to do basic roll call analysis through three short data assignments. In addition, they will divide into teams of four, and each team will do a complete legislative history, using primary materials. In addition to these writing assignments, there will be a midterm and a final.

POLS 30010. American Political Parties

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A)

Political parties play many vital roles in American politics: They educate potential voters about political processes, policy issues, and civic duties. They mobilize citizens into political activity and involvement. They provide vital information about public debates. They control the choices—candidates and platforms that voters face at the ballot box. They influence and organize the activities of government officials. Most importantly, by providing a link between government and the governed, they are a central mechanism of representation. These roles—how well they are performed, what bias exists, how they shape outcomes, how they have changed over time—have consequences for the working of the American political system.

POLS 30022. Public Opinion and Political Behavior

(3-0-3)

A principle tenet underlying democratic governance is the belief that public opinion or the "will of the people" should dictate governmental behavior. To the extent this belief is a realistic consideration, difficult questions remain concerning the capacity for citizens to develop reasoned opinions and how to conceptualize and measure opinion. This course explores the foundations of political and social attitudes and the methodology used to observe what people think about politics.

POLS 30025. Interest Group Politics

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A) OR (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A)

Interest groups have long been considered central to an understanding of the working of American politics. As mediating institutions, interest groups sit at the intersection between the public and the political decision makers who govern them. Examining if and how interest groups facilitate effective representation thus tells us a great deal about the functioning and quality of American democracy. In this course, we will consider the historical development of interest group politics, the current shape of the interest group universe, potential bias in representation and function, membership and group maintenance, strategies and tactics, and above all, the influence and role of interest groups on democratic policy making and practice in the United States. We will explore broad theoretical issues, grounded in substantive cases from the current and historic experience of American group politics.

POLS 30030. Political Participation

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A) OR (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A)

This course is intended to explore some of the causes of citizens' differentiated rates of political participation in American politics, as well as the impact that this has on the representational relationship between constituents and legislators. We will begin with a theoretical overview of some of the unique aspects of our representational system. After analyzing the factors that influence the formation of individuals' political preferences, and their propensity to undertake various forms of political participation, we will focus on the historical developments and reforms that have fundamentally shaped the institutions that connect constituents to their government representatives. We will also review the uses of public opinion polls, and end the class by discussing the consequences of using institutional reforms geared toward "direct democracy" to increase political participation and/or the weight of public opinion on the legislative process.

POLS 30031. American Voting and Elections

(3-0-3)

This course will examine voting and opinions, and the linkage between political leaders and the mass public. Possible topics include an introduction to electoral analysis; the history of recent electoral politics; the nature of political participation, especially the rationality of voting turnout and non-electoral specialization; party identification and opinions, attitudes, and ideology; social groups and cultural identities; mass media and image campaigns; and differences between presidential and congressional elections.

POLS 30033. Political Psychology

(3-0-3)

Political psychology is a multidisciplinary field of study concerned with how psychological processes are influenced by and inform political behavior of individual citizens, groups, political leaders, and behavior within political institutions. This class explores some of the major lines of political psychology theory and research, and their application to political life. These applications include the role of personality in the formation of political attitudes and democratic values; racism, stereotyping, ethnocentrism, and nationalism; the influences of emotion and cognition on voting decisions; social identity theory; information processing and political decision making; inter-group conflict; political intolerance; and methodological approaches in political psychology. This course will attempt to answer the following questions: What is racism, and where does it come from? Is political intolerance an automatic response to objective stimuli, or is intolerance functional? To what extent are political attitudes and values ingrained in personality? Is the support for democracy, political trust, and support for the political system linked to personality? How do individuals utilize and process information in political campaigns? Is negative campaigning effective? How did a heightened sense of fear and anxiety, following the September 11 terrorist attacks on America, influence political decisions, the support for President Bush's policies, and intolerance toward social groups? How does social group identity form? Does linking or identifying with one group lead to the rejection of other groups? What motivates George Bush? To what extent are personality theories useful in explaining the behavior of presidents and other political leaders? What are the political psychological underpinnings of inter-group conflict, mass violence, and genocide? Is the truth and reconciliation movement an effective means of recovering from genocide and violence?

POLS 30034. African American Politics: The End or the Beginning?

(3-0-3) Pinderhughes

This course explores the basic elements associated with black politics in the United States: the role of black institutions such as the black church, the importance of the Civil Rights Movement in challenging barriers to black political participation, the mid-20th-century legal framework to create access to the political system, and an exploration of black political participation in northern cities, where there are also increasing numbers of Latinos and other nonwhite groups. Since the course will be taught in spring 2009 immediately after the 2008 presidential campaign, we will also have the chance to explore the impact of Illinois Senator Obama's campaign on national politics, whatever the outcome, and to consider the impact on African American politics itself.

POLS 30035. Race/Ethnicity and American Politics

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the dynamics of the social and historical construction of race and ethnicity in American political life. The course explores the following core questions: What are race and ethnicity? What are the best ways to think about the impact of race and ethnicity on American citizens? What is the history of racial and ethnic formation in American political life? How do race and ethnicity link up with other identities animating political actions such as gender and class? What role do American political institutions, the Congress, presidency, judiciary, state and local governments, etc. play in constructing and maintaining these identity categories? Can these institutions ever be used to overcome the points of division in American society?

POLS 30036. Race and Political Equality

(3-0-3)

This course will describe and seek to explain racial differences in public opinion, political participation, party affiliation, representation, and policy outcomes.

POLS 30037. Black Chicago Politics

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the vast, complex and exciting dimensions of black Chicago politics. First, institutional structures, geographic distribution, and population characteristics will inform students about the sociodemographic background of the African American population in the city. Second, the course explores varying types of political expression that have developed over more than a century, including electoral politics, mass movements, and partisan politics. It will also examine the impact of the Chicago machine, and of the Washington era, on the political and economic status of African Americans in the city. Third, public policy developments in housing, education, and criminal justice will be discussed. Fourth, the course also compares black political standing with other racial and ethnic groups in the city. Finally, the course will introduce students to the long tradition of social science research centered on the city of Chicago.

POLS 30038. Latino Politics

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the history and diversity of Latinos in the United States and how Latinos related to the U.S. political system. We will review the extent to which Latinos are incorporated into the political landscape and the degree to which they are adequately represented in the U.S. government. The course will emphasize the multiple pathways of Latino political assimilation and the ways in which Latinos become involved in politics, including electoral and non-electoral participation and partisanship acquisition.

POLS 30039. Black Politics in Multiracial America

(3-0-3)

This course undertakes a broad examination of black politics in multiracial America. Racial issues have provoked crises in American politics; changes in racial status have prompted American political institutions to operate in distinctive ways. The course examines the interface of black politics with and within the American political system. How successful have blacks been as they attempted to penetrate the electoral system in the post-civil rights era? What conflicts and controversies have arisen as African Americans have sought to integrate the American system of power? Now that the laws have been changed to permit limited integration, should African Americans integrate politically; that is should they attempt to “deracialize” their political appeals and strategy, with an effort to “cross over” politically? Are some approaches, such as those of Illinois Senator Barack Obama, “not black enough?” What internal political challenges do African Americans face? Some, such as the increasing importance of class and socioeconomic factors, as well as gender and sexuality, may reshape the definition of the black community. Finally, how stable will the past patterns and political organizations and institutions of African American politics be, as America and American politics become increasingly multiracial.

POLS 30040. Introduction to Public Policy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A)

The objective of this course is to introduce students to the process of public policy formation in American politics. The course will be divided into three parts. The first section will encompass a brief review of some of the more important mechanisms of American politics that have an impact on the legislative process (i.e. political participation, interest groups, congressional elections, etc.). We will then engage in a general review of how such factors have impacted the direction and tone of federal public policy over the last 30 years. The final two sections of the course will be devoted to detailed analysis of two public policy areas of particular interest to younger voters: education reform and drug laws. Building on the earlier readings and the analytical tools developed, we will examine the current debates and prospects for reform in these policy areas, with an eye toward understanding the political realities of public policy formation.

POLS 30045. The State of the American States

(3-0-3)

This course provides a “critical” and comprehensive examination of politics in the states of the United States, and does so by analyzing topics from several theoretical perspectives. States are major policymakers concerning such central public policies as education, welfare, and criminal justice, among a host of others. There is tremendous variation, yet, at the same time, there are similarities between and among the 50 states in their political processes and governmental institutions, as well as in their public policy concerns and outcomes. The focus of the course is on understanding why the states vary as they do and the consequences of that variation for such core American values as democracy and equality, and how states have different conceptualizations, or different visions or versions, of those core values.

POLS 30060. Constitutional Law

(3-0-3) Kommers

This course examines the main principles of American constitutional law, the process of constitutional interpretation, and the role of the Supreme Court in the American political system. Topics covered are presidential war powers, congressional-executive relations, free speech, church-state relations, the right to life (abortion, right to die, and death penalty), race and gender discrimination, and the American federal system. A good deal of attention is given over to recent personnel changes on the Supreme Court and the extent to which these changes are reflected in the court’s opinions. A background in American national government is desirable.

POLS 30062. Civil Liberties and Civil Rights

(6-0-3) Kaplan

How do courts decide cases involving civil liberties and civil rights? What rationales support the different interpretations of constitutional rights? How has the doctrine of incorporation affected our understanding of constitutional rights? Why is the concept of neutrality so important in current jurisprudence? How do courts balance formal assumptions and attention to particular situations? The purpose of this course is to help you answer these and other basic questions about the law and politics of constitutional rights, including freedom of expression, due process, and equal protection, as well as civil liberties during wartime. This course can fulfill a writing seminar requirement for the political science major.

POLS 30063. Original Intent and Freedom of Religion

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to help students understand the original intent behind the meaning of the First Amendment’s two religion clauses: the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause. It also explores the role that the intent of the founders plays in interpreting freedom of religion cases today.

POLS 30070. Strategy and Social Science

(3-0-3)

The concept of strategy has become the hallmark of modern political analysis. Contemporary political science goes beyond description and instead tries to analyze politics by identifying the motives that drive political behavior, institutions, and procedures. It involves the generation of theories about politics using analytical (usually mathematical) skills. This course will introduce students to this approach to social science research.

POLS 30105. The Modern Presidency

(3-0-3)

Presidential scholars have argued that the modern presidency has unique characteristics. This course identifies the ways that the powers and institution of the presidency have evolved over the last 60 years. It identifies the institutional and structural forces that have shaped the power of the presidency, and includes examination of the president and foreign affairs, including war powers, the organization of the presidency, the President’s role in the legislative and budgetary processes, the rise of party primaries, presidential elections, and relations between the President and Congress, the President and the Supreme Court, and the President and the bureaucracy, as well as theories of presidential power.

POLS 30135. Campaigns, Elections, and American Democracy

(3-0-3)

This class introduces students to the importance of the electoral process for American democracy. We will begin by studying the significance of elections for linking citizens with their government. This involves discussing whether election winners receive a mandate from voters and assessing the extent to which elections help translate citizens’ political opinions to their elected officials. We then turn to the importance of elections in stimulating citizens’ interest in politics and study how campaign organizations strategically use their resources to maximize support for their candidate on election day. We will then assess how elections actually function in the United States by examining topics such as media coverage of campaigns, the Electoral College, differences between presidential and mid-term election cycles and between national and state/local elections, incumbency advantage, and the mechanics of voting. Students will apply the theories covered in class to carefully analyze the campaign and outcome of a race of their choosing.

POLS 30141. Politics and Science Policy

(3-0-3)

This class will meet in seminar format. We will examine the general process for science policy making and emphasize the role played by politics in several specific science programs such as the space program and the Human Genome Project. The first part of the seminar will be devoted to an overview of science policy in the United States, to provide students with a grounding in how science has generally been undertaken by the federal government up until World War II. We will also examine the role of both the executive and legislative branches of government in supporting science and identify interest groups that have been influential in shaping science policy. The final portion of the course will require students to undertake an actual exercise in budget allocation, based on budget figures for various science programs in the federal government. The readings for the class will consist of excerpts from several books about science policy and politics, federal budget documents, and potentially transcripts of congressional committee hearings. There will also be at least one additional class meeting outside of the regularly scheduled time to view the film The Right Stuff. Students will be evaluated on the basis of one essay exam, one presentation, a group project (the budget exercise), and one research paper. Class participation will also be evaluated toward the final grade.

POLS 30143. Environmental Politics

(3-0-3) Doppke

The first half of the course provides an overview of major American environmental policies such as regulating land use and preservation, water, air, and endangered species. The second half of the course deals more directly with issues of policy formulation, implementation, and enforcement.

POLS 30144. State Politics in the United States

(3-0-3)

The goal of this course is to understand the role of the states in American politics. The course examines the structure and history of American federalism and the institutional varieties of state governments, as well as policies that are formulated or implemented at the state level. In addition, we will examine the ways that state politics influences national politics, such as in the Electoral College, in congressional redistricting, and in the frequent jump of state chief executives to the presidency.

POLS 30148. The Politics of Poverty and Social Welfare

(3-0-3) Flavin

The United States is the wealthiest nation in the world, yet poverty remains a persistent concern. In this course, we will study the sources of poverty and economic inequality and what has and can be done to address the problem. We begin by discussing different theories on to what extent citizens' income and wealth should be equal in a society and the government's prescribed role, if any, in the process. We then trace the history of poverty in the United States and various government efforts to address the problem through social welfare programs. Finally, we will closely study the different forms poverty takes on today and enter the ongoing debate over what public policies should be implemented in response. Throughout the course, we will pay particular attention to the decidedly political dimension of poverty in America.

POLS 30201. United States Foreign Policy

(3-0-3) Desch

Prerequisite: POLS 10200 OR POLS 20200

The United States is the most powerful state in the world today. Its actions are important not just for U.S. citizens, but they also affect whether others go to war, whether they will win their wars, whether they receive economic aid, whether they will go broke, or whether they will starve. What determines U.S. foreign policy? What is the national interest? When do we go to war? Would you send U.S. soldiers into war? If so, into which wars, and for what reasons? How do our economic policies affect others? Does trade help or hurt the U.S. economy and its citizens? We first study several theories about foreign policy. We then examine the U.S. foreign policy process, including the President, Congress, the bureaucracy, the media, and public opinion. To see how this all works, we turn to the history of U.S. foreign policy, from Washington's farewell address through the World Wars and the Cold War to the Gulf War. We then study several major issue areas, including weapons of mass destruction, trade and economics, and the environment. Finally, we develop and debate forecasts and strategies for the future.

POLS 30202. War and the Nation-State

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10200 OR POLS 141 OR POLS 141A) OR (POLS 20200 OR POLS 241 OR POLS 241A) OR (GOVT 141 OR GOVT 141A) OR (GOVT 241 OR GOVT 241A) OR (IIPS 20501 OR IIPS 241 OR IIPS 241A)

This course will examine the phenomenon of war in its broader political, social, and economic context since the emergence of the modern nation-state. The general themes of the course include the impact of nationalism, democratization, industrialization, military professionalization, the nuclear revolution, and the information and communication revolution on the development of warfare and the state. Particular historical emphasis will be placed on exploring the causes and conduct of World War I and World War II.

POLS 30203. On War

(3-0-3)

This course is about the causes and conduct of war. As regards causes, the focus is on evaluating the strengths and weaknesses of the most prominent explanations for the outbreak of major war, including balance of power, regime type (democracy/autocracy), civil/military relations, and the personality traits of individual leaders. As regards conduct, the emphasis is on considering the effect of broad political, social, and economic factors (nationalism, democratization, industrialization, and military professionalization) on how wars are and have been fought. Particular historical emphasis is placed on the causes and conduct of great power wars (especially the two World Wars), although other wars will be discussed.

POLS 30210. Domestic Sources of U.S. Foreign Policy

(3-0-3) Lavallee

This course provides students with the analytical tools to understand and critically analyze the impact of domestic actors within the U.S. foreign policy decision-making process. This course examines the roles of the President, Congress, the bureaucracy, public opinion, interest groups, the media, and other sources of influence on the foreign policy-making process and its outcomes. Particular emphasis is given to the study of domestic foreign policy actors through the use of case studies as a qualitative tool of political science research. This course is designed to give the student a sense of real-world involvement in American foreign policy making by means of various exercises involving active student participation, especially case memos, simulations, and case discussions. Students will be required to integrate the conceptual and theoretical material presented in class discussions and readings with the case studies presented. In addition to improving students' understanding of how domestic actors impact foreign policy choices, this course is also designed to enhance analytical thinking and problem-solving skills. Short research assignments, especially preparation for case memos, will increase students' "information literacy" or research skills. Because all students will be expected to participate in class discussions and debates, the course should also improve communication skills.

POLS 30211. Intelligence and National Security Decision Making

(3-0-3) Desch

The purpose of this class is to introduce students to the role of intelligence (collection, analysis, and covert action) in U.S. national security decision making. The course will begin with a discussion of the evolution of U.S. national security decision-making apparatus and the intelligence community. It will then explore major issues of intelligence in U.S. history since the Second World War. Finally, it will conclude with a discussion of some of the future intelligence challenges the United States is likely to face in coming years.

POLS 30220. International Law

(3-0-3) Reydams

This course introduces the student to the sources, the subjects, and the institutions of the international legal order. Substantive international law is discussed on the basis of cases. Time is also made for discussing current issues; e.g., the docket of the International Court of Justice, the ad hoc UN International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, the International Criminal Court, and the Iraqi question before the UN Security Council.

POLS 30221. International Law and International Relations

(3-0-3) Garcia Iommi

This course examines the intersection of international law and international relations, examining international law not as a technical specialty but as part of international relations more generally.

POLS 30225. United Nations and Global Security

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10200 OR POLS 141 OR POLS 141A) OR (POLS 20200 OR POLS 241 OR POLS 241A)

This course explores the United Nations' responsibility for maintaining international peace and security; the reasons for its successes and failures in peacekeeping, enforcement, and peacebuilding in recent cases; the international legal basis for humanitarian intervention and for preventing crimes against the peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity and other gross violations of human rights; and the ethical challenges posed for people seeking to be good citizens both of their nation and of the world. Students evaluate ways to strengthen the role of international law and organization in preventing war and terrorism while addressing ethical issues related to international peace and security.

POLS 30229. Genocide in the Modern World

(3-0-3) Verdeja

This course investigates modern genocide. We will consider several cases—Armenia, the Jewish Holocaust, Cambodia, Rwanda, and possibly Darfur—and examine the conditions that lead to genocidal violence. We will also examine the uses of humanitarian interventions, trials, and strategies of societal reconciliation, and relevant conceptions of justice, guilt, forgiveness, and moral responsibility.

POLS 30240. International Organizations

(3-0-3)

This course examines governance in international relations, including both formal and informal institutions, and the functioning of organizations such as the United Nations, International Monetary Fund, World Trade Organization, European Union, and multilateral development banks. Students will conduct research on topics including peacekeeping and humanitarian intervention, political conflicts surrounding trade liberalization, and assessment of economic development programs.

POLS 30241. NGOs in International Relations

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A) OR (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A)

This course examines the role that nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) play in international relations. Since the end of World War II, international relations scholarship has been dominated by theories that assume privacy of the state. However, in the last 20 years, non-state actors have grown in number, size, and influence. We will analyze the impact that this development has had on both traditional approaches to international relations as well as empirical problems associated with the prominence of NGOs in IR. The first half of the course will analyze several competing theoretical approaches to NGOs, while the second half of the course will focus on empirical topics and contemporary case studies that highlight the efforts of NGOs to influence state behavior. Topics covered include the origins of NGOs, NGOs as interest groups, transitional advocacy networks, epistemic communities, globalization, human rights, the environment, the United Nations, access to international negotiations, and the effectiveness of NGOs in altering state behavior. This course examines governance in international relations, including both formal and informal institutions, and the functioning of organizations such as the United Nations, International Monetary Fund, World Trade Organization, European Union, and multilateral development banks. Students will conduct research on topics, including peacekeeping and humanitarian intervention, political conflicts surrounding trade liberalization, and assessment of economic development programs.

POLS 30260. International Political Economy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10200 OR POLS 141 OR POLS 141A) OR (POLS 20200 OR POLS 241 OR POLS 241A) OR POLS 141 OR IIPS 20200 OR POLS 141 OR POLS 141A OR IIPS 241 OR POLS 241 OR POLS 241A

This course examines the interaction of politics and economics in the international arena. We begin with a brief historical exploration of the international political economy, and introduce four analytical perspectives on state behavior and international outcomes. Topics include trade policy, foreign direct investment and multinational corporations, international capital flows, exchange rate regimes and currency unions (including European Monetary Union), financial crises, and the fight against money laundering and terrorist financing.

POLS 30263. International Environmental Politics

(3-0-3) Connolly

This course examines the responses of nations and international organizations to the environmental challenges of the present and future, including pollution, depletion of natural resources, and global warming.

POLS 30265. Politics of Globalization

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes the emerging world order and U.S. foreign policy at the end of the Cold War. After a brief examination of the end of the Cold War, it discusses a number of underlying causes for various global problems, including colonization, state failure, political domination, poverty, and civilizational differences. The course samples some vexing problems on the ground such as ethnic identity and violence, religion and violence, humanitarian crises and humanitarian intervention, conflict resolution, post-conflict reconstruction, and transnational and transitional justice, and addresses various foreign policy questions that have become amplified by the war on Iraq, including international terrorism, rogue states, weapons of mass destruction, American primacy, democracy promotion, constitutional engineering, the democratic peace, and the perils of illiberal and unconsolidated democracies.

POLS 30266. Political Economy of Globalization

(3-0-3)

This course examines the intersection of politics and economics in an increasingly global world. Economic interdependence has increased dramatically over the past 50 years. While this has raised living standards in many countries, it has also given rise to new social, economic, and political tensions. This course offers an analytical framework for evaluating the consequences of globalization and provides an overview of several theoretical approaches to the empirical issues in today's global economy. The first half of the course focuses on contending theories of globalization, while the second half of the course deals with more substantive issues. Empirical topics discussed include labor inequality, capital mobility, democratization, international institutions, regional trading blocs, the environment, human rights, and state sovereignty.

POLS 30267. Global Politics in Post-Cold War Era

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes U.S. foreign policy in the post-Cold War and post-September 11 world. We first examine a number of underlying causes for global problems in the post-Cold War world, including civilizational differences, state failure, poverty, and political domination. We then discuss the vexing problems of religious violence, ethnic cleansing, and genocide. Humanitarian crises present the challenges of humanitarian intervention, peace making, post-conflict reconstruction, democracy building, and bringing justice for crimes against humanity. We will also explore a wide range of foreign policy issues in the post-September 11 world, including international terrorism, rogue states, weapons of mass destruction, American primacy, anti-Americanism, unilateralism and multilateralism, and the war in Iraq.

POLS 30280. International Relations in East Asia

(3-0-3) Moody

This course explores the interactions of the states and societies in the East Asian region, focusing mainly on the relationships of China and Japan, their interactions with each other and with the outside “Asian” powers, the United States, and Russia (Soviet Union). The first set of class discussions examines the China-centered system in East Asia prior to the intrusion of the new world system carried by Western imperialism. The course then turns to a discussion of this western impact: the colonization of most of the Southeast Asian societies; the reduction of China to a “semi-colony” and the subsequent process of revolution, both nationalist and communist, in that country; and Japan’s turn to “defensive modernization” and its own imperialism to ward off the West and claim status as a great power on a par with the Western countries.

POLS 30285. International Relations of Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course is based on the commonly accepted assumption from theories of political realism that the United States successfully has exercised hegemony over the Western Hemisphere since the beginning of the 20th century. The first topic to be considered is what tactics were used to consolidate that hegemony and how the “face of hegemony” evolved during the 1900s up until the present day. This will involve an examination of the history of hemispheric relations with an emphasis on the political, economic, and cultural aspects of Washington’s strategy. The examination assumes that great powers attempt to control the behavior of less powerful countries in their sphere of influence, and one should not be surprised to find such a situation. The second half of the semester deals with some discrete situations or issues within the hemisphere: economic integration efforts such as NAFTA, CAFTA, and MERCOSUR; the role of petroleum (particularly as regards Venezuela); the drug issue; developments relating to the U.S.-Mexican border; the long-standing Castro regime in Cuba; and the foreign policies of individual Latin American countries (particularly Brazil and Mexico). There will be two written examinations, plus a final one, and one paper and/or class presentation.

POLS 30291. Arab-Israeli Conflict

(3-0-3)

This course tracks the Arab-Israeli conflict from its origins in the late 19th century to the present, making special use of primary sources that express differing perspectives in their full intensity. Current issues of the conflict will be analyzed in depth with the help of current periodical and electronic sources. Classes will include a mixture of lectures, video, and role playing. There will be a midterm exam and a short policy paper.

POLS 30292. U.S.-Latin American Relations

(3-0-3)

The primary goal of the course is to understand the basis for the political, economic, and security relations of Latin American states with the United States. The course begins with a theoretical and historical examination of the competing perspectives on what determines U.S. policy toward Latin America: its normative ideals, its security interests, or its economic interests. It then takes up several enduring themes in U.S.-Latin American relations, including the response of the United States to dictatorships; expropriations of U.S.-owned property; revolution; and efforts to promote development, democracy, and human rights. Next, it considers the relations of several Latin American states with each other and the United States from the Latin American point of view, with special attention to the foreign policies of Cuba and Mexico. Finally, it examines several new issues in U.S.-Latin American relations, including regional free trade agreements and trade policy, the environment, migration, and drugs, in a post-Cold War environment.

POLS 30335. Understanding Change in International Politics

(3-0-3)

The end of the Cold War and the beginning of the third millennium have sparked debates about change in international politics. This course takes a theoretical and historical approach to address this question. It first analyzes competing theoretical perspectives in IR, such as classical realism (Morgenthau), structural realism (Waltz and Gilpin), neoclassical realism (Schweller), subaltern realism (Ayoob), liberalism (Doyle), and constructivism (Wendt). The discussion focuses on various understandings of international politics and the possibility for transformation. The course then examines major forces that have powerfully shaped international politics, including international trade and capitalism, international norms and regimes, and democratization in domestic politics.

POLS 30338. The Transatlantic Relationship

(3-0-3)

Since the end of the Cold War, there have been two notable ideas developed by scholars of international relations. The first idea—first developed by Francis Fukuyama—is that Western civilization has triumphed globally over other civilizations, while the second idea—first developed by Samuel Huntington—is that Western civilization is about to enter a period of greater weakness, vis-à-vis other civilizations. In order to understand which argument is correct, we must first understand the current strength of Western civilization, and in particular, the relationship between its two halves—Western Europe and North America. In this course, therefore, we will undertake a study of the history and current state of that relationship, focusing primarily on the post-WWII period, and particularly on the security arrangements that have developed between the two regions. In this light, special attention will be applied to the NATO alliance and to the developing security capabilities of the European Union. Having considered the objective facts of the transatlantic security situation, we will then be able to return to the Fukuyama-Huntington debate in order to determine what the future of intercivilizational relations does indeed portend.

POLS 30342. Security Motivations of Regional Integration

(3-0-3)

In many regions of the world, states are combining aspects of their political authority in order to create transnational structures and agreements. Although these integrating structures—such as the European Union (EU), the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), etc.—are often treated as primarily economic institutions, they also address important security needs. In this course, therefore, we will explore the security concerns that prompted the creation of not only the EU and NAFTA, but also the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA), the Mercosur project in South America, and the ASEAN project in South East Asia, as well as notable failed integrative attempts in the Middle East, Africa, and Eastern Europe.

POLS 30361. Politics of Money and Banking

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the political foundations of financial markets and banking regulatory structures. The objective is two-folded: (1) to provide an understanding of the function of money and the banking system within an economy, and (2) to offer an analytical framework with which to understand monetary, financial, and banking regulatory policies. Topics include, among others, the performance of banking systems, the role of international financial institutions, central bank independence, and banking regulation. Comparisons between the U.S. and other banking systems (such as the Brazilian, and the Japanese banking systems) will also be covered.

POLS 30390. Diplomatic History of the Middle East

(3-0-3)

The course deals with three main issues: (1) motivation and interests behind the foreign policies of all players relevant to the Middle East; (2) main events in the diplomatic history of the region since the 17th century and their analysis based on international relations theories; and (3) mutual relations between the contemporary regional system and sub-systems and the international system, as well as current state and non-state players in the contemporary Middle East and their relations with international players. The course makes use of the wealth of sources opened in recent years to present new and conservative approaches to many elements of the regional diplomatic history.

POLS 30391. Arab-Israeli Relations: From Confrontation to Coexistence

(3-0-3) Bligh

This course is following and analyzing the complexity of relations between the Arab countries and the state of Israel (and the state in the making) since the early 20th century to this day. This conflict has been one of the major elements shaping the political, diplomatic and military history of the region drawing into the conflict a variety of actors among them the super powers, nation-states from within and outside the region, sub-states, and supra-states. The effects of the conflict on these respective regimes are analyzed as well. Three major processes became the main source of interest for all actors: the Arab effort to prevent the creation of the Jewish state; the armed conflicts, and finally the diplomatic processes that continue today. Most of them will be studied in the context of the diplomatic and political history of the Middle East.

POLS 30392. Diplomacy and Conflict in the Middle East

(3-0-3) Bligh

This course examines the role of diplomacy in shaping the Middle East and in managing conflict in the region today.

POLS 30401. Latin American Politics

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to Latin American politics. What are the major challenges facing Latin America in the new millennium? How are different countries facing these challenges? What are the origins of the current dilemmas and opportunities facing Latin America? This course is intended to give students an understanding of the major political and development challenges that Latin America has faced in the mid-20th to early 21st century. The course will survey the major theories and strategies of economic industrialization and neo-liberalism, and it will consider questions of reform, revolution, authoritarianism, and democracy. Throughout the course, we will use case studies focusing on specific countries and specific problems.

POLS 30402. Politics and Institutions in Latin America

(3-0-3) Wiesehomeier

This course aims at enabling students to understand politics in the Latin American region by introducing important concepts of comparative politics and discussing, from a comparative perspective, institutional components and configurations of Latin American countries. We will focus on the question of how institutional frameworks influence policy decisions and actors' behavior; that is, how they affect governability and representation. The course will revolve around central issues such as electoral systems, party system, legislative decision making and executive-legislative relations, and representation. One important aspect of the course is to get students acquainted with quantitative indicators of comparative politics that not only help to map representation, but also to understand some puzzles of policy making we will encounter throughout Latin American countries. Thus, the course will help students to better understand democratic representation as well as quantitative approaches to the study of democratic institutions.

POLS 30403. Latin American Development and Politics

(3-0-3)

Latin American countries face many challenges, some inherited from Spanish and Portuguese colonial rule, some created by today's globalization, and some common to all developing countries. This course examines how several Latin American countries have responded to the most important of these challenges: how to build a state that can maintain order at home and stay at peace with its neighbors; how to form legitimate governments that can pass needed laws; how to ensure that citizens have political rights and a say in the political process; how to promote industrialization and economic growth; and how to achieve a more equal distribution of wealth and ensure that basic human needs are met.

POLS 30404. U.S.-Latin American Politics

(3-0-3)

The primary goal of the course is to understand the bases for the political, economic, and security relations of Latin American states with the United States.

The course begins with a theoretical and historical examination of the competing perspectives on what determines U.S. policy toward Latin America: its normative ideals, its security interests, or its economic interests. It then takes up several enduring themes in U.S.-Latin American relations, including the response of the United States to dictatorships; expropriations of U.S.-owned property; and revolution and efforts to promote development, democracy, and human rights. Next, it considers the relations of several Latin American states with each other and the United States, from the Latin American point of view, with special attention paid to the foreign policies of Cuba and Mexico. Finally, it examines several new issues in U.S.-Latin American relations, including regional free trade agreements and trade policy, the environment, migration, and drugs, in a post-Cold War environment.

POLS 30405. Law and Democracy in Latin America

(3-0-3)

Democracy and the rule of law seem to be the prescription for what ails the developing world. But they are harder to put into practice than they at first appear. This course explores many of the challenges to the rule of law across Latin America, and how they affect the quality of democracy in the region. We begin by examining the meaning of democracy and its relationship to the rule of law. Then we look at a series of issues that illustrate the strength or weakness of the rule of law in the region. We use academic writings primarily, but also movies, news reports, and statistical reports to examine topics such as violence and crime, human rights violations, judicial independence, and corruption. Rather than focusing on one country at a time or a few countries in depth, we will use events and systems in various countries as illustrations of important themes. We will then look at the possible consequences of these challenges for democracy in the region and possible solutions.

POLS 30413. Current Events of Latin America

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes the main challenges that Latin America has tackled for the past few years. After introducing students to some basic concepts and contextual information on the region, the course explores the various social, economic, and political events that Latin American countries have confronted, as well as the different ways in which they have responded to these challenges. The course also incorporates an analysis of some of the "unsolved" issues of the region, such as environmental protection and sustainable development, gender equality, and ethnic minority rights.

POLS 30420. Building the European Union

(3-0-3) Messina

This undergraduate lecture course introduces the contemporary project for greater economic, political, and security integration among the current 27 members of the European Union within its appropriate historical context, its current economic and political setting, and its projected future ambitions. The course is thus very much concerned with recent events and important European events-in-the-making, including the implementation of the Amsterdam Treaty, the expansion of the membership of the European Union, and EU-sponsored strategies to facilitate democratic transitions in Eastern Europe.

POLS 30421. European Politics

(3-0-3)

In this course on European politics, we will examine the literature on three major issues: regional integration, origins of modern political authority, and industrial political economy. We will seek to understand the origin, current functioning, and possible futures for key European institutions, including the EU, nation-states, social provision, unions, and political parties. Readings on the European Union, monetary politics, Germany, France, and Spain will be drawn from both scholarly sources and contemporary analyses of political events.

POLS 30451. Politics of Southern Africa

(3-0-3)

This course focuses on the key state of the region—the Republic of South Africa. After outlining the political history of apartheid, the phenomenon of Afrikaner nationalism, and the rise of African nationalism and the liberation movements, attention turns to the country's escalating turmoil of the 1980s and resulting political transition in the 1990s. South Africa's political and economic prospects are also examined. The semester concludes with a survey of the transitions that brought South Africa's neighboring territories to independence, the destabilization strategies of the apartheid regime, and U.S. policy in that region.

POLS 30452. Politics of Tropical Africa

(3-0-3)

Following an introduction to traditional political institutions, the colonial inheritance and the rise of African nationalism, the course concentrates on the current economic and political problems of tropical Africa. This includes case studies of political organizations, ideologies, and government institutions in Ghana, Nigeria, and Tanzania.

POLS 30456. Democracy, Development, and Conflict in Africa

(3-0-3)

This course surveys African politics through the lens of the "big themes" in comparative politics—democratization, economic development, and internal conflict. Each theme is approached through both broad theories and specific case studies, so that students will learn about Africa in general and concrete ways. Students will consider the nature of Africa's challenges, what conditions distinguish Africa's successes from its failures, and what can be realistically accomplished in the future.

POLS 30457. Introduction to African Politics

(3-0-3)

Every week there is a news story concerning some tragedy in Africa. But what does it really mean? How do we understand what's going on in Africa right now? Is there any good news at all coming from the Dark Continent? Why is Africa so poor and so violent? How did Africa get this way? What can we do about it? Is there a realistic basis for optimism about Africa? This class will be structured around a series of issues "ripped from today's headlines" so as to provide participants with a more thorough understanding of African politics today.

POLS 30458. Dictators, Democrats, and Development: African Politics Since Independence

(3-0-3)

This course will focus on the causes and consequences of political change in sub-Saharan Africa since the late 1950s and early 1960s. Special attention will be focused on the relationship between political change and economic/human development. The key questions this course will address include the following: (1) What explains the rise of post-colonial authoritarian regimes? (2) What explains the demise of post-colonial authoritarian regimes? (3) What explains the variation in the extent of democratization that has taken place across sub-Saharan Africa since the late 1980s and early 1990s? (4) Where and why are the prospects for democracy the greatest in sub-Saharan Africa? (5) Should it matter to the rest of the world that sub-Saharan African countries become more democratic? (6) If it should matter, can/how can the United States and other countries promote democratization in the region? Assignments will include in-class group presentations, a research paper, a midterm exam, and a final exam.

POLS 30463. Comparative Economy of India and China

(3-0-3)

This course compares India and China's different paths to political development in light of their history, institutions, and relations with the West.

POLS 30465. Chinese Politics

(3-0-3) Moody

Study of the contemporary Chinese political system and process in the light of Chinese history and culture. Some of the topics treated include the traditional political order; the revolutionary movements; the rise of communism; Maoism and the rejection of Maoism; the political structure; leadership, personalities, and power struggles; economic policy; social policy and movements; problems of corruption and instability; and prospects for democratic development. There will be some attention to Taiwan and Hong Kong as special Chinese societies.

POLS 30466. Political Movements in Asia

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes a wide range of political movements, including nationalist and revolutionary movements, guerrilla insurgencies, terrorist organizations, democracy movements, and peace movements. The Asian region encompasses China (including Taiwan, Tibet, Xinjiang, Hong Kong), Mongolia, North and South Korea, Japan, the Philippines, Vietnam, Thailand, Cambodia, Burma, Malaysia, Indonesia, India, Pakistan, Nepal, Afghanistan, and so on. To understand various movements, we will study global trends, human rights values, cultural differences, religious doctrines, historical legacies, state-society relations, leadership skills, mobilization strategies, and violent vs. nonviolent trajectories. In addition to analytical readings, we will also watch a series of documentaries and read a number of prominent (auto-)biographies.

POLS 30467. South Asian Politics

(3-0-3)

This course will present an overview of the politics of modern South Asia, focusing on Afghanistan, Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan. We will begin by studying the impact of the British colonial experience, the rise of nationalism, and the emergence of independent nation states. To develop a broad understanding of the political and economic experience of the region, we will spend time analyzing the four countries individually before moving on to explore four important themes in political science: first, regime choice and regime survival in the four countries; second, the role of women in the development experience; third, identity politics and the emergence of violent domestic and international movements; and fourth, international relations focusing on the role of three key actors—the United States, China, and the Middle East in regional politics.

POLS 30476. Political Movements in Asia

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes a wide range of political movements, including nationalist and revolutionary movements, guerrilla insurgencies, terrorist organizations, democracy movements, and peace movements. The regional scope covers East Asia, Southeast Asia, and South Asia. To understand various movements, we will study global trends, human rights values, cultural differences, religious doctrines, historical legacies, state-society relations, leadership skills, mobilization strategies, and violent vs. nonviolent trajectories. In addition to analytical readings, we will also watch a series of documentaries and read a number of prominent (auto) biographies.

POLS 30480. Religion and Politics in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3)

In this course, we examine various hypotheses about the relationship between religion and politics, religious institutions and political institutions, and based on evidence from across time and space (i.e., Africa, Asia, Europe, Middle East, North America and South America) discuss the robustness of such hypotheses. The aim of the course is to think critically about the conventional wisdom concerning the relationship between religion and politics. Special attention will be focused on the effects of modernization and globalization on the political salience of religion and whether certain types of religious systems (i.e., various types of Christianity and Islam) are more compatible with and conducive to democracy than others.

POLS 30482. State Terror and Violence

(3-0-3) Davenport

This course on state-sponsored terror, repression, and violence examines its causes and implications, and the role of the international community in responding to it.

POLS 30483. Contentious Politics and Resistance Movements

(3-0-3)

This course analyzes prominent resistance movements in the 20th and 21st centuries. We first examine the conceptual tools of contentious politics, domination and resistance, state-society relations, and violent vs. nonviolent strategies of resistance. We then examine various nationalist independence movements, revolutionary movements, communist insurgencies, civil wars, and peaceful democracy movements. To better understand resistance movements from the perspectives of leaders and participants, we will watch a series of documentaries and read the (auto-) biographies of Mahatma Gandhi, Nelson Mandela, Aung San Suu Kyi, the Dalai Lama, Wei Jingshen, and others. In analyzing democracy movements, we will further examine what the third wave of democracy entails, why some movements succeed while others fail, how new democracies should reconcile with past dictators, to what extent constitutional engineering can solve past problems and facilitate successful transitions, and why some new democracies remain fragile.

POLS 30484. Courts and Politics Around the World

(3-0-3)

This course carries out a comparative study of the nature of courts and law, their position in political systems, and their potential impact on society. The course is very theoretical, and organized around key themes rather than countries. The main themes of the course include the following: Why do politicians create powerful courts? How do judges and courts make decisions? What is judicial independence, and how do we get it? Which systems have it? And how effective are courts as tools for political and social change? The court has a heavy emphasis on judicial design, and the class will design a court structure for an imaginary country.

POLS 30485. Game Theory

(3-0-3)

This course will provide a basic introduction to the concepts and tools of game theory and demonstrate how these can be used in the social sciences. Emphasis is placed on understanding the logic of game theory and its application to the study of politics. Students will also be introduced to the debate concerning the applicability and limitations of formal approaches. The course assumes a familiarity with algebra, but no calculus is required.

POLS 30488. Transitions to Democracy

(3-0-3)

In this class, we will analyze the institutional underpinnings of a successful transition to democracy, and we will discuss ways in which democratic institutions following the transition are set up. Obviously, to understand what contributes to successful transitions, we need to analyze the cases of failed transitions to democracy and failed processes of democratization. Most examples in this class come from the former Soviet Union and from East and Central Europe. Our ambitions, however, are more universal. By the end of the class, you should be able to apply the theories and concepts you learn to transitions taking place in other parts of the world.

POLS 30490. The Logics and Politics of International Migration

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the primary economic, humanitarian, and political forces that are driving and sustaining the complex phenomenon of contemporary transnational migration. Within this context, three core questions are addressed. First, have the forces of globalization and the entanglements of international commitments and treaty obligations significantly diminished the policy-making autonomy of the traditional nation-state? Second, what are the significant benefits and costs of transnational migration for the immigration receiving countries? Finally, is a liberal immigration regime desirable and, if so, can it be politically sustained? This is a course with a methodological component.

POLS 30514. Latin American Politics and Economic Development

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10400 OR POLS 142A) OR (POLS 20400 OR POLS 242 OR POLS 242A) OR (GOVT 10400 OR GOVT 142 OR GOVT 142A) OR (GOVT 20400 OR GOVT 242 OR GOVT 242A)

During the past few decades, Latin America has undergone deep political and economic change. The patterns of political polarization and the implementation of import substitution industrialization models that characterized the region were altered by the emergence of bureaucratic authoritarian regimes. From the 1980s on, Latin American nations sought to reinstall democracy and promote economic development, yet the paths they followed to those ends have been quite diverse, as have their achievements. This course examines those divergent paths during the past four decades. After introducing students to some contextual information on the region, the course will examine the different roads to democratic breakdown, the emergence of authoritarian regimes, and the contrasting paths to redemocratization and development.

POLS 30523. Contemporary Latin American Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course offers a global perspective on contemporary Latin American politics. It examines the consequences of democratization in different Latin American countries, the connections between democracy and social and economic development, trends in government institutions, political parties and elections, and the still-present tensions between democratic and non-democratic practices and ideologies in the region.

POLS 30527. Cuba

(3-0-3)

This course will examine social, economic, cultural, and political trends in Cuba as the country enters a period of uncertainty following the illness of Cuban President Fidel Castro. Co-taught by two journalists who spent the last five years in Cuba, the course will provide a unique view of day-to-day life on the island as well as study recent changes in U.S.-Cuba relations and the rise in importance of Cuba's ties with Venezuela. Cuban films, television broadcasts, magazines, newspapers, poetry, literature and other primary materials will be used in the class. Spanish fluency is not required.

POLS 30551. Radical Islam in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3) Bligh

Muslim radical movements are not new to the Middle East. They made their debut in the 18th-century Arabian Peninsula paving the way for the first Saudi Kingdom. However, the use of Islam by individuals, movements, and nation-states for political purposes has become common since the mid-1970s. Many of the contemporary Muslim actors use religious terminology in their ideology and activities but are active as political actors per se. This course is studying the roots of the political Islam, its current political activities and their implications, the distinction between mainstream Islam and radical Islam, and finally the phenomena of religious terror used by several of these movements.

POLS 30552. Politics and Democratization in Middle Eastern and North Africa Monarchies

(3-0-3)

This course examines the politics of monarchies in the Middle East and North Africa. The course examines how these regimes developed and their effect on politics in these regions and explores the prospect for democratization in such countries.

POLS 30553. Contemporary Political Islam

(3-0-3) Shahin

This course is designed to provide students with an understanding of the phenomenon of political Islam in the Arab and Muslim worlds. It examines the reasons, implications, and consequences of the reassertion of Islam in today's politics. The first part of the course provides a thorough analysis of the Islamic order and the model(s) that inspires modern Islamist activists. The second part critically examines the ideas of the main ideologues of contemporary Islamic movements. The third part discusses the approaches to the understanding of contemporary political Islam and the Islamic movements and presents cases studies of mainstream and radical Islamic movements in a number of Arab and Muslim countries. Finally, the course concludes with a critical analysis of the future of political Islam and its relations with the West.

POLS 30592. Ethnic Conflicts in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3)

Most nations today may be considered as multicultural; that is, they are comprised of at least two distinct societies based on different cultures. About 5,000 ethnic groups are found today in about 200 nations. It is evident that in spite of the high hopes since the collapse of the Communist Bloc, the number of ethnic conflicts increased dramatically. At present about 300 conflicts are registered. Each and every one of them is unique, and yet there are some similarities that characterize most of them. This course maps the main conflicts, studies the roots and claims of the protagonists, and, based on the recognition of the similarities, attempts to define a model of ethnic conflicts and some features of possible solutions.

POLS 30601. Ancient and Medieval Theory

(3-0-3)

What is the meaning of justice, and why should we care about it? Can politics ever perfectly establish justice? Which forms of government are best for human beings to live under, and why? What is the political relevance of religion and philosophy, family and ethnicity, war and peace, nature and freedom, law and right? What are the qualities of a good citizen and political leader? How should relations among diverse political communities be conducted? This course introduces students to theoretical reflection on these and related questions through the study of some of the great works of ancient and medieval political thought. Readings will include writings of authors such as Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Augustine, Farabi, Maimonides, and Aquinas.

POLS 30610. The Enlightenment and Its Revolutions

(3-0-3)

This course examines the political, social, economic, and intellectual revolutions that shaped the trajectory of the age of Enlightenment from the late-17th to the late-18th century in Europe and America. We will study the political theories of Locke, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Voltaire, Smith, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Kant, Burke, and Wollstonecraft, and how their ideas shaped the many revolutions of their time and the very meaning of the Enlightenment itself.

POLS 30612. Nineteenth-Century Political Thought

(3-0-3)

The problem of 19th-century political thought can be described as follows: We want to believe in something outside ourselves, but we want it to be our own choice. After the French Revolution, universal liberty seemed possible, but the legitimacy of actual institutions was called into question. This made political theory a vital part of political life itself. This course will investigate the themes of liberty, institutions, and change as they appear in selected works of French and German political thought by Joseph de Maistre, Auguste Comte, Alexis de Tocqueville, G.W.F. Hegel, Karl Marx, and Max Weber.

POLS 30615. American Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course will explore some of the major thinkers and themes of the history of American political theory. Beginning with the founding era, the course will examine the writings of Jefferson and the Federalist Papers in an attempt to shed light on the theory behind the new republic and the structure that that republic should take. From there, the course will move toward the crisis that culminated in the Civil War, in an attempt to clarify the purpose of the union and its shape if it is to survive the crisis. The course will then examine some writings dealing with the push toward industrialization, beginning with Reconstruction, continuing with the reality of global war, and ending with the prospects of a Great Society in the New Deal. The course will then explore thinkers concerned with the changing shape of democracy, such as Dewey, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Martin Luther King Jr.

POLS 30620. Modern Political Thought

(3-0-3)

In this course, students will study the focal ideas and arguments that helped shape the development of Western modernity through close readings of the classic texts of modern European political thought. Political theorist Charles Taylor's recent book, Modern Social Imaginaries, will provide a helpful historical and philosophical framework for the course and will be read and discussed gradually over the semester. Machiavelli's The Prince will give students insight into the philosophical origins of the modern Western experience of secular power politics. Hobbes's Leviathan, Locke's Second Treatise of Government, Rousseau's Second Discourse and Social

Contract, and selected political essays by Kant will offer students the opportunity to understand the evolution of the social contract tradition, and how it helped produce the fundamental Western "modern social imaginaries" of natural rights, the contractual social order, popular sovereignty, and the public sphere.

POLS 30621. Continental Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course examines the response of leading theorists to the promise and pathologies of the modern age. Among other topics, we will consider the political implications of the decline of authority, community, and the public sphere; the problem of institutionalizing freedom in the modern nation-state; and the fate of political and moral agency in a bureaucratized, massified polity. Special attention will be paid to the Continental tradition's critique of liberal institutions and political philosophy. Readings from Hegel, Tocqueville, Marx, Nietzsche, Weber, Schmitt, the Frankfurt School, Arendt, and Foucault.

POLS 30625. Contemporary Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to contemporary American and European political thinkers. The goal of the course is to identify the characteristic questions of modern politics and the challenges to freedom in the modern age.

POLS 30631. Social Choice and Democratic Theory

(3-0-3)

Is there a public good? A prevalent view in political science is that democracy is unavoidably chaotic, arbitrary, meaningless, and impossible. Such skepticism began with Condorcet's paradox of voting in the 18th century, and continued most notably with Arrow's impossibility theorem and Riker's Liberalism Against Populism in the 20th century. We'll examine and challenge these long-standing doubts about democratic governance (among them cycling, agenda control, and multidimensional manipulation). The course will provide a nontechnical introduction to social choice theory (formal analysis of the problem of preference aggregation in general, and of alternative voting rules). The tools of social choice will be illustrated in several close analyses of Congressional deliberation and voting. Most importantly, we'll critically investigate the conceptual and normative foundations of social choice theory as it relates to current democratic theory.

POLS 30652. Machiavellianism

(3-0-3)

Machiavelli is notorious for promoting a certain "hard-nosed realism" in political analysis and practice. This course explores Machiavellianism in the master himself and in the tradition to which we give his name. We will read representatives of Machiavellian republication, including a novel with a decidedly Machiavellian lesson (Mark Twain's Tom Sawyer), and conclude with the recent book by John Mearsheimer, often thought to be the leading Machiavellian analyst of international politics of our day.

POLS 30653. Politics and Conscience

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 20600 OR POLS 243 OR POLS 243A) OR (GOVT 20600 OR GOVT 243 OR GOVT 243A) OR GOVT 143 OR GOVT 143A OR GOVT 243 OR GOVT 243A OR POLS 143 OR POLS 143A OR POLS 243 OR POLS 243A

Against a backdrop of large-scale society, mass movements, and technological bureaucracy, the invocation of "conscience" recalls the individual human person as a meaningful actor in the political sphere. But what is conscience, and what are its rights and responsibilities? What is it about conscience that ought to command governmental respect, and are there any limits to its autonomy? What role should conscience play in questions of war and peace, law-abidingness and civil disobedience, citizenship and political leadership? And how does the notion of conscience connect with concepts of natural law and natural rights, nationality and prudence, religion and toleration? This course engages these questions through select readings from the history of political thought. We also will consider various 20th-century reflections on conscience, expressed in essays, plays, short stories, speeches, and declarations.

POLS 30656. Human Rights and Human Wrongs

(3-0-3) Verdeja

This course will examine theories of human rights and their applications and implications for international politics.

POLS 30668. Feminist Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course will examine different ideas, approaches, and issues within feminist political thought. The first part of the course will compare different theoretical perspectives, from liberalism to Marxism, that have been employed by contemporary feminists. We will pay particular attention to the meanings ascribed to “woman” and her roles in society. The second part of the course will examine how women have been represented throughout Western political thought, and the values ascribed to them by political theorists. Finally, in the last part of the course, we will turn to an examination of several contemporary political issues particularly relevant to feminist thought.

POLS 30669. The Public Sphere and Public Spaces

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10600 OR POLS 143 OR POLS 143A OR POLS 243F) OR (POLS 20600 OR POLS 243 OR POLS 243A)

How do political theorists distinguish between the public and the private?

Which distinctive activities take place in the public sphere? What are the effects on contemporary society if the public sphere is lost or radically diminished or changed? This course will examine a number of different ways that modern and contemporary political theorists have conceptualized the public sphere. We will seek to apply our theoretical understandings of the public sphere to illuminate the political and philosophical issues embedded in how public spaces are constructed in the United States, using the New Urbanism movement in particular.

POLS 30670. Politics and Literature

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10600 OR POLS 143 OR POLS 143A OR POLS 243F) OR (GOVT 20600 OR GOVT 243 OR GOVT 243A) OR (POLS 20600 OR POLS 243 OR POLS 243A)

This course involves the study of political theory and literature in order to address some of the central questions of political theory in the modern age. The examination of the relation between truth, faith, and politics, and the nature of political action will form central questions of the course. We will pay special attention to the problems of founding policies and membership in political communities.

POLS 30727. Theories of Law

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 20600 OR POLS 243 OR POLS 243A) OR (GOVT 20600 OR GOVT 243 OR GOVT 243A)

This course will explore historical and contemporary theories of law, examining the nature of law in civil society and the moral foundations of systems of law. In examining the accounts offered by Aristotle, Cicero, Aquinas, Hart, Fuller, Dworkin, and Raz, the class will engage in the historical and contemporary debates over the nature of law, such as natural law versus positive law, law’s pedagogical and deterrent functions, the relationship between law and virtue, and establishing a legitimacy of a legal system. The aims of the course will be to develop a theoretical understanding of law and its proper function in modern societies and to trace the historical contours of legal philosophy and the development of our own legal system.

POLS 30730. Political Pathologies

(3-0-3)

Tyranny takes many forms. The tin-pot dictator; the fearsome totalitarian madman; the slow, asphyxiating absurdity of faceless bureaucracy; the efficient provider of goods in exchange for freedom; the populist rabble-rouser; the anarchic madness of failed states—they all form part of the dubious pantheon of political pathology. These diseases of the political order in turn tell us about the things that we consider valuable in political life and the ways in which their attainment might be thwarted even while everybody pursues them in good faith. This course will be an adventure in the clinical exploration of these diseases. We will attempt to understand the difference between political order and disorder, disease and health, by looking to the philosophical treatments of tyranny and its opposites and contrasting these treatments with the varied experience of human beings of these things. Throughout, we will engage with such questions as: What distinguishes genuine statesmanship from tyranny? What are the fundamental characteristics of the tyrant? What causes tyranny and political disorder? What are the moral dilemmas that people face when living under tyranny? What are the basic cures for tyranny? Our goals are thus to understand the causes, symptoms, development, consequences, and cures of the great political pathologies. This task will require us to draw on texts from a wide variety of perspective, from philosophy to social science and artistic representations (novels and films, in particular), and to engage critically and imaginatively with arguments and situations that pose sometimes excruciating choices.

POLS 30732. Theories of Federalism

(3-0-3)

Federalism is a fundamental and identifying component of the American political system. Federalism’s role in American politics has been ascending since the mid-1990s, after approximately 60 years of diminished relevance. In addition to seeking to understand what, as an organizing principle of government federalism is, this course explores the theoretical and historical basis of American federalism, as well as theories of federalism from Canada, Australia, and Western Europe, including the relatively new supranational federalism of the European Union. We will address questions of federalism’s relationship to rights and minorities, liberty, security, and justice. We will also investigate concepts such as hard and soft federalism, symmetrical and asymmetrical federalism, and interstate versus intrastate federalism. Readings will include selections from The Federalist Papers and writings by Tocqueville, Calhoun, Lincoln, Martin Diamond, Herbert Storing, and Charles Taylor.

POLS 30733. The Problem of Faction

(3-0-3)

Since the heated election of 2000, the terms “red state” and “blue state” have become a part of our political lexicon. But the phenomenon of faction—internal political conflict—is neither new nor unique to the United States. After beginning with an assessment of contemporary politics, this course will survey a variety of thinkers—ancient, modern, and American—on the problem of factions.

POLS 30734. Justice: Ancient and Modern

(3-0-3)

What is justice? And why should one be just? These are core questions of political philosophy. In this course, we will study these questions by contrasting two conflicting theories of justice: Plato’s Republic and Hobbes’ Leviathan. Besides encouraging students to think critically about their own beliefs of justice and cultivating their ability to construct reasoned arguments, this course will introduce students to the contrast between ancient and modern political theory, and will encourage them to reflect on how both still speak to us today.

POLS 30736. Globalization’s First Wave: Commerce and Culture in Early Modernity

(3-0-3)

Today’s economic and cultural challenges may be more deeply understood through studying the times when modern capitalism and global trade were new. In the 17th and 18th centuries—when much of the West saw dramatic transformations from rural, subsistence agriculture to commerce, finance, and industry—observers fiercely debated the meaning of these changes. For instance, as much of the population left meager existences for solid, worldly comfort or even lavish affluence, would they become more enlightened, peaceable, and tolerant, or just more skeptical, self-centered, and incapable of hardship or sacrifice? Would the lower classes somehow share the new wealth, or be left far behind in degradation, taunted by luxuries they cannot partake of legally? When people have more commerce with foreign cultures, do they tend to adopt the foreigners’ best attributes, get corrupted by their worst attributes, or simply be reduced to a materialistic common denominator? Would more trade and interdependence lead to less war? We will pursue such questions with the help of historical, sociological, economic, political, and philosophical studies, especially through thinkers such as Hume, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Adam Smith, Tocqueville, Marx, and Weber—focusing on the 18th century but leading up to our own time.

POLS 30737. Contemporary Christian Political Thought

(3-0-3)

This course is designed to introduce students to problems of contemporary politics from various Christian perspectives. Beginning with an overview of medieval and early modern Christian thinkers—Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, and Calvin—the course will spend most of the semester reading and discussing theorists who address more recent and immediate political problems within the Christian tradition. A variety of Christian faiths will be represented by people such as Stanley Hauerwas, C.S. Lewis, Reinhold Niebuhr, Yves Simon, and John Howard Yoder. The class will also read papal encyclicals dealing with political issues and take up particular issues such as capitalism and Christianity, as well as more general problems, such as the danger Christians face when they become involved in politics. The class will not only acquaint students with others' thinking about Christianity's relationship to politics, but will also prepare them for thinking about this topic in their own lives, as new circumstances, situations, and questions arise.

POLS 30739. Church and State in American Constitutional Law and Politics

(3-0-3) McCumbers

This course analyzes different approaches to understanding the separation of church and state, and examines how these approaches have played out in political practice and Supreme Court decisions.

POLS 30747. Patriotism and Cosmopolitanism

(3-0-3) Houser

This course will explore the perennial conflict between the cosmopolis and the patria; between adherence to a universal morality and loyalty to one's native country. Because of our common humanity, we are called to be "citizens of the world," and what does such citizenship entail? Is it possible to be both a "citizen of the world" and a citizen of a particular country? What are the sources of these various loyalties? What are the potential areas of conflict between the two? Are there limits to the loyalty of the patriot, and, if so, what form do these limits take? We will examine various manifestations of this conflict from the history of political thought. Readings will include selections from Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, the Stoics, Kant, Lincoln, and Chesterton, as well as some contemporary approaches to both patriotism and cosmopolitanism.

POLS 30748. Utopias and Dystopias

(3-0-3) Mendham

"Utopia" is a term coined by Thomas More, probably as a pun suggesting that the "good place" is "no place." Exploring utopian traditions in politics and political thought reveals a jarring contrast between the noblest human aspirations and the most devastating outcomes. Even so, some students may find grounds for hope in certain utopian traditions, since these include not only the dozens of well-intentioned schemes that quickly led to slaughter or starvation, but also some enduring and simple communities such as the Amish. Other students may come to the more sobering conclusion that dramatic social progress is impossible. But even for them, there may be much to learn from the portrayals of shocking corruption and degradation in "dystopias"—for it may still be possible that, if certain social and cultural trends are left unchecked, society can get far worse. Both utopias and dystopias tend to focus especially on two aspects of society—sexuality and economics—which, according to some, are the most in need of radical reform, while according to others, are the most dangerous when altered from their traditional patterns. Utopias and dystopias help refine our idea of what excellence and depravity in society look like, how far progress and decline are possible, and what behaviors tend toward these conditions. This course draws from political theory, history, literature, and film.

POLS 30755. Christianity and the Modern State

(3-0-3) McCumbers

In the Gospels, Jesus instructs Christians to give to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God, the things that are God's. However, what exactly it is that believers owe to Caesar and to God has been a source of both political and religious division for more than two millennia. Most of the major political thinkers in the Western tradition have commented on this issue and, in this course, we will evaluate critically the diverse solutions that have been offered to questions such as: What does it mean to have a separation of church and state? Is achieving a separation of church and state possible or desirable? What should be done when one's religious and civic duties come into conflict? The reading list for the course will include selections from thinkers such as St. Augustine, Machiavelli, Luther, Calvin, Rousseau, Jefferson, Madison, Washington, Hume, Lincoln, Tocqueville, and Rawls, as well as documents from Vatican Council II, papal encyclicals, and U.S. Supreme Court cases. In addition to learning about this issue that is fundamental to the study of politics both past and present, students will be encouraged to develop their ability to think and write critically through paper assignments and class discussion.

POLS 30805. How To Do Political Research

(3-0-3)

This is a course primarily intended for juniors or seniors who are writing, or are planning to write, a senior essay, although it is open to all majors. It helps students acquire the practical skills that are essential for completing a substantial empirical research project: posing a research question, finding out what is already known, staking out an original argument, identifying counterarguments, deciding what kind of evidence is required to figure out who is right, clarifying concepts and boundary conditions, gathering the evidence, analyzing the evidence, and interpreting the analysis. The course encourages students to consider a variety of approaches and helps them decide whether to use quantitative methods, qualitative methods, or both. Students will do independent research to compile a bibliography, gather and analyze evidence, and write an outline, but will not write a paper. Instead, they will present and defend their findings orally and visually. All students are expected to participate vigorously in evaluations of their peers' research.

POLS 33001. Sophomore Seminar

(3-0-3)

Writing seminars are devoted to a specialized topic and give students a chance to take a writing-intensive course in a seminar setting, with an emphasis on research skills and discussion.

POLS 35901. Internship

(V-0-V)

The goal of the internship program is to provide opportunities to integrate coursework with real work experience. Internships are available throughout the Notre Dame area with a variety of government offices, nonprofit agencies and NGOs. Interns work with professionals in their own area of interest, explore career options, and gain real work experience. Permission required. Does not count for the political science major.

POLS 35903. Summer Internship

(V-0-V)

Summer internships are an excellent way to explore career options, gain valuable work experience and build your résumé. Students who have secured an unpaid summer internship can apply for academic credit by either visiting the Internship Program website at politicalscience.nd.edu or by contacting the internship director. To qualify for credit, internships must have prior approval, be unpaid, be at least four weeks in duration, and provide at least 80 hours of work. Permission required.

POLS 37910. Mock Trial

(2-0-2)

Permission required. This course is designed to prepare students to participate in the American Mock Trial Association's annual mock trial tournaments. Students will learn to apply the judicial rules of civil/criminal procedure and rules of evidence to the 2005–06 national case. Participants will assume the roles of trial attorneys and witnesses for the plaintiff and defense and will develop critical analytical and communications skills in preparing and presenting the case through the direct examination and cross-examination at trial. Mock trial does not count for the political science major.

POLS 40002. Presidents and Elections

(3-0-3)

We will discuss the evolution and quality of presidential selection in the United States. Does our system select for individuals best suited for the office of the presidency? We will debate the electoral college and the two-party system. We will compare our assessment of “what it takes” to be President in 2004 with theories of presidential leadership put forth by presidency scholars such as Richard Neustadt and Stephen Skowronek. Both the controversial 2000 and 2004 elections will serve as our major case studies.

POLS 40005. The Development of American Political Institutions

(3-0-3)

The U.S. Constitution has remained essentially intact since 1787; yet contemporary political institutions and practices would hardly be recognizable to a citizen of the 19th century. Thus, the history of our political institutions is one of change and reform, as well as stability and persistence. This course will focus on the development of the U.S. political system from the late-18th to the early-20th century. Of particular interest will be the evolution of the legislative, executive, and electoral institutions.

POLS 40021. Religion and Politics: Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3)

An examination of the linkage among religious beliefs, world views, group identifications, political attitudes, and behavior, based on literature in political science, sociology, psychology, and theology. Topics include the meaning and measurement of religiosity; religious and anti-religious values embedded in American political institutions; religious world views and political philosophy; cue giving and political mobilization by religious groups, denominational traditions, partisanship, and issue positions; religious movements; social conflict; and political coalitions.

POLS 40025. Schools and Democracy

(3-0-3)

Education sits high on the public policy agenda. We are living in an era of innovations in education policy, with heated discussion surrounding issues such as vouchers, charter schools, and the No Child Left Behind Act. This course introduces students to the arguments for and against these and other educational innovations, and does so through the lens of how schools affect the civic health of the nation. Often forgotten amidst debates over school choice and standardized testing is the fact that America's schools have a civic mandate to teach young people how to be engaged citizens. Students in this course will grapple with the civic implications of America's educational landscape, and have an opportunity to propose ways to improve the civic education provided to young people.

POLS 40040. Public Policy and Bureaucracy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 140 OR POLS 140A) OR (POLS 20100 OR POLS 240 OR POLS 240A) OR (GOVT 10100 OR GOVT 140) OR (GOVT 20100 OR GOVT 240 OR GOVT 240A)

This course explores the process, substance, and efficacy of public policy making and policy implementation in the United States. We begin by asking: Why do some problems become public issues while others do not? Attention is given to how government identifies problems and formulates policies meant to address them. Then we ask, once formulated, how policies are implemented. The course will examine government's “menu” of options for policy implementation. Student research papers will focus on the evolution over time of a specific policy, examining how that policy's implementation affected its impact.

POLS 40061. Constitutional Interpretation

(3-0-3) Barber

Prerequisite: (POLS 10100 OR POLS 20100)

Americans have always debated Supreme Court opinions on specific constitutional questions involving the powers of government and the rights of individuals and minorities. The leading objective of this course is to acquaint students with the basic issues of constitutional interpretation and to show how they influence questions involving constitutional rights and powers and the scope of judicial review.

POLS 40062. Judicial Politics

(3-0-3) Colucci

This course examines the effect of the legal system on American politics, government, and society. We begin by reviewing the institutions, actors, and processes of the legal system, focusing on the institutional and individual influences on judicial decision making. In the second part of the semester, we closely analyze the political consequences of legal decisions in areas such as criminal law; race; and education, including desegregation, school finance, and school choice; abortion; the death penalty; and homosexual rights. We conclude by evaluating the extent to which courts can and should be expected to bring about social and political change.

POLS 40064. Race and the Constitution

(3-0-3)

This course will cover the decisions of the Supreme Court in the area of race relations, from the 19th-century problem of fugitive slaves to current problems involving school desegregation, affirmative action, and “private” acts of race discrimination. Class will focus not only on court cases but also on the broader constitutional and philosophical implications.

POLS 40074. Civil Liberties

(3-0-3)

Most courses in constitutional law narrate the Supreme Court's evolving positions on constitutional rights and institutions. This course starts not with the Supreme Court, but with the Federalist Papers, from which it develops a general theory of the social and economic goals or ends of constitutional government in America. It then uses this theory as a framework for assessing the Supreme Court's position on property rights, race relations, personal privacy, and the place of religion in American life. This exercise can yield results that make for lively class discussion, not only about the Court, but also about the adequacy of the Constitution itself. Grades will be based on a midterm and a final exam, with a paper option in lieu of the final.

POLS 40150. Executive Branch and Public Policy

(1-0-1) Kernan

This course will address public policy issues such as budgets, taxes, health, economic development, welfare, and crime. Taught by Joe Kernan, former mayor of South Bend, lieutenant governor, and governor of Indiana, the course will examine the political, economic, and ethical dimensions of policy development, as well as the crucial interaction between the executive and legislative branches of state government. There will be approximately 8 pages of writing and a moderate amount of reading, including handouts. Does not count for the political science major. Permission required.

POLS 40201. Diplomacy of U.S. Foreign Policy

(3-0-3)

The United States emerged from World War II in a new peacetime role as a superpower. We had to discover for ourselves how to combine diplomacy and military power in a manner consistent with our democratic principles. While the policy choices were stark in the days of the Cold War, they have become more complex in recent years. Presented by a career diplomat who headed U.S. overseas missions in four countries, the course emphasizes case studies and the practical problems that have confronted U.S. leaders from the end of World War II to the present. The issues treated will illustrate the height of tensions in the Cold War, the emergence of detente and deterrence, and the challenges of the global agenda after the end of the Cold War. The course aims to help the student understand current foreign policy issues, which will be discussed briefly in class.

POLS 40202. Iraq War

(3-0-3) Lopez

This course explores the scope and meaning of the Iraq War for U.S. society and for the dynamics of peace and security in the wider globe. The course brings a variety of disciplinary, conceptual, and policy frameworks to bear on the Iraqi experience of internal and external war. The course includes substantial reading and the opportunity for students to do policy relevant research.

POLS 40226. UN and Counterterrorism

(3-0-3)

Our attention will be focused on the scope and meaning of the work of the UN Counter-Terrorism Committee (CTC), established by the Security Council Resolution 1373 on September 28, 2001. Working under the direction of the project research director, each participant will engage in an intense investigation of one of the numerous topics or queries relevant to the study.

POLS 40261. The Politics of International Trade

(3-0-3)

If global free trade is theoretically optimal for the economy, why does free trade foster so much concern politically? Spanning events from the 1700s to the present day, this lecture course will discuss the politics of free trade in four different issue areas: (1) global trade and national security; (2) winners, losers, and the domestic politics of trade policy; (3) global trade and the development of democracy; and (4) the rise of international institutions and the decline of sovereignty. The syllabus will draw on classic readings in international relations and comparative politics, and students will be exposed to the variety of methods used by political scientists to analyze these questions: qualitative descriptions, quantitative analysis, formal models, etc. While the course does not require any background in economics, basic economic models of trade will be covered in the introductory sections. Student learning will be evaluated by examinations and short papers.

POLS 40424. German Politics

(3-0-3)

This course examines various aspects of German government and politics, including the party system, elections and voting, patterns of political participation, civil liberties, policy-making institutions, and foreign policy. The course also deals with the historical debates over Germany's past and current attempts to come to terms with it. It also focuses on Germany's constitutional order together with the political and societal problems arising out of Germany's reunification.

POLS 40472. Soviet and Post-Soviet Russia

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the political system of the Soviet Union, why it lasted, and why it collapsed. It will then examine the transition from Soviet rule to the contemporary Russian political system and the various problems of transition.

POLS 40484. Private/Public/Internet

(3-0-3)

This course is about the political and social implications of the Internet revolution. We will focus on the tension between private freedoms the Internet avails, and the broader public good it may serve. We will consider topics as wide-ranging as the digital divide, counterterrorism, public morality, and political interest. In addition, the Internet will serve as an important medium for both class exchanges and research. Because teams of students will design their own WWW pages, it would be nice if some students have Web design skills (but this is NOT a requirement).

POLS 40485. Leadership and Social Change

(3-0-3)

This course is intended to introduce seminar participants to themes in leadership. Through readings, presentations, and other media (such as film and interaction with visitors), the course aims to provide critical reflections on the nature and sources of differing types of leadership and authority, and a deeper understanding of the vocation to lead.

POLS 40539. Comparing European Societies

(3-0-3)

This course offers students a review of major patterns of difference, along with some similarities, among the 27 member states of the European Union. Despite the larger contrasts with the United States and the pressures toward convergence generated by the process of European integration, European societies remain remarkably different from one another on a number of dimensions including the overall level and form taken by employment and unemployment, systems of social protection and welfare state organization, demographic trends ranging from extremely low birth rates in most of southern Europe to significantly higher birth rates further north, the connections between urban and rural life, and the impact of education on inequalities. The role of institutions, cultures, national histories, and policies in accounting for this pattern of difference will be reviewed. The course will also examine the combinations of identities—national, regional, and European—found among citizens of Europe. Students will be encouraged to develop their expertise on at least one country while also doing comparative reading.

POLS 40580. The Political Economy of Authoritarian Rule

(3-0-3) Wright

This course examines the economic conditions that give rise to authoritarian rule, as well as the economic politics that result from it and support it.

POLS 40610. Theories of War and Peace

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the rich tradition of Christian reflection on politics and its place in human life. Central questions include (1) the relation of Christian ethics to citizenship and to the sometimes harsh necessities of political leadership; and (2) the interplay between reason and revelation, philosophy and theology in the various theoretical approaches we will study. Readings will span the patristic, medieval, and contemporary periods and will also include some documents from 20th-century Catholic social teaching.

POLS 40615. Political Philosophy and the American Founders

(3-0-3)

This course will explore the relations between developments in political philosophy in the 17th and 18th centuries and the thought and deeds of the American founders. Three founders of central importance will be considered: Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and Alexander Hamilton. They will be treated in connection with the philosophies of Locke, the Scottish moral sense school, Montesquieu, and Hume.

POLS 40632. Contemporary Liberal Theory

(3-0-3)

Ever since the publication of John Rawls's A Theory of Justice in 1971, liberal political theory has experienced a great revival and now is a flourishing enterprise. This course will take Rawls as its point of departure and survey the state of current liberal political philosophy, considering such thinkers as Ronald Dworkin, Joseph Raz, Richard Rorty, and Robert Nozick.

POLS 40635. Liberty and Culture

(3-0-3)

This course will investigate questions about whether contemporary liberal theory, with its emphasis on freedom and equality, is an adequate basis for political life. It will examine several contemporary liberal thinkers, including John Rawls, as well as several critics of liberal individualism such as Alasdair MacIntyre and Michael Sandel. The course will compare and contrast these thinkers on several dimensions, including the role of reason in moral thought, the role of religion in political life, the tensions between freedom and obligation, and the questions of the role of friendship in civic life. In addition, student papers will focus on applying liberal and communitarian approaches to specific policy areas such as education, crime, welfare, regulation of the economy, and constitutional interpretation.

POLS 40651. Politics and Literature: J.R.R. Tolkien

(3-0-3)

In this class we will read some of J.R.R. Tolkien's works, most prominently The Lord of the Rings, with attention to the light they shed on politically important problems and themes. These include the relationship between power and wisdom, justice and mercy, war and peace, leadership and citizenship, patriotism and humanism, individuality and friendship, freedom and sacrifice, fear and courage, and despair and hope. We will also read some of Tolkien's letters and essays that treat politics and philosophy, together with selections from the works of ethical and political thinkers Plato, Aristotle, Augustine, Aquinas, Hobbes, Locke, and Tocqueville. An overarching theme of the course will be the interrelation among politics, literature, culture, and education.

POLS 40800. Research Design and Methods

(3-0-3) Keane

This course is designed to provide students with the tools to accomplish original research in political science, and is appropriate for students who are preparing to write a senior thesis, who are interested in graduate work in the social sciences, whose careers will involve research, or who are simply interested in making the transition to accomplishing original research in political science. Students will learn the skills necessary for an original research project, including how to formulate an empirical question, how to gather and analyze relevant data or evidence, and how to interpret this analysis. Students will be exposed to a variety of qualitative and quantitative techniques for the analysis of political data. During this course, students will create an original research proposal for which they will compile a bibliography, gather and analyze relevant data, write a research outline, and present their research to fellow students.

POLS 40810. Quantitative Political Analysis

(3-0-3) Coppedge

Students in this course will learn to understand the most common statistical techniques used in political science and acquire the skills necessary to use these techniques and interpret their results. A mastery of these techniques is essential for understanding research on public opinion and voting behavior, electoral studies, and comparative research on the causes of democracy. For each topic, students will read works to orient them to key issues and debates. They will learn the reasoning behind the statistical analysis in these readings and create their own spreadsheet programs to execute such analyses. They will then download and clean datasets actually used in the published research, replicate selected analyses from these readings using a statistical package, and write short papers evaluating the inferences defended in the published research.

POLS 43001. Junior Writing Seminar

(3-0-3)

Writing seminars are devoted to a specialized topic and give students a chance to take a writing-intensive course in a seminar setting, with an emphasis on research skills and discussion.

POLS 43640. Justice Seminar

(3-0-3) Roos

An examination of major theories of justice, both ancient and modern. Readings include representatives of liberal theorists of right, such as John Rawls, as well as perfectionist alternatives. The course also serves as the core seminar for the philosophy, politics, and economics concentration.

POLS 46902. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

Students on the dean's list are eligible for independent study on a topic of the student's choice, under the supervision of a faculty member.

POLS 47905. Research Apprenticeship

(1-0-1)

This 1-credit course offers undergraduates a chance to learn about and participate in the research experience. After several training sessions students are assigned to a faculty member to work on an ongoing faculty research project.

POLS 53001. Senior Writing Seminar

(3-0-3)

Writing seminars are devoted to a specialized topic and give students a chance to take a writing-intensive course in a seminar setting, with an emphasis on research skills and discussion.

POLS 58901. Senior Honors Thesis

(3-0-3)

Students with a grade-point-average of 3.5 or above are encouraged to write a senior thesis. For this two-semester project, the student works on an independent research project under the supervision of a faculty member. Three credits of this two-semester project fulfill one writing seminar requirement; the other three credits count as elective credit, but not toward the major.

Department of Psychology

PSY 10000. Introductory Psychology First Year

(3-0-3) Venter

A broad coverage of the methods and findings that characterize scientific psychology, including a description of historical and recent developments in the areas of learning and motivation; perceptual, cognitive, and physiological processes; social, personality, and child development; and abnormal behavior and clinical treatment. Open to first-year students only.

PSY 13110. Honors Seminar in Psychology

(3-0-3)

A broad coverage of the methods and findings that characterize scientific psychology, including a description of historical and recent developments in the areas of learning and motivation; perceptual, cognitive, and physiological processes; social, personality, and child development; and abnormal behavior and clinical treatment. Open to first-year students only.

PSY 13181. Social Science University Seminar

(3-0-3) Day; Eberhard

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction accenting the organization and expression of arguments suggested by readings in psychology.

PSY 13625. Seminar in Counseling Theories

(3-0-3) Kelly

Prerequisite: AL 13950

This seminar-style course offers students the opportunity to explore the field of psychology.

PSY 20000. Introductory Psychology for Sophomores, Juniors, and Seniors

(3-0-3) Grundy

A broad coverage of the methods and findings that characterize scientific psychology, including a description of historical and recent developments in the areas of learning and motivation; perceptual, cognitive, and physiological processes; social, personality, and child development; and abnormal behavior and clinical treatment. Open only to sophomores, juniors, and seniors.

PSY 20001. Introductory Psychology, Personalized System of Instruction (PSI)

(3-0-3) Crowell

This course covers the same content as PSY 20001 but is taught using an individualized, self-paced method of instruction. This method is a variant of the Personalized System of Instruction (PSI) format and includes features such as self-paced learning, emphasis upon mastery of the written rather than the spoken word, frequent testing, and an option to retake unsatisfactory quizzes.

PSY 20010. Psychology: Science, Practice, and Policy

(1-0-1) Venter

This one-credit seminar introduces the department's programs and faculty research interests as well as the profession of psychology. The goal is to encourage more active reflection on how psychology can be useful, both personally and professionally; also to present the major tensions within contemporary psychology as well as its potential impact on public policies in the decade ahead.

PSY 20385. Practicum in Diversity Training

(1-0-1) Howard

This is a one-credit course designed to instruct students in the theory of diversity education while training them in the art of facilitating diversity discussions. The theoretical framework for the material in this course comes from the "theory of oppression" and the various individual, institutional, cultural, and systemic manifestations of that oppression. The application portion of this course entails the presentation of diversity programs in a required course (Concepts of Wellness) for first-year students. The structure of the Practicum in Diversity Training course includes theory instruction/training prior to the semester break, and making presentations/facilitating diversity discussions for the remaining portion of the semester.

PSY 20670. Practicum in Teaching Technology

(3-0-3) Crowell

An introduction to and experience in applying the principles and methods of behavior instruction in the classroom.

PSY 20671. Computers in Psychological Research and Education

(3-0-3) Crowell

Permission of instructor required. Possible projects include education, work productivity, decision making, database management, expert systems, knowledge retrieval, data analysis, and experiment control. Projects may require campus mainframe computer or microcomputers, particularly the Macintosh or IBM PC. Same as CAPP 30360.

PSY 20678. Fundamentals of Business Thinking

(3-0-3) Sucec

This course is designed to provide an integrated understanding of the foundational business disciplines of accounting, finance, marketing, and management, especially for CAPP majors planning a career in business. Fundamental leadership and consulting skills will also be addressed. Case analysis, coupled with a highly interactive format, will be employed to ensure practical exposure to today's business environment. Primary areas of focus will address the critical elements for success in the corporate environment, the knowledge and preparation necessary to facilitate your interviewing process, and the business fundamentals for those with entrepreneurial aspirations.

PSY 21280. Research on Families

(0-3-0)

Provides students with learning opportunities related to conducting research in the area of family relations. The instructor is conducting three large, externally funded studies, all of which involve cutting-edge research and have as their goals happier marriages, better adjusted kids, and prevention of family problems. His research utilizes a wide range of methodologies. Thus, students are provided with hands-on, extra-classroom opportunities to participate in advanced developments in theory, research and methodology in an important area of social science research and practice.

PSY 23090. Social Concerns Seminar: Children and Poverty

(1-0-1) Brandenberger

This seminar focuses on concerns that affect the youth of our nation, especially poverty and violence, and examines efforts to foster positive youth development. Immersion in New York City. Participants read Catholic social teaching focused on youth/family issues.

PSY 23091. Social Concerns Seminar: Leadership Ethics

(1-0-1)

Permission required. Apply at the Center for Social Concerns. Will not apply to overload. Cross-listed with THEO 33953. This seminar allows students to participate in an experiential opportunity designed to examine contemporary social problems. Emphasis will be placed on understanding issues/conflicts from the perspective of the various participants. Preparation and follow-up sessions are tailored to the specific opportunity.

PSY 23094. Social Concern Seminar: Understanding Mental Illness

(1-0-1)

Prerequisite: (PSY 30310 OR PSY 354 OR PSY 354A OR PSY 354B OR PSY 354C OR PSY 354D)

This course will expose students to the concepts of mental illness, available services, the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI), and the impact of stigma. It will introduce and define the different major mental illnesses: schizophrenia, bi-polar, major depression, anxiety disorders, and obsessive compulsive disorder. The genetic, biological, psychological, and environmental influences involved in the onset of mental illness will be addressed. The link between chemical imbalances, symptoms, and medications will also be covered as well as information regarding addictions/substance abuse and teen suicide. An exposure to a variety of social programs related to the treatment and support of persons with mental illness will be studied through experiential opportunities facilitated by the Center for Social Concerns.

PSY 23095. Lives in the balance: Youth, Violence, and Society

(1-0-1) Brandenberger

This seminar examines the world of youth impacted by violence. To develop an understanding of the roots and consequences of aggression and violence, a comparative study will be conducted between South Bend and Over-the-Rhine, an inner-city neighborhood in Cincinnati, Ohio. Early in the semester, participants will visit a South Bend school and meet with local leaders and organizations that work with youth. During fall break, participants will spend a week in Over-the-Rhine, visiting with youth organizations, government entities, and schools. Participants will examine the history of the neighborhood, current youth-related challenges, and solutions being implemented. Participants will analyze challenges each community faces and identify tools used in Over-the-Rhine that can be implemented to benefit youth in the South Bend community. Readings (in psychology and youth development) and written analyses will augment the direct learning experience. The course is built upon collaboration among the Center for Social Concerns, the Robinson Community Learning Center, and various University departments. Apply online: socialconcerns.nd.edu/academic/fall/fall.shtml

PSY 23271. Autism

(3-0-3) Whitman

This seminar discusses topics related to developmental disabilities, with a special emphasis on pervasive developmental disorders and autism. Issues regarding their definition, etiology, and treatment are also discussed.

PSY 23339. Marital Therapy Seminar

(3-0-3)

This didactic course covering the principles and practice of couples therapy prepares trainees for the companion practicum (61394), through which they will subsequently carry cases at the Marital Therapy and Research Clinic. Sample topics include communication, problem solving, domestic violence, parenting, and sex/intimacy.

PSY 23852. Social Concerns Seminar: L'Arche Communities

(1-0-1) Toms Smedley

This seminar centers on travel to a L'Arche community (e.g., Toronto, Canada) to share community life with developmentally challenged persons. Students draw from the philosophy of Jean Vanier, the works of theologian Henri Nouwen, and other spiritual writings to augment this participatory learning experience.

PSY 23853. Conscience in Crossfire: War

(1-0-1)

This course will explore issues central to the 2004 elections, with a focus on how citizens, in particular those who bring a faith perspective, may address social concerns in their voting and political participation. Guest speakers from campus and beyond will present multiple secular, religious, and policy perspectives.

PSY 23854. Social Concerns Seminar: NSYP Training

(1-0-1)

Training for students working in the National Youth Sports Program, sponsored by the Center for Social Concerns.

PSY 23855. Social Concerns Seminar: Take Ten

(1-0-1) Caponigro

Take Ten is a research-based violence prevention program and curriculum designed at the Robinson Community Learning Center. Volunteers work on a weekly basis with schoolchildren of all grades to teach them the skills needed to resolve conflict peacefully. Take Ten's mission is to provide youth with positive alternatives to violence and build their capacity to make more informed choices when faced with conflict. Students participating in the Take 10 seminar will serve as Take 10 volunteers during the semester (February through April with training in January), being part of a team that works at a school in the area one time per week. Additionally, the readings and reflections will allow students to focus on understanding issues of youth and violence from various perspectives. Contact Ellen Kyes at epaul@nd.edu. Approval required. Apply at Robinson Community Learning Center.

PSY 25270. Practicum in Developmental Disabilities

(3-0-3)

This practicum/seminar is the logical outgrowth of a long, informal relationship that student volunteers have had with families in the Michiana community who have autistic and other special-needs children. The practicum aspect of the course will involve students going into a family home and working in a structured program with an autistic child for, on average, three times a week and a total of six to seven hours. In addition, students will meet in class once a week for discussion on a range of topics relating to autism, including issues regarding its definition, assessment, etiology, and treatment, as well as topics regarding the impact of autism on the family, community resources, and social policy. A number of classes will feature discussions led by parents of autistic children. This class is recommended particularly for students interested in child clinical psychology, education, developmental psychology, and social work.

PSY 25275. Sign Language

(3-0-3)

The American Sign Language class is designed to introduce basic vocabulary and simple sentence structure for conversational use. A cultural view is presented to examine traditions and values. A linguistic view is presented to introduce structure, syntax, and manual alphabet. Experiential activities, receptive and expressive exercises, and fluency opportunities are incorporated into the format. This is an introductory class for students with no prior knowledge of American Sign Language.

PSY 26800. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

Directed reading is carried out under the supervision of a faculty member. A typewritten report on the reading is required.

PSY 28801. Thesis Direction

(V-0-V)

Directed reading is carried out under the supervision of a faculty member. A typewritten report on the reading is required.

PSY 30100. Experimental Psychology I: Statistics

(4-0-4) Ghassadin; Zhana; Cheng

An introduction to the analysis and evaluation of experimental data, with particular emphasis on measures of central tendency, variability, and covariability and their relationship to psychological theory and explanation.

PSY 30105. Exploratory and Graphical Data Analysis

(3-0-3)

The process by which psychological knowledge advances involves a cycle of theory development, experimental design, and hypothesis testing. But after the hypothesis test either does or doesn't reject a null hypothesis, where does the idea for the next experiment come from? Exploratory data analysis completes this research cycle by helping to form and change new theories. After the planned hypothesis testing for an experiment has finished, exploratory data analysis can look for patterns in these data that may have been missed by the original hypothesis tests. A second use of exploratory data analysis is in diagnostics for hypothesis tests. There are many reasons why a hypothesis test might fail. There are even times when a hypothesis test will reject the null for an unexpected reason. By becoming familiar with data through exploratory methods, the informed researcher can understand what went wrong (or what went right for the wrong reason). This class is recommended for advanced students who are interested in getting the most from their data.

PSY 30121. Tests and Measurement

(3-0-3)

This course is intended to facilitate students' understanding of theories and methods underlying psychological assessment. We will review such concepts as scales of measurement, the normal distribution, error, correlation, and inference, and students will come to understand their applicability within a measurement context. We will evaluate the psychometric properties of measurement tools, and as such, students will learn how to critically evaluate the usefulness and limitations of several commonly administered personality and intelligence instruments as well as alternative means of assessing psychological functioning. The socio-historical context of psychological assessment will be presented, and students will examine current ethical and cultural issues related to testing.

PSY 30160. Experimental Psychology II: Methods

(4-0-4) Braungart-Rieker; Corning

Prerequisite: (PSY 30100 OR PSY 341) OR (BA 20100 OR BAMG 20100 OR BA 230) OR (BIOS 40411 OR BIOS 411 OR BIOS 411A) OR MATH 20340
A continuation of PSY 30100, with emphasis on the design and methods of execution of psychological research. Training in writing reports in professional format is also provided.

PSY 30200. Developmental Psychology

(3-0-3) Gondoli; Braungart-Rieker

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A)

Major theories and research findings on social, emotional, and cognitive development are covered. Although emphasis is on the time from birth to early adulthood, some research on adulthood and the elderly is included. Attention is given to how different environments enhance or hinder healthy development.

PSY 30300. Psychology of Personality

(3-0-3) Kelly

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A)

Major theories and research findings on social, emotional, and cognitive development are covered. Although emphasis is on the time from birth to early adulthood, some research on adulthood and the elderly is included. Attention is given to how different environments enhance or hinder healthy development.

PSY 30310. Abnormal Psychology

(3-0-3) Smith; Monroe

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A)

Defines the concept of abnormal or maladaptive behavior; reviews the principles involved in human development and adjustment and describes the common clinical syndromes, their causes, and treatments.

PSY 30314. Introduction to Clinical Psychology

(3-0-3) Haeffel

This course provides an introduction to clinical psychology. The emphasis will be on clinical research and empirically based practices. It will cover (a) research methods for studying clinical phenomena (b) key issues and controversies in the field, and (c) specific topics such as classification and diagnosis, assessment, prevention, and intervention.

PSY 30340. Cross-Cultural Psychology

(3-0-3) Park

The general purpose of this course is to examine and learn to talk about issues of culture and race in the United States from a psychosocial perspective. Culture and race are not synonyms. So, we will be examining some of the ways that each affects the quality of our psychological functioning. The goals of this course are to learn to recognize and appreciate culture in ourselves and others; to examine the different ways that cultural and racial socialization influence behavior, to consider how culture and race relate to various psychological constructs, and to understand the ways in which racism and ethnocentrism operates in everyday life. To accomplish these goals, we will use readings, group discussions, lectures, films, and each other to expanding our awareness of how culture and race operates in our everyday life. As a student in this class, you will be encouraged to share your ideas and life experiences.

PSY 30341. Multicultural Psychology

(3-0-3)

Given the changing demographics of the U.S. population, it has become increasingly important to understand how culture influences everyday life. This course will examine the impact of culture, ethnicity, and race on human behavior within the framework of psychological theory and research. Using an ecological perspective, the multiple contexts of individual, family, community, and society will inform the study of diverse populations. In particular, there will be an emphasis on ethnic minority groups in the United States, including African Americans, American Indians, Asian Americans/Pacific Islanders, and Latino/a Americans. Within-group variations associated with culture-specific or indigenous concepts, acculturation, and minority identity development will be explored in depth.

PSY 30400. Cognitive Psychology

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A) OR (PSY 13110 OR PSY 195)

A lecture course presenting a cognitive approach to higher processes such as memory, problem solving, learning, concept formation, and language.

PSY 30430. Learning and Memory

(3-0-3) Radvansky

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A) OR (PSY 13110 OR PSY 195)

A survey of the theories and methods relating to basic processes in learning and memory from both biological and cognitive perspectives.

PSY 30440. Sensation and Perception

(3-0-3) Gibson

Includes a diverse range of topics, from sensory processes and perceptual development to sensory deprivation and visual illusions. Emphasis is on auditory and visual perception.

PSY 30500. Physiological Psychology

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A)

The course is designed to provide a broad overview of the neurobiological mechanisms underlying behavior, cognition, and affect. The course considers the functioning of the mature nervous system, how the nervous system changes across the life span and the effect these changes have on behavior, and the neurobiological foundation of various neurological and psychiatric disorders. The content of the course is covered in lecture, readings, and written assignments.

PSY 30501. Introduction to Biopsychology

(3-0-3) Wirth

Prerequisite: PSY 10000

The brain gives rise to all thoughts, feelings, learning—much of what we study in the field of psychology. In this course, you will learn the basics of how the brain works. Topics covered will include how neurons transmit signals; basic neuroanatomy (functions of different parts of the brain); the neural basis of sensory processes, such as vision, hearing, smell, and taste; movement and autonomic functions; motivations, such as hunger and thirst; emotions and stress; and cognitive functions such as learning, memory, and language. Examples and evidence will come from studies of brain-damaged human patients as well as animal neuroscience research. The evolution of the human brain and comparison to other species' brains will also be considered. Prerequisites: Introductory psychology. Some biology coursework will also be helpful, but not required.

PSY 30510. Behavioral Genetics

(3-0-3) Bergeman

Behavioral genetics is the study of genetic and environmental influence on individual differences and can be used to examine all aspects of development. The purpose of the class is threefold: first, to orient students to the basic genetic principles necessary for the understanding of hereditary influences on development; secondly, to overview genetic and environmental influence on behavioral, biomedical, and bio-behavioral attributes; and, lastly, to assist students to realize that behavioral genetics is a powerful tool for the study of environmental as well as genetic influences on development.

PSY 30600. Social Psychology

(3-0-3) Venter

Prerequisite: (PSY 10000 OR PSY 111) OR (PSY 20000 OR PSY 211) OR (PSY 20001 OR PSY 211A)

An introduction to the major theoretical orientations within the field of experimental social psychology and a survey of the research findings in selected areas such as attitude formation and change, affiliation, interpersonal attraction, and social cognition.

PSY 30640. Educational Psychology

(3-0-3) Turner

Although the goal of educational psychology is to understand and improve education in general, every classroom offers unique challenges relating to each student's individual differences. In this course, we will explore the three primary dimensions associated with the field of individual differences (i.e., cognition, affect, and motivation/volition) to determine how they collectively and uniquely contribute to a model of integrated learning. Can we design educational experiences that engage our minds, wills, and emotions? What types of classrooms encourage students to care about their subjects? These and other provocative questions will be addressed by examining a cross-section of the educational literature on motivation, cognition, and emotion.

PSY 33290. Applied Behavior Analysis

(3-0-3) Whitman

Applied behavior analysis (ABA) is a field of inquiry that investigates the factors that influence learning and human behavior. It then uses this knowledge to develop effective educational and therapeutic programs. This course will introduce the students to concepts, techniques, and methodology associated with ABA. Students will observe ABA programs being used in home settings to teach children with autism and then have the opportunity to implement such programs with this same population. The course is especially recommended for students interested in developmental psychology, clinical psychology, social work, and special education. Course requirements include completion of assigned readings, a practicum, and writing assignments.

PSY 33325. Cognitive Neuroscience

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is to examine the neural bases of human cognition as well as the main theories and research findings in this relatively new interdisciplinary field. In particular, the course will focus on principles of brain organization, perception, attention, memory, and brain imaging techniques.

PSY 33640. Developmental Disabilities

(3-0-3) Whitman

Only by prior permission of the program. Application required early in the semester prior to departure for London. Held at Rectory Paddock School. This course looks at how knowledge and understanding of developmental psychology informs professional practice in schools for pupils with severe and profound learning disabilities. The course examines how children with severe developmental disabilities come to understand their world and how teachers and other school based professionals devise programs to meet children's very individual needs. The course will be based at a school for pupils with severe learning disabilities. Each week, students will spend time with pupils and professionals in classrooms. This practical focus will be followed by a lecture. Students will have opportunities to meet with parents and families of young people with disabilities.

PSY 33641. Motivation and Academic Learning

(3-0-3) Turner

Traditional studies of learning have focused almost exclusively on cognitive, or "cold," processes. Recent research on learning illustrates how "hot" processes also influence thinking and academic learning. In this course, we focus on how social, motivational, and emotional influences interact with cognitive processes to affect academic learning. Social influences will include students' social goals in school, friendships, and family dynamics. Motivational influences are explored through the study of major theories of achievement motivation, including attribution, self-efficacy, intrinsic motivation, "possible selves," and goal theories. Emotional factors such as coping mechanisms, test anxiety, and well-being also are discussed. In addition, we explore how development affects students' social, motivational, and emotional responses to learning. Child, adolescent, and adult models are discussed, and applications to educational child settings will be an integral part of the course.

PSY 35386. Psychology Externship

(3-0-3)

This course provides an opportunity for students to gain supervised work experience in a health, school, or social service agency. The student will be expected to find a placement from among those specified by the department where they will be required to spend eight hours a week. A learning agreement will be required. The classroom component of the course is a weekly two-and-a-half-hour seminar where the issues from the externship experience and relevant research materials will be discussed.

PSY 37900. Special Studies

(V-0-V)

Independent research carried out under supervision of a faculty member. A typewritten report of a research literature or an experimental study is required.

PSY 40120. Advanced Statistics

(3-0-3)

This course extends PSY 30100 in two respects. First, additional attention is given to the logic of inferential statistics. Special focus is placed on the purpose, strengths, and limitations of hypothesis testing, especially as it is used in psychological research. Second, this course considers statistical analysis of data from more complex data structures than typically covered in PSY 30100. The goal of this part of the course is to heighten students' awareness of the variety of research questions that can be addressed through a wide range of designs and accompanying analyses. The orientation of the entire course focuses much less on the computational aspects of analyzing data than on the conceptual bases of what can be learned from different approaches to data analysis.

PSY 40121. Tests and Measurement

(3-0-3)

This course is intended to facilitate students' understanding of the theories and methods underlying psychological assessment. We will review such concepts as scales of measurement, the normal distribution, error, correlation, and inference, and students will come to understand their applicability within a measurement context. We will evaluate the psychometric properties of measurement tools, and as such, students will learn how to critically evaluate the usefulness and limitations of several commonly administered personality and intelligence instruments as well as alternative means of assessing psychological functioning. The socio-historical context of psychological assessment will be presented and students will examine current ethical and cultural issues related to testing within this context.

PSY 40282. Developmental Psychopathology

(3-0-3) Cummings

This course articulates principles for a lifespan perspective on the origins and development of individual patterns of adaption and maladaptation.

PSY 40655. Cognitive Development

(3-0-3) Day; McNeil

This course provides an introduction to the central issues in the field of cognitive development. It will cover (a) general frameworks for studying cognitive development; (b) key questions in the field; and (c) specific topics such as conceptual development, memory development, language development, and the development of mathematical understanding. The primary focus will be on cognitive development from infancy to adolescence. Students will be expected to synthesize and evaluate material presented in lectures, readings, and class discussions.

PSY 40656. Mathematical Cognition, Learning, and Development

(3-0-3) McNeil

This course explores how humans acquire an understanding of mathematics. It will cover key questions such as (a) Are infants born with an understanding of number? (b) Is the brain specialized for learning mathematics? (c) Which aspects of mathematics are most difficult for children to learn? (d) How does the environment in which we grow up influence our learning of mathematics? and (e) Does research on children's understanding of mathematics have implications for how math is taught in our schools? Students will be expected to synthesize and evaluate material presented in lectures, readings, and class discussions.

PSY 40669. Anthropology of Childhood and Education

(3-0-3) Blum

Concepts of human growth vary extraordinarily across time and space. When children become full-fledged persons, when they can reason, when or whether they should be independent from their parents, and how all this happens are variable and illuminating. Education—either formal or informal—reflects and also constitutes a society's view of childhood. This course provides a (selective) cross-cultural survey of childhood and education, looking at stages from pregnancy and infancy to late adolescence. Students will devise and conduct projects of their own.

PSY 41280. Family Research Methods

(3-0-3) Cummings

The primary goal of this course is to provide you the opportunity to receive advanced training in family research methods by working closely with faculty, professional staff, graduate students, and advanced undergraduate students. You will learn about both (a) the substantive areas of developmental psychology, family functioning, and the effects of family processing on children; and (b) conducting research and various aspects of running a major research project concerning families and children. Our class periods and time outside of class will provide direct and hands-on experience with all phases of conducting major research projects on children and families, including topics such as marital conflict, parental depression, community violence and children, applied projects for educating parents about family processes based on research, and other topics. Our goals are that by the end of the course, you will (a) have advanced understanding of the methods and approaches used in research on families and children; (b) have practical knowledge about the methods for conducting this research; (c) be knowledgeable about the major theories that form the basis of this research; (d) be knowledgeable about the findings and empirical research on family relationships and children; and (e) be able to critique the literature and be able to identify possible directions for future research.

PSY 43210. Infant/Child Development

(3-0-3) Braungart-Rieker

This course focuses on several different aspects of development during infancy and childhood. Topics addressed include theoretical and methodological approaches to studying child development; prenatal, cognitive, language, and social development; information processing; peer relations; and family life.

PSY 43217. Children and Poverty: Developmental Implications

(3-0-3) Brandenberger

Every fifth child in America faces hunger or poverty. This course examines the impacts of youth poverty and related risks from the perspectives of developmental and social psychology. Key topics include changing family patterns, violence and conflict resolution, moral development, resiliency, and educational inequalities/potentials. Central to the course will be an emphasis on children's developing cognitive perceptions of self in relation to society, and an examination of potential solutions, model programs, and relevant social policy. Readings will be drawn from a variety of sources and discussed in seminar format. Active student participation and service-learning engagement or community-based research are fundamental to the course. Students currently working with youth via student organizations or local entities are especially encouraged to apply.

PSY 43218. The Anthropology of Childhood and Education

(3-0-3)

Concepts of human growth vary extraordinarily across time and space. When children become full-fledged persons, when they can reason, when or whether they should be independent from their parents, and how all this happens are variable and illuminating. Education—either formal or informal—reflects and also constitutes a society's view of childhood. This course provides a (selective) cross-cultural survey of childhood and education, looking at stages from pregnancy and infancy to late adolescence. Students will devise and conduct projects of their own.

PSY 43220. Adolescent Development

(3-0-3) Gondoli

Prerequisites: (PSY 30160 OR PSY 342) AND (PSY 30200 OR PSY 350 OR PSY 350A OR PSY 350B OR PSY 350C OR PSY 350D)

Focuses on adolescent development within various social contexts, including family, peer groups, and the workplace. Special emphasis on normative development at the transition from childhood to adolescence.

PSY 43230. Mental Health and Aging

(3-0-3) Bergeman

The primary purpose of this course is to expose students to basic issues relevant to the mental health of the elderly, which includes an experiential learning component in the form of volunteer relationships with an older adult. In the classroom, students will be challenged to think critically about the mental health issues associated with later life and are expected to actively participate in class discussions. Topics focused on pathological aging include psychological disorders, assessment, diagnosis, and treatment; and resiliency in aging topics including physical and mental health, social support, personality, coping, and stress. Class presentations, volunteer activities, and the readings will be used to stimulate discussion and critical thinking. Students will also keep a journal for this purpose. The format of the course may include some lecture, but will rely heavily on class discussion and group activities. Students are required to participate in some type of volunteer activity over the course of the semester (i.e., a minimum of one hour/week). Students may generate their own volunteer placement or the instructor can help match you up with one.

PSY 43239. Stress and Aging

(3-0-3) Bergeman

This course is designed to focus on the psychological, environmental and biological pathways through which life stress contributes to the physical and mental health of older adults, and of the resilience mechanisms that may protect those individuals from the ill-effects of exposure to adversity.

PSY 43240. Moral Development

(3-0-3) Narvaez

Students are challenged to think about the nature of moral development, learn how to examine and compare theories in moral development, develop critical thinking, and have the opportunity to create a study of moral development. The course reflects on Catholic social teaching and its relation to moral identity and social action generally and in our own lives.

PSY 43242. Moral and Spiritual Development

(3-0-3) Narvaez

As an introductory course to the field of moral psychology, we examine major research traditions. We study the theoretical underpinnings, goals, and practices of major approaches to moral education.

PSY 43245. Character Formation: Theory, Research, and Pedagogy.

(3-0-3) Narvaez; Lapsley

Students read research, study theory, and learn pedagogical approaches in the area of character education and moral development. They apply course material in a real-world setting of their choice. Students develop creative, analytical, and practical intelligences as well as leadership skills.

PSY 43246. Self, Ego, and Identity

(3-0-3) Lapsley

This seminar examines the major theoretical traditions that help us understand what it means to be a person. Particular emphasis is placed on developmental processes and recent empirical findings.

PSY 43247. Leadership, Ethics, and Social Responsibility

(3-0-3) Brandenberger

This course examines leadership and empowerment issues from multidisciplinary perspectives, focusing on the role of the leader within organizations that promote service, social action, or other forms of social responsibility. Alternative models of leadership are explored, with attention to value and moral implications.

PSY 43248. Identity, Social Ethics, and Psychology

(3-0-3)

This course represents a unique opportunity to explore how developmental psychology and Catholic social teaching might engage in a creative dialogue to better understand the potential impact of poverty, injustice, and oppression on human development. The first stages of the course will explore why identity and personhood are central concerns to both psychology and theology, as well as how each arrives at knowledge and understanding of these themes. From this base of understanding, we will explore contemporary social concerns in which identity and personhood are salient issues: migration, aging, and race relations. Course material will include empirical and theoretical documents from both disciplines, guest speakers, and structured “immersion” experiences in which students will be invited to meet and perhaps share meals and stories with individuals affected by these issues. Finally, students will be required to choose one of these topics for a community-based learning project in the South Bend area; for example, a student may elect to conduct a “life story interview” to understand how an individual’s identity is affected by the experience of migration, racism, or ageism. For more information, please contact: mmontpet@nd.edu, vcarmona@nd.edu, or tbushlac@nd.edu.

PSY 43250. Cognitive Development

(3-0-3) Day; McNeil

Major theories in cognitive development and data relevant to those theories are reviewed. Mechanisms that might account for observed developmental changes across the life span (e.g., processing speed) are discussed.

PSY 43254. Developing Minds

(3-0-3) Day

In this course, students will learn some of the ways cognition changes with age, experience, and education. Cognition in this course is defined broadly and includes, but is not limited to, basic processes such as memory, knowledge of subjects taught in school (e.g., reading and arithmetic), and thoughts about one’s self as a learner (e.g., perceived self-competence). The age range covered is from birth to old age. Two fundamental questions addressed throughout the course are: What cognitive abilities do individuals of different ages bring to learning environments? And how do learning environments affect individuals’ thinking?

PSY 43271. Autism

(3-0-3) Whitman

This seminar discusses topics related to developmental disabilities, with a special emphasis on pervasive developmental disorders and autism. Issues regarding their definition, etiology, and treatment are also discussed.

PSY 43272. Applied Behavioral Analysis

(3-0-3) Whitman

Applied behavior analysis is a field of inquiry that investigates the factors that influence human behavior and uses this knowledge to develop effective educational and therapeutic programs. This course will introduce the students to concepts, techniques, and methodology associated with this field. Students will observe ABA programs being used in home settings to teach children with autism and then have the opportunity to design and implement such programs with this same population. The course is especially recommended for students interested in developmental psychology, clinical psychology, and special education.

PSY 43280. Children/Families in Conflict

(3-0-3) Cummings

Current trends and findings pertaining to constructive and destructive conflict within families, and the effects of conflicts within families on children, will be considered. A focus will be on interrelations between family systems (marital, parent-child, and sibling), and methodologies for studying these questions. A particular concern will be how positive and negative conflict processes in the marital relationship affects families, marriages and children. The role of interparental conflict in various family contexts (divorce, parental depression, violence and abuse, custody, physical illness or disability), and relations between family and community conflict and violence, will be examined. The positive side of family conflict will be considered, including the elements of constructive marital and family conflict, and psycho-educational strategies for promoting for constructive conflict processes within families. Theories and models for conceptualizing the effects from a family-wide perspective will also be considered. Requirements: Class attendance; active participation in class discussions and activities, including leading discussions on articles in small groups; participation and report of the results of small-scale field studies in small groups; completion of a review paper on a topic in this area; and completion of midterm and final in-class exams.

PSY 43282. Developmental Psychopathology

(3-0-3) Cummings

This course articulates principles for a lifespan perspective on the origins and development of individual patterns of adaption and maladaptation.

PSY 43290. Applied Behavioral Analysis

(3-0-3)

Applied behavior analysis is a field of inquiry that investigates the factors that influence human behavior and uses this knowledge to develop effective educational and therapeutic programs. This course will introduce the students to concepts, techniques, and methodology associated with this field. Students will observe ABA programs being used in home settings to teach children with autism and then have the opportunity to design and implement such programs with this same population. The course is especially recommended for students interested in developmental psychology, clinical psychology, and special education.

PSY 43291. Human Resiliency

(3-0-3)

As part of being alive, human beings confront routine stressors, major life challenges, and severe traumas. Individuals vary considerably in their ability to cope with such events. This course examines a range of stressors (e.g., adolescence, school and job “failure,” divorce, parenting, chronic illness and disabilities, aging, death, poverty, prejudice, child abuse, and war) and how people manage them. Particular emphasis will be placed on examining why some individuals develop serious problems such as depression when challenged and others are resilient, that is, able to meet life’s challenges and grow stronger. Theoretical (e.g., biological, psychoanalytic, humanistic, existential and behavioral) perspectives on resiliency are evaluated along with relevant empirical research. Fictional and nonfictional examples of resilient individuals are examined. An important focus of the course is on thinking about how resiliency can be fostered through parenting, education, therapy, and social policy. Specific techniques for managing routine and exceptional stressors will be discussed. The course is especially recommended for students interested in clinical, counseling, educational, and developmental psychology.

PSY 43293. Violence and Children/Families

(3-0-3) Cummings

Current trends and findings pertaining to constructive and destructive conflict within families, and the effects of conflicts within families on children, will be considered. A focus will be on interrelations between family systems (marital, parent-child, and sibling), and methodologies for studying these questions. A particular concern will be how positive and negative conflict processes in the marital relationship affects families, marriages and children. The role of interparental conflict in various family contexts (divorce, parental depression, violence and abuse, custody, physical illness or disability), and relations between family and community conflict and violence, will be examined. The positive side of family conflict will be considered, including the elements of constructive marital and family conflict, and psycho-educational strategies for promoting for constructive conflict processes within families. Theories and models for conceptualizing the effects from a family-wide perspective will also be considered. Requirements: Class attendance; active participation in class discussions and activities, including leading discussions on articles in small groups; participation and report of the results of small-scale field studies in small groups; completion of a review paper on a topic in this area; and completion of midterm and final in-class exams.

PSY 43303. Developmental Psychopathology and Families

(3-0-3) Cummings

This course articulates principles for a life-span perspective on the origins and development of individual patterns of adaptation and maladaptation. (Spring)

PSY 43311. Theories of Psychotherapy

(3-0-3) Kelly

Students will be introduced to the key research methods, empirical findings, and theories from the clinical/counseling psychology literature. Prospects for developing and testing new theories of psychotherapy will be discussed. Students will be encouraged to begin forming concepts for research projects and developing their own integrated theoretical approaches to treating clients.

PSY 43315. Seminar in Counseling Theories

(3-0-3) Kelly

This seminar will address the following questions: Does counseling work? If so, how does counseling help people reduce their symptoms of depression, anxiety, and other types of problems? We will discuss several of the key traditional and nontraditional theories of counseling and show how these theories are applied to clients' problems.

PSY 43316. Professional Psychology: Methods and Practice

(3-0-3) Kelly; Corning

Students will be introduced to the key research methods, empirical findings, and theories from the clinical/counseling psychology literature. Prospects for developing and testing new theories of psychotherapy will be discussed. Students will be encouraged to begin forming concepts for research projects and developing their own integrated theoretical approaches to treating clients.

PSY 43318. Stress, Disorder, and Disease

(3-0-3) Monroe

There is considerable scientific interest in the concept of stress and its implications for health and well-being. This seminar will cover (1) original articles on the concepts and definitions of stress; (2) original articles on methods for assessing life stress; and (3) the animal and human research literatures on stress effects on biological and psychological functioning. Particular attention will be paid to the implications of these ideas and literatures for understanding psychological disorders, especially major depression, as well as physical illnesses.

PSY 43330. Interpersonal Communication Skills

(3-0-3) Corning

The Human Relations Training Program provides instruction and experience in developing effective communication and basic helping skills. Attending, empathy, respect, immediacy, self-disclosure, and self-exploration are studied and practiced in small-group format. Open only to juniors and seniors.

PSY 43331. Introduction to Counseling Skills

(3-0-3)

This course will examine the elements of professional helping relationships and various counseling process models. Students will have an opportunity to study and practice basic counseling techniques used in developing rapport and a therapeutic relationship and examine research relevant to clinical practice. Issues involving professional responsibility, development, and ethics will be discussed.

PSY 43340. Cross-Cultural Psychology

(3-0-3) Park

The general purpose of this course is to examine and learn to talk about issues of culture and race in the United States from a psychosocial perspective. Culture and race are not synonyms. So, we will be examining some of the ways that each affects the quality of our psychological functioning. The goals of this course are to learn to recognize and appreciate culture in ourselves and others; to examine the different ways that cultural and racial socialization influence behavior, to consider how culture and race relate to various psychological constructs, and to understand the ways in which racism and ethnocentrism operates in everyday life. To accomplish these goals, we will use readings, group discussions, lectures, films, and each other to expanding our awareness of how culture and race operates in our everyday life. As a student in this class, you will be encouraged to share your ideas and life experiences.

PSY 43341. Moral Development and Character Education

(3-0-3) Narvaez

We review research and theory on moral identity development and its implications for character development and education. Students will select an aspect of moral character to study, reporting on their findings and designing a research study.

PSY 43343. Psychosocial Perspectives on Asian Americans

(3-0-3) Park

This course examines major psychological topics relevant to Asian Americans. Broad areas to be covered include Asian American personality, identity, and mental health as well as socio-cultural influences that shape personality and mental health. Specific topics include cultural values and behavioral norms, the acculturation process, ethnic identity development, family processes, stressors and social support systems within Asian communities, psychopathology, academic achievement, and culturally competent mental health treatment and service delivery.

PSY 43344. Immigrant Families and Mental Health

(3-0-3)

This course examines major psychological topics relevant to immigrant families in the United States and factors influencing their mental health. Given that one out of five youths in the American public school system is a child of immigrants, it is critical to study this rapidly growing population especially for those interested in working with youths and their families. Broad areas to be covered include cultural adaptation processes (e.g., acculturation), biculturalism, identity development, family processes, academic achievement, and mental health as well as implications for culturally competent mental health treatment and service delivery.

PSY 43348. Psychology of Race: Examining Racial and Ethnic Identity Development

(3-0-3) Pope-Davis

The purpose of this course is to examine the psychological aspects of racial and ethnic identity development in the United States. This course will look at the general ideas of identity development from a psychological basis as well as the personal identities of American groups. The main course objectives are: to increase students' cultural awareness of their own and others' racial and ethnic identities; to develop relevant knowledge of about identity constructs in understanding different populations; and to develop critical thinking skills in studying and evaluating research on the role of racial and ethnic identity development in psychological processes and human behavior.

PSY 43360. Health Psychology

(3-0-3) Merluzzi

Because behavior plays a significant role in people's health, psychology has emerged as an important contributor to the process of coping with disease, disease prevention, and health enhancement. This course is designed to be an overview of health psychology and behavioral medicine. Topics will include psychology and medicine, health psychology models, stress and health, adaptation to illness, psychological aspects of cancer, pain, coronary artery disease, rehabilitation, infectious disease, health promotion and disease prevention, and professional opportunities in health psychology. In addition, health care professionals in the community who are working in areas to be covered in the course will be making presentations to the class. There will be two exams that will cover reading and lecture material. In addition, there will be two short papers that will help integrate the readings, lectures, and information provided by the speakers. Finally, there will be a lengthy paper that will consist of a summary review and critique of research in a specific area of health psychology.

PSY 43367. Coaching Youth Sports

(3-0-3) Howard

This course is ideal for anyone who might serve as a coach at any time in the future. Topics include coaching strategies, substitution strategies, designing practices, dealing with parents, and the like. Conducting actual practice sessions and discussing relevant movies are scheduled throughout the course. There are no tests as a final portfolio is the sole grading method. Books include Phil Jackson's Sacred Hoops and Andy Hill and John Wooden's Be Quick But Don't Hurry.

PSY 43368. Psychology of Leadership

(3-0-3) Howard

This course will probe the ways to become a leader. Students will read material on great leaders: Jesus, Ghandi, Churchill, Joan of Arc, Henry Ford, John Adams, Rachel Carson, and the like. Students will select the leader they wish to study intensively. Secondly, psychological analyses of leadership theory will be recommended by the instructor. Lastly, students will read actively in the newspaper/magazine of their choice (e.g., New York Times, Newsweek). Selected articles will serve as the basis of class discussions (led by the student who suggested the article) designed to plot a course of action that the student will begin to undertake in the domain targeted in the article (e.g., Bills before Congress, environmental degradation, violations of civil rights). Grading will be based upon two long papers (on a leader and each student's own course of action, class participation, and a final exam. Class enrollment will be limited to 15 or 16 students.

PSY 43390. Applied Behavioral Analysis

(3-0-3) Whitman

Applied behavior analysis is a field of inquiry that investigates the factors that influence human behavior and uses this knowledge to develop effective educational and therapeutic programs. This course will introduce the students to concepts, techniques, and methodology associated with this field. Students will observe ABA programs being used in home settings to teach children with autism and then have the opportunity to design and implement such programs with this same population. The course is especially recommended for students interested in developmental psychology, clinical psychology, and special education.

PSY 43409. Advanced Topics in Cognitive Psychology

(3-0-3)

This is a survey-level course that will cover a diversity of topics in cognition including attention, perception, memory, language and categorization, focusing on uncovering common themes and underlying frameworks. Intended for advanced undergraduates and graduate students from across psychology and other related disciplines.

PSY 43410. Seminar in Spatial Cognition

(3-0-3) Carlson

Have you ever gotten lost trying to navigate through a new environment or had difficulty in following directions? Can you easily give directions when someone asks you how to get somewhere? If you are following a map, do you turn it as you turn, or hold it in a fixed orientation? All of these processes involve relating your own spatial location to objects and landmarks in the external world. This seminar in spatial cognition will examine how we accomplish this, focusing on such issues as following directions, giving directions, using maps, mentally representing environments, and way finding.

PSY 43451. Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder

(3-0-3) Gibson

Attention deficit disorder (also known as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder) is a diagnosis applied to children and adults who have experienced a handicap in their school, home, work, and/or social settings due to abnormal levels of distractibility, impulsivity, and/or hyperactivity. According to epidemiological data, approximately 4 percent to 6 percent of the U.S. population has ADD, which makes it one of the most prevalent psychological disorders in contemporary society. Furthermore, it is currently believed that 66 percent of those diagnosed with ADD as children will continue to exhibit symptoms as adults. Over the past decade, there has been heated debate over both the cause and treatment of ADD. For instance, ADD has been attributed to a variety of causes including minor brain damage, poor diet, and poor parenting. Likewise, a variety of different treatment options have been recommended including medication, behavior therapy, and cognitive therapy; and recently, there has been concern expressed by the FDA that several medications used to treat ADD might be harmful to children. This seminar will provide a comprehensive survey of current research into the cause and treatment of ADD. In addition, the seminar will focus on the effects of this disorder from the perspective of both afflicted individuals and their families as well.

PSY 43452. Attentional Capture

(3-0-3)

The notion that certain mental or physical events can capture attention has been one of the most enduring topics in the study of attention owing to the importance of understanding how goal-directed and stimulus-driven processes interact in perception and cognition. Despite the clear theoretical and applied importance of attentional capture, a broad survey of this field suggests that the term "capture" means different things to different researchers. This seminar will provide a sampling of the diversity of approaches, domains, and theoretical perspectives that currently exist in the study of the attentional capture. Together, these contributions should help evaluate the degree to which attentional capture represents a unitary construct that reflects fundamental mechanisms of the mind.

PSY 43455. Seminar: Psycholinguistics

(3-0-3) Eberhard

An interdisciplinary seminar with emphasis upon student participation covering topics such as linguistics, memory, and perception for language stimuli, child language, bilingualism, and social psychology of language.

PSY 43458. Doing Things with Words

(3-0-3)

Flattery, cheating, self-expression, prayer, superiority, solidarity, distancing, and play: all these and many more things may be done with language. This course looks at some of the ways humans do things with words. Topics include religious language; silence; politeness and sincerity; truth, deception, lying, and cheating; linguistic variety, identity, and stereotypes; moral evaluations made of language; and language used for power and solidarity.

PSY 43465. Enhancing the Mind Across the Lifespan

(3-0-3) Gibson

In this interactive, discussion- and exploration-based class students will become immersed in the science and potential issues and applications of neuro-plasticity and how it impacts lifestyle as a method of building cognitive endurance for the life journey we each face.

PSY 43495. Deciding to be Green

(3-0-3) Carlson

The primary goal of the course is to examine how descriptions of environmental issues and our understanding of these issues impacts our perception of their importance and our decisions about appropriate actions. Research in cognitive psychology has shown that the way in which a problem is framed and the way in which information central to the problem links up to pre-existing concepts systematically impacts the perception of the problem and consequently decisions that are made about possible outcomes or solutions. Thus, focusing on the cognition underlying our relationship to the environment is a critically important component of any initiative that tries to transform understanding into action, a stated goal of this year's Presidential Forum "Charting a Sustainable Energy Future."

PSY 43510. Behavioral Genetics

(3-0-3) Bergeman

An introduction to the principles necessary to understand genetic and environmental influences on development, with an overview of the methods and research.

PSY 43511. Behavioral Neurobiology

(3-0-3)

This class will examine the effects of neurological (e.g., focal lesions and degenerative disease) and psychiatric (e.g., schizophrenia) disorders on affect and cognition. Topics considered include disorders of memory, attention, and emotion regulation. The format of the course will be primarily small group presentations and discussions. Reading will be taken from primary empirical sources, review articles, and book chapters. Requirements include short papers, class presentations, a term paper, and final exam.

PSY 43520. Cognitive/Affective Neuropsychology

(3-0-3)

This course will survey the biological bases of cognition and emotion. The primary objective of this course will be to understand how human cognitive and affective behaviors are mediated in cortical and subcortical foci in the brain. Particular attention will be paid to cognitive and affective deficits that result from brain trauma and disease.

PSY 43526. Developmental Cognitive Neuroscience

(3-0-3)

This class will focus on both the cognitive and neural aspects of cognition. It will examine brain organization and brain development, with emphasis on attention, memory, emotion and language processes. Brain plasticity, genetic and environmental influences, abnormal brain development and developmental syndromes (e.g., ADHD, Autism) will also be addressed.

PSY 43531. Psychology and Medicine

(3-0-3) Kolberg

This course has two basic objectives. First, it examines from a lifespan and psychobiological perspective the factors that place individuals at different stages of life at risk for illness and assist them in maintaining their health. In addition, it addresses a variety of challenging psychological and social issues that physicians and other healthcare professionals must face in the practice of medicine. The course covers a range of topics dealing with health issues related to different stages of human development (childhood, adolescence, and adulthood), disabled populations, culture and gender, stress, physician-patient interactions, death and dying, professional ethics, and social policies relating to health care. The course is primarily intended for students intending to enter medical school. Most classes will involve brief formal presentations by the instructors and invited guests, followed by discussion of assigned readings pertinent to the day's topic. In addition, students will be exposed, via a limited practicum, to a variety of medical settings.

PSY 43532. Stress: Medicine and Management

(3-0-3)

This course is concerned with stress, its effect, and coping mechanisms from a biological as well as a psychological viewpoint. (1) We explore the nature of stress itself. What exactly is stress? How do issues of control and personality enter into the perception of stress? Can we have physiological stress without the perception of stress? We examine some special types of stress such as long-term or serious illness and work-related stress. (2) We cover the stress response and the effect of this response on the level of the whole organism (fatigue, irritability, insomnia, cognitive difficulties, etc.). (3) We examine the link between stress and disease on the level of organ systems such as the cardiovascular system, the immune system, the gastrointestinal system, and the endocrine system. (4) We examine the biological and psychological basis of common coping mechanisms such as cognitive therapy, social support, drug therapy (self-prescribed and physician-prescribed), alcohol, exercise, meditation, and sleep. The major aim is to understand the mechanism, evaluate the efficacy in alleviating the stress response, and any potentially harmful effects. (5) We examine theory and practices of mobilizing support in stressful circumstances. Class performance will be based on two examinations, one term paper (approximately 15–20 pages), and classroom participation. Students also will keep a stress and health diary.

PSY 43533. Topics in the Neurophysiology of Stress

(3-0-3) Wirth

Prerequisite: PSY 10000 OR PSY 20000 OR PSY 20001

In this seminar, you will learn about one of the major systems involved in the body's response to stress: the system that controls production of the stress hormone cortisol. In addition to the physiology of the stress response, this course will address what kinds of events provoke a stress response; when the stress response is adaptive vs. maladaptive; and how stress hormones affect the brain, and thus influence learning and memory. Additional topics covered may include: the effects of chronic stress; stress and reproduction; effects of early experience on stress responsiveness; stress and psychopathology; the role of neurosteroids (a class of hormones that act on neurons) in stress. Readings will include review articles and original research reports; one goal of this course will be for you to become proficient at reading and understanding scientific literature. Prerequisites: Introductory psychology. Introductory biology recommended. Physiological psychology or concurrent enrollment in Introduction to Biopsychology recommended.

PSY 43535. Cultural Aspects of Clinical Medicine

(4-0-4) Wolosin

This course focuses on social science approaches to sickness and healing. The medical encounter is examined from anthropological perspectives. The course emphasizes the difficulties traditional biomedicine has in addressing patients' expectations for care. Students serve an internship as patient ombudsman in a local hospital emergency room four hours per week. Students MUST have access to transportation to participate in the ER internships. Students are required to sign a waiver, present evidence of immunizations, and receive a TB skin test.

PSY 43536. Philosophy and Psychiatry

(3-0-3)

A course dealing with (1) the intellectual history of psychiatry from the time of Freud and Kraepelin to the present; (2) the social history of the care of the mentally ill since World War II; and (3) the interpretation and critique of Freud and psychiatry.

PSY 43571. Psychology of Coaching

(3-0-3) Howard

This course is ideal for anyone who might serve as a coach at any time in the future. Topics include coaching strategies, substitution strategies, designing practices, dealing with parents, and the like. Conducting actual practice sessions and discussing relevant movies are scheduled throughout the course. There are no tests as a final portfolio is the sole grading method. Books include Phil Jackson's Sacred Hoops and Andy Hill and John Wooden's Be Quick but Don't Hurry.

PSY 43610. Seminar in Spatial Cognition

(3-0-3) Carlson

Have you ever gotten lost trying to navigate through a new environment or had difficulty in following directions? Can you easily give directions when someone asks you how to get somewhere? If you are following a map, do you turn it as you turn, or hold it in a fixed orientation? All of these processes involve relating your own spatial location to objects and landmarks in the external world. This seminar in spatial cognition will examine how we accomplish this, focusing on such issues as following directions, giving directions, using maps, mentally representing environments, and way finding.

PSY 43625. Self: A Philosophical and Psychological Perspective

(3-0-3) Venter

Who are you? What are you? What is the self? Does it even exist in reality in an absolute sense? What is the nature of social reality and our relationship with it? Social psychology provides some insights into these questions and issues and can inform our thinking and understanding of our selves and our world. Although the broader theoretical and philosophical context for this seminar is social psychological, we will have the opportunity to read about these topics from a variety of sources—psychological, philosophical, and theological.

PSY 43640. Educational Psychology

(3-0-3) Turner

Educational Psychology examines questions about development, learning and achievement in schools. In this course we will explore fundamental questions such as (a) What is intelligence? Is it fixed or changeable? What are the implications of conceptions of intelligence for achievement? (b) How does learning occur? What are the implications of different theories of learning? Is there a “correct” theory of learning? Does learning differ in different subject areas? (c) What motivates student learning? Can instruction be “motivational”? (d) What is “good” instruction? How do theories of learning relate to instructional practices? (e) How do aspects of school context, such as interaction with peers and teachers and school culture, influence learning, motivation, and achievement?

PSY 43641. Motivation and Academic Learning

(3-0-3) Turner

Traditional studies of learning have focused almost exclusively on cognitive, or “cold,” processes. Recent research on learning illustrates how “hot” processes also influence thinking and academic learning. In this course, we focus on how social, motivational, and emotional influences interact with cognitive processes to affect academic learning. Social influences will include students’ social goals in school, friendships, and family dynamics. Motivational influences are explored through the study of major theories of achievement motivation, including attribution, self-efficacy, intrinsic motivation, “possible selves,” and goal theories. Emotional factors such as coping mechanisms, test anxiety, and well-being also are discussed. In addition, we explore how development affects students’ social, motivational, and emotional responses to learning. Child, adolescent, and adult models are discussed, and applications to educational child settings will be an integral part of the course.

PSY 43690. History and Systems of Psychology

(3-0-3)

Traces the development of contemporary psychology from its early philosophical origins to the present. An emphasis is placed on the era of modern psychology (mid-1800s to the present) with considerable discussion of current issues and movements.

PSY 43696. Is There an Environmental Crisis?

(3-0-3) Howard

Whether one believes there is an environmental crisis or not, we should all be aware of the changes in our world (growing world populations, increased burning of hydrocarbons, etc.) that are hypothesized to produce threats to our ecosystems. Understanding why human actions might be producing global changes is a complex task. This course will concentrate on the roles that various disciplines

(e.g., economics, materials science, biology, psychology, theology) might play in understanding and (perhaps) alleviating human-produced environmental changes.

PSY 43702. Concepts in Visual Neuroscience

(3-0-3)

Cross-listed with PSY 43702. The goal is to familiarize students with concepts, ideas, and hypotheses in neuroscience with a focus on vision. Topics include neuron models, processing image structure (retina-primary visual cortex), object recognition (V2-IT-prefrontal cortex), motion detection, and attention. This seminar will provide an overview of contemporary theories, concepts, and models in neuroscience, with an emphasis on vision. It will outline the different approaches that are used to understand neural information processing in the visual system. Some time will be spent discussing contemporary trends in neuroscience, along with the contributions from and influences of multiple relevant disciplines, including psychology, biology, and artificial intelligence. A central argument will be that there is still no coherent framework or single concept of neural processing, and the seminar will use this argument as a motivation to ask new questions, model an innovative network structure, or maybe just follow one of the existing approaches. We will occasionally examine studies that have successfully implemented some of the models into analog electronic circuits, allowing so for their real-time emulation. The topics will be introduced by lectures. A manuscript will be handed out containing graphs and texts from various introductory books. Students are asked to give presentations on classic or recent research papers based on the presented material.

PSY 43721. Behavioral Pediatrics

(3-0-3)

This course is directed toward premedical students interested in pediatric medicine and psychology majors interested in health psychology. It exposes areas of psychology, biology, and medicine pertinent to children. Specific emphasis is placed on studying infants who are at risk for developmental problems.

PSY 45386. Psychology Externship

(3-0-3)

This course provides an opportunity for students to gain supervised work experience in a health, school, or social service agency. The student will be expected to find a placement from among those specified by the department where they will be required to spend eight hours a week. A learning agreement will be required. The classroom component of the course is a weekly two-and-a-half hour seminar where the issues from the externship experience and relevant research materials will be discussed.

PSY 45853. Addiction, Science, and Values

(3-0-3)

Students will be introduced to topics in the ethics of care for the indigent; to alternative therapies for recovery and maintenance; and to current brain models of addiction. They will be placed as volunteers (for 14 weeks) with institutions serving indigent recovering addicts in St. Joseph and Elkhart counties.

PSY 47900. Special Studies: Reading and Research

(V-0-V)

Independent research carried out under supervision of a faculty member. A typewritten report of a research literature or an experimental study is required.

PSY 48800. Senior Honors Thesis

(3-0-3) Merluzzi

These two seminars assist the senior major to propose, execute, and write an honors thesis. The first semester is devoted to the development and presentation of the proposal, and the second to its execution, write-up, and subsequent presentation.

Department of Sociology

SOC 10002. Understanding Societies

(3-0-3) Collett; Hachen; C. Smith

What does it mean that humans are social creatures, and how does participation in social life shape people's personal life experiences and outcomes? How and why do people together create and sustain cultures, groups, institutions, and organizations? And how do these form people's relationships, actions, and experiences? This course introduces students to the discipline of sociology as a way to better understand how personal behaviors and life outcomes are profoundly influenced by a variety of social structures, and how their actions in turn maintain and can transform those social structures. Course readings and discussions will focus on the experience of community in modern society, young adult religious life, marriage and family, inequality and poverty, civil rights, and disruptive social movements fighting for social structural change—particularly in the United States. Along the way we will learn a bit about social research methods and philosophy of social science, both of which will help students be smarter thinkers and consumers of social science research findings. Students will, as a result of taking this course, better understand both the society and world in which they live and the character and outcomes of their own personal lives.

SOC 10033. Introduction to Social Problems

(3-0-3) Brenneman

Today's society is beset by many serious social problems—for example, crime and deviance, drug abuse and addiction, domestic violence, hunger and poverty, and racial/ethnic discrimination. How do we think about these problems in ways that lead to helpful solutions? In what ways does one's own social background and role in society affect one's views of these problems? In this course, students will learn to take a sociological perspective, not only in examining the causes, consequences, and solutions to some of society's most troubling social problems, but also in taking a critical look at their own perceptions of the problems.

SOC 10722. Introduction to Social Psychology

(3-0-3) Collett; Thomas

The overarching goal of this class is to provide students with a working knowledge of social psychology and to stimulate an interest in ourselves, the world around us, and the connections between the two. This is a course about how we become who we are—how our personalities (or our selves) are shaped by others, the groups we belong to, the social structures around us, and our interactions as social beings. However, interaction is a process between entities, a two-way street. Hence, it is not only about how the world around us shapes who we are, but also a course about how we shape the groups that we belong to and the social structures around us. May not take SOC 20722—courses overlap.

SOC 12002. Understanding Societies Tutorial

(0-0-0)

This tutorial must be taken as a corequisite to SOC 10002, Understanding Societies.

SOC 13095. Sociology Honors Seminar

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: ALHN 13950 OR ALHN 195

Today's consumer societies offer the promises of affluence, of convenience, of "the good life." Yet it is by no means clear that the massive technological advances and material gains in advanced industrial societies have contributed to a better way of life—many would say increased meaninglessness is the actual result. This course explores the ways in which consumption culture enhances the good life or hinders it through "the goods life."

SOC 13181. Social Science University Seminar

(3-0-3) Sikkink; Spillman; Berends; Christiano; Fishman; Hachen; Halton;

An introduction to the seminar method of instruction accenting the organization and expression of arguments suggested by readings in sociology. Each of the seminars treats a particular sociological topic, such as family life, social problems, the urban crisis, poverty, etc.

SOC 20002. Understanding Societies

(3-0-3) Collett; Hachen; C. Smith

What does it mean that humans are social creatures, and how does participation in social life shape people's personal life experiences and outcomes? How and why do people together create and sustain cultures, groups, institutions, and organizations? And how do these form people's relationships, actions, and experiences? This course introduces students to the discipline of sociology as a way to better understand how personal behaviors and life outcomes are profoundly influenced by a variety of social structures, and how their actions in turn maintain and can transform those social structures. Course readings and discussions will focus on the experience of community in modern society, young adult religious life, marriage and family, inequality and poverty, civil rights, and disruptive social movements fighting for social structural change—particularly in the United States. Along the way we will learn a bit about social research methods and philosophy of social science, both of which will help students be smarter thinkers and consumers of social science research findings. Students will, as a result of taking this course, better understand both the society and world in which they live and the character and outcomes of their own personal lives.

SOC 20033. Introduction to Social Problems

(3-0-3) Brenneman

Today's society is beset by many serious social problems—for example, crime and deviance, drug abuse and addiction, domestic violence, hunger and poverty, and racial/ethnic discrimination. How do we think about these problems in ways that lead to helpful solutions? In what ways does one's own social background and role in society affect one's views of these problems? In this course, students will learn to take a sociological perspective, not only in examining the causes, consequences, and solutions to some of society's most troubling social problems, but also in taking a critical look at their own perceptions of the problems.

SOC 20100. Introduction to Cultural Sociology

(3-0-3) Lizardo

This class is an introduction to the way that sociologists study the cultural dimensions of the social world. Culture is here defined as all objects, ideas, and practices that people attach some meaning to. We will survey contemporary sociological approaches to analyzing culture, along the way tracing and discussing the way that culture and meanings are produced, disseminated, interpreted, and used by social actors. We will investigate how cultural objects are produced in mass media industries; how social boundaries and social hierarchies (such as those based on gender, race, and class) are created through the consolidation of cultural categories; and how social practices related to the consumption of cultural objects have become a central facet of life in modern societies.

SOC 20228. Social Inequality and American Education

(3-0-3) Carbonaro

Many have claimed that the American educational system is the "great equalizer among men." In other words, the educational system gives everyone a chance to prosper in American society regardless of social origins. In this course, we will explore the validity of this claim. Do schools help make American society more equal by reducing the importance of class, race, and gender as sources of inequality, or do schools simply reinforce existing inequalities and reproduce pre-existing social relations? Topics covered in the course include unequal resources among schools, sorting practices of students within schools, parents' role in determining student outcomes, the role of schooling in determining labor market outcomes for individuals, and the use of educational programs as a remedy for poverty.

SOC 20260. Religion and Schooling in American Society

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: ESS 27999

Does religion help children do well in school? Focused on primary and secondary schooling in the United States, this course investigates several academic and policy questions on the relationship between religion and schooling: How does religion affect academic outcomes for children? How do contemporary religious Americans view public schools? And how does religion shape Americans' views on curricular and other school policy issues? What is the role of religion in the schooling choices of families in the United States? Do Catholic or other religious schools improve academic outcomes for children? Why, or why not? Through lectures, discussion of key works, and a research paper, the course advances theory and evidence regarding the relationship of religion and academic achievement, the role of religion in politics of education, and the relationship of religion and democratic education.

SOC 20342. Marriage and the Family

(3-0-3) J. Sobolewski

The family is often agreed to be the primary and most fundamental of social institutions. It is within this institution that early socialization and care giving usually take place, and therefore, many of our ideas about the world are closely tied to our families. This course will give students the opportunity to learn about the diverse forms the family has taken over time and across different groups. This knowledge will be useful in examining the ongoing debate about the place of the family in social life. By taking a sociological approach to learning about the family and by gaining knowledge about national family trends and patterns in the United States, this course will give students the theoretical and empirical tools for understanding how family life is linked to the social structure; to economic, cultural, and historical events and transitions; and to societal factors such as race, class, and gender.

SOC 20479. Introduction to Latinos in American Society

(3-0-3) Cardenas

This course will examine the sociology of the Latino experience in the United States, including the historical, cultural, and political foundations of Latino life. We will approach these topics comparatively; thus attention will be given to the various experiences of a multiplicity of Latino groups in the United States.

SOC 20501. Globalization and Social Movements

(3-0-3) J. Smith

In what ways does an increasingly global political, economic, and cultural system impact our lives? Has globalization led to increased peace and justice, or to new types of conflict and inequality? How has globalization affected national and transnational social movements? This course examines the ways in which changes in the global economic and political system affect politics within countries. First, we will briefly review the broader research literature on the sociology of social movements. Readings will cover a range of different movements, such as those working to protect the environment, advocating for economic justice, addressing social problems such as extreme poverty and public health, and fighting for the rights of women and working people. Then, we will look at how globalization has affected social movements. This course is particularly applicable to students majoring in business, political science, economics, peace studies, anthropology, sociology, and any foreign language. Students planning to study abroad may also be interested.

SOC 20502. Today's Organizations

(3-0-3) Gunty; Hachen

Throughout our lives, we participate in and interact with many different types of organizations: businesses, schools, government agencies, religious institutions, and hospitals. This course uses a variety of metaphors to understand organizations better—as, for example, organisms, cultures, political systems, and machines. The objectives of this course include (1) exploring different ways of looking at and thinking about organizations, (2) developing your skill at “reading” real organizational situations, and (3) imagining alternative ways of organizing social life. Throughout the course, active learning is stimulated by group discussions of cases (including video cases) and using cooperative learning groups. Whether you plan to go into business, teaching, medicine, or any other career embedded in complex organizations, this course provides the opportunity to become a more intelligent participant in the settings of today's organizations.

SOC 20533. Responding to World Crisis

(3-0-3) Valenzuela

This course focuses on current issues in international affairs and what the U.S. policy response to them should be. The participants will be divided into groups specializing events and issues in each continent in the world, with an additional group focusing on the international economy. Each session of the seminar will hear the reports prepared by students in two of such (i.e., the Africa and the Asia groups, or the Europe and World Issues groups). The reports must be individually written, with the crisp style of policy briefs, on different countries or issues, and must include an assessment of the origins and nature of the problem or problems at hand, as well as recommendations regarding what the United States should do. The required reading for the seminar will be the New York Times (the printed version) on a daily basis. Students may go to Internet news services of the New York Times or other sources such as the Economist for additional background information on the situation they wish to write about.

SOC 20722. Introduction to Social Psychology

(3-0-3) Collett; Thomas

The overarching goal of this class is to provide students with a working knowledge of social psychology and to stimulate an interest in ourselves, the world around us, and the connections between the two. This is a course about how we become who we are—how our personalities (or our selves) are shaped by others, the groups we belong to, the social structures around us, and our interactions as social beings. However, interaction is a process between entities, a two-way street. Hence, it is not only about how the world around us shapes who we are, but also a course about how we shape the groups that we belong to and the social structures around us. May not take SOC 10722—courses overlap.

SOC 20732. Introduction to Criminology

(3-0-3) Pressler

As in introduction to the topic of criminology, this course examines crime as a social problem within American society. Particular attention is given to the nature and function of law in society, theoretical perspectives on crime, victimology, sources of crime data, the social meaning of criminological data, and the various societal responses to crime. These topics are addressed through specialized readings, discussion, and analysis.

SOC 20810. Gender Roles and Violence

(3-0-3) Gunty

Much of the violence in contemporary society—whether it is domestic abuse, school shootings, gang warfare, video games, or inter-ethnic conflict—has something to do with gender. This course explores the connection between gender role socialization and the expression of conflict or aggression. Through readings, discussions, films, and projects, students will be encouraged to examine sex differences in violent behavior as the outcome of complex processes. We will try to better understand those processes and to develop the ability to describe the causes and their effects.

SOC 20838. Social Inequality: The Social Construction of Difference and Inequality

(3-0-3) Collett

Many of us are aware of our own experiences of disadvantage (or perhaps privilege), but people are generally not aware of how structural arrangements in society result in systems of difference and inequality. Only occasionally do we question whether or not things are really black or white, right or wrong, true or false, and even less often do we contemplate the repercussions of such binary assumptions. This class will challenge taken-for-granted beliefs about race and ethnicity, social class, sex and gender, and sexuality. We will discuss how these socially constructed categories of difference are given significant meaning and how this process subsequently results in “real” differences in experiences, expectations, and achievements between groups of individuals.

SOC 23901. Power and Identities

(3-0-3) Konieczny

This seminar explores various ways of thinking about the distribution and exercise of power in modern societies, and how power is related to identities and the self. We read and discuss contemporary theoretical works and case studies that examine authority relations and their construction, and the interplay of power with economics, politics, religion, and culture. Readings include, among others, works by Michel Foucault, Richard Sennett, Saba Mahmood, and Leora Auslander. Because of its themes and interdisciplinary approach, this course may be of interest not only to sociology majors, but also to majors in political science, gender studies, anthropology, and history.

SOC 30019. Sociology of Sport

(3-0-3) Welch

As a phenomenal growth industry of postindustrial leisure societies, sports demand critical study. Theories, schools' involvements, professionalization, race and sex inequalities, methods of business control, the use and misuse of talent/skills, and Olympic problems, are some aspects of this course's contents.

SOC 30109. Sociology of Culture

(3-0-3) Lizardo

In this class, we will examine cultural dimensions of important social processes, and we will survey contemporary sociological approaches to analyzing culture. Examples will include readings on home and work, social hierarchies, political culture, media and the arts, and social change.

SOC 30151. Popular Culture

(3-0-3) Lizardo

The first half of the course will introduce a variety of theoretical perspectives, presented as a historical overview of popular cultural studies, both in the United States and Britain. The theories to be considered include mass culture theory, Marxism, the Frankfurt Schools (Critical Theory), Structuralism, Semiotics, Feminism, and Post-Modernism. During this first half of the course, students will be required to write a paper in which they analyze an aspect of popular culture utilizing one or more of the theoretical perspectives. The second half of the course is devoted to a historical analysis, using the perspectives already addressed, of the social impact and meaning systems of rock 'n' roll music. The exegesis will begin with a study of African music, using recordings of chants and celebratory music, and will explore the music of American slaves, chain gangs, and spirituals, toward the goal of identifying elements exhibited by those genres that eventually evolved into rock 'n' roll. Students will be required to write a research paper on some aspect, personality, group, or historical development of rock 'n' roll. This course is not recommended for students who have taken SOC 451, as the content will overlap.

SOC 30237. Sociology of Teaching

(3-0-3) Kelly

This course surveys the sociological foundations of teaching and learning in America's elementary and secondary school classrooms. The class begins with an examination of teaching as a profession. What attracts individuals to the teaching profession, and why do they leave? What constitutes professional success for teachers? Next, we'll examine how local context shapes the work that teachers do, looking at some elements of schools and communities that impact the nature of teachers' work. The course concludes by looking at the teacher's role in producing educational success by considering two enduring educational problems: how to foster student engagement, and how to teach students of differing abilities within the same classroom. In addition to research in the sociology of teaching, students will be exposed to teacher narratives of success and struggle.

SOC 30514. Social Movements

(3-0-3) Summers-Effler

How is social change possible? This is one of the central questions for the study of social movements, as well as the organizing theme of this course. In this course, we will consider the ways in which difference sociological theories of social movements have asked and answered this question, paying particular attention to theories of identity, emotion, and networks.

SOC 30564. Global Sociology

(3-0-3) J. Smith

The course is designed as a broad overview of sociological analysis that extends beyond traditionally accepted national and local boundaries. It provides a perspective on the discipline as one that seeks to understand human society as a nested collection of interdependent societies. In particular, the course draws from world systems theory and institutional approaches—as well as from related disciplines such as anthropology—to consider how the “development project” of the 20th century evolved over time. The impacts of global economic integration on cultural and institutional change, inequality, and on changing identities and forms of collective action (including social movements) are phenomena we explore in the course. The course is designed for students who simply want to learn how the World Bank, IMF, and United Nations are impacting the experiences of people around the world, as well as for those who expect to do further research in the field.

SOC 30567. Chile in Comparative Perspective

(3-0-3) Valenzuela

This course provides a detailed analysis of the development of the Chilean economy, society, and policy since independence from Spain in 1818, drawing selected comparisons with other national experiences. It then discusses the validity of theoretical statements on central questions in the social science literature by examining them in light of the Chilean case. The main issues to be examined are the reasons for the successes or failures of Third World development, the origins and breakdowns of democracies, the characteristics of authoritarian regimes, and processes of restoring democracies.

SOC 30672. Religion and Social Life

(3-0-3) Christiano

How does social life influence religion? How does religion influence society? What is religion's social significance in a complex society like ours? Is religion's significance declining? This course will consider these and other questions by exploring the great variety in social expressions of religion. The course examines the social bases of churches, sects, and cults, and it focuses on contemporary religion in the United States.

SOC 30675. Religion, Modernity, Secularization, and Religious Persistence

(3-0-3) C. Smith

What is the fate of religion in modern societies? Is there something about modernity that is particularly corrosive of religion? Does modernity secularize? What does secularization mean? Where, how, and why does religion survive or thrive in the modern world? What social forces and influences explain different religious outcomes in modernity? Are there “multiple modernities” that have different effects on religious traditions? This course examines the most important works on religion in modernity to explore these questions so as to better understand outcomes of religious belief and practice in the contemporary world. (This is a sophomore- to senior-level course primarily for sociology majors and others with specifically related interests.)

SOC 30806. Race and Ethnicity

(3-0-3)

This course has three objectives. First, the course will help you to think critically about issues related to race and ethnicity in American society. These issues include the meaning of race and ethnicity; the extent of racial and ethnic inequality in the United States; the nature of racism, discrimination, and racial stereotyping; the pros and cons of affirmative action; the development of racial identity; differences between assimilation, amalgamation, and multiculturalism; and social and individual change with respect to race relations. The second objective is to foster a dialogue between you and other students about racist and ethnocentric attitudes and actions. The third objective is to encourage you to explore your own racial and ethnic identity and to understand how this identity reflects and shapes your life experiences.

SOC 30846. Today's Gender Roles

(3-0-3) Aldous

This course is concerned with current changes in male and female roles in the light of social science, primarily sociological evidence. Such issues as the source of male and female role differences, the range of roles open to women and men, and the consequences of changing roles and institutions as paid work and the family are considered. The class format is primarily group discussions supplemented by some lectures presentations from visiting scholars.

SOC 30900. Foundations of Sociological Theory

(3-0-3) Faeges; Konieczny; Lizardo

Sociological theory is the foundation of sociology. Students in this course will learn two things: first, what theorists do and why, and second, how to use fundamental theoretic concepts—such as exploitation and alienation, social structure and solidarity, and bureaucracy and charisma—to analyze and explain contemporary society.

SOC 30902. Methods of Sociological Research

(3-0-3) Hachen; Gunty; Williams

Prerequisite: (SOC 30900 OR SOC 300)

Begins with discussion of scientific method, conceptualization of research problems, and measurement. The course then explores the dominant modes of social science research: field work and participant observation, survey and interviewing, experimental designs, and evaluation research.

SOC 30903. Statistics for Sociological Research

(3-0-3) Sikkink; Skiles

Corequisite: ESS 27999

This course is designed to show students how to interpret and critically evaluate statistics commonly used to describe, predict, and evaluate in the social sciences, as well as many areas of the business and/or medical world. The focus is on a conceptual understanding of what the statistic does, means, and what assumptions are made from it. Hands-on experience in using data analysis is part of the course.

SOC 33001. Sociology, Self, and Catholic Social Tradition

(3-0-3) Weigert

What's Catholic about sociology? What's sociological about Catholic social tradition? What does all this mean for sociology majors, what they study, and how this may affect their careers and lives after graduation? This course is a critical examination of the links between Catholic social thought and sociology as a discipline. We will engage these ideas through an experimental, team-taught seminar format. Readings will include core statements of Catholic social tradition, critiques thereof, and autobiographical essays written by sociologists and others who are dedicated to social justice.

SOC 33090. Proseminar

(1-0-1) Power

This course provides an introductory overview of the sociology major and the opportunities students have within the sociology department and the College of Arts and Letters, as well as across the University. The course has a practical focus. Some classes are devoted to equipping students with knowledge and skills that will serve them as they progress through the major. Other classes focus on future plans, such as entering the work force, going on to graduate or professional school, and performing service after the baccalaureate. The idea of "career as vocation" is also explored. This course is for one credit, pass/fail, and is required of all sociology majors.

SOC 40001. Time and Society

(3-0-3) Faeges

Ever felt rushed to finish an assignment? A hit song of 1966 urged people to "slow down, you move too fast", but since then the pace of life in America, where "time is money," has accelerated, and vacations are shorter. However, in many societies efficiency is disdained; life moves to the rhythms of nature, not the "Day-Timer," and people seem to have all the time in the world. In short, attitudes toward and ways of dealing with time deeply shape people's lives, and societies' attitudes toward and ways of dealing with time vary greatly. "Social time" is the subject of this course, whose major topics include how societies track time and use it to regulate and coordinate their members' collective lives at work and play, at home and in public, in everyday life, and on special occasions; how "ecological time" based on the sun and moon, stars, and seasons, differs from contemporary America's technologically-based "clock time"; how and why the pace of life varies between societies; how the timing of life-cycles varies between societies, for example, in the age at which individuals become adults, old enough to marry and have children—or drink alcohol.

SOC 40604. Tolerating Intolerance: Religion, Secularization, and Peace

(3-0-3) Springs

Tolerance of religious differences is heralded today as a primary accomplishment of the modern liberal-democratic societies, and perhaps the best hope for transforming conflict and building peace in conflict zones across the globe. Where did this value come from, and how did it evolve? How has it come to orient modern, liberal society, and mark the difference between liberal and illiberal societies? Is religious toleration an absolute good? What are its limits? In what ways might it assist or impede the pursuit of transitional and restorative justice, and peacebuilding? Is the basis of religious toleration the secularization of public life and politics? This class examines the concept of toleration, attending specifically to its application to current debates about the relation of religious belief and practice to politics and social movements in contemporary European contexts. We will examine the difference between free speech and hate speech, and the controversies pertaining to religious freedom in contemporary France, Holland, and Britain, as well as apparent standoff between multiculturalism, secularization, human rights, and group rights.

SOC 40605. Religion, Violence, and Peace

(3-0-3) Omer

In this course, we will first explore theoretical frameworks for thinking about the connection between religion and violence. Second, we will examine the role of religion in conflict through an exploration of theoretical material as well as specific case studies. Finally, we will ask how and why various analyses of the role of religion in conflict enable us to think about the potential role of religion in peacebuilding and conflict transformation. The course will explore the cases of Sri-Lanka, Sudan, Israel-Palestine, and Northern Ireland.

SOC 40702. Law and Society

(3-0-3) Martinez

In this course we will look at how law shapes and is shaped, by the social world. the course will emphasize the gaps between legal rules ("the letter" of the law)—how it actually works in popular interpretations and moral visions ("the spirit" of the law). We will examine how law influences social conditions (law as independent variable), and how social forces influence the law (law as dependent variable). What is the relationship between law and culture? Between law and history? What is legal consciousness? How does law maintain social control, create new norms and affect social change? How do social forces from outside of the legal sphere influence legal processes, including law making and dispute resolution? Students will be actively engaged in the learning process through role play, debates, mini-presentations, and other interactive exercises. By the end of the semester, students will be able to think critically about the core themes and concepts of how law interacts with most other social institutions. (May not take if you have already taken SOC 40701 because of course overlap.)

SOC 43001. Social Movements in Global Perspectives

(3-0-3) J. Smith

This seminar explores how increasing global integration affects political participation and the prospects for democracy. We will briefly review the broader research literature on the sociology of social movements within nations as a first step in our consideration of the relationships between "globalization" and social movements. Seminar discussions will explore how transnational movements compare with those operating at local and national levels. Readings will reflect a range of cases and analytical perspectives. We will explore relationships between movements and political institutions, the factors affecting the abilities of relatively powerless groups to mobilize resources and build coalitions, and the ideological and cultural dimensions of transnational mobilization. Considerable attention will be placed on the contemporary global justice movement as we explore these questions, and methodological issues relevant to this field of study will be addressed throughout the course.

SOC 43113. Cultural Sociology

(3-0-3) Spillman

In this class, we will examine cultural dimensions of important social processes, and we will survey contemporary sociological approaches to analyzing culture. Examples will include readings on home and work, social hierarchies, political culture, media and the arts, and social change.

SOC 43162. Aesthetics of Latino Art and Cultural Expression

(3-0-3) Cardenas

This course will analyze the philosophy and principles underlying the social and political aspects of Latino art. We will approach this by examining a range of topics, including Chicano and Puerto Rican poster art, muralism, Latina aesthetics, and border art. The readings will enable us to survey a number of important exhibitions of Latino art and to explore new possibilities for exhibition and representation. We will examine descriptive material and critical writings concerning issues pertaining to the representation and interpretation of Latino culture and art and how these questions surface in a national museum context.

SOC 43171. Materializations of America

(3-0-3) Halton

Industrialization in the 20th century resulted in a megatechnic America problematically related to materialism and to earlier visions of the New World. The course will consider a variety of materializations of America.

SOC 43228. Controversies in Education

(3-0-3) Covay

The "American Dream" suggests that education can be a path to upward mobility. However, critical examination of education allows us to have a greater understanding of the stratification within society. Education is a complex enterprise comprised of issues related to inequality, and often these issues do not have clear-cut answers. While viable solutions exist, the implementation of solutions is complicated. This course is designed to critically examine educational issues such as tracking, segregation, accountability, and school choice. Throughout the semester, we will read scholarly works and discuss how equality within education is not straightforward, but instead is wrought with controversies.

SOC 43240. Research on School Effects

(3-0-3) Kelly

It might seem a truism that schools have powerful effects on student achievement. Yet beginning with the landmark Equality of Educational Opportunity study in 1966, social scientists have debated the role that schools play in the production of student achievement. Does it matter much which school a student attends? Why are some schools chronically low performing, and what are the characteristics of more effective schools? Students should have completed coursework in methods and statistics for social research or equivalent coursework before enrolling in this course.

SOC 43333. Sociology of Divorce and Remarriage

(3-0-3) J. Sobolewski

This course describes the adversity and reorganization of family life through marital discord, divorce, nonmarital births, single parenthood, and remarriage, with a particular focus on how these processes affect children. Through weekly lectures, readings, and discussions, students will become familiar with current research and policy related to these topics.

SOC 43345. World Families and Gender

(3-0-3) Aldous

World Families is a course designed to examine families as related to gender across space and through time. How gender is related to power, roles, and responsibilities within families in the various areas and across social class and ethnicity is a focus. The families to be studied come from a number of societies other than the United States. Also considered will be families in the United States as they existed in earlier periods to give another basis for comparison among families today.

SOC 43377. Families, Employment, and Their Interrelation with Gender

(3-0-3) Aldous

A consideration of the part gender plays in family processes like the couple formation through cohabitation and/or marriage, having and rearing children, division of labor, and the post-children era.

SOC 43402. Population Dynamics

(3-0-3) Williams

Demography, the science of population, is concerned with virtually everything that influences, or can be influenced by, population size, distribution, processes, structure, or characteristics. This course pays particular attention to the causes and consequences of population change. Changes in fertility, mortality, migration, technology, lifestyle, and culture have dramatically affected the United States and the other nations of the world. These changes have implications for a number of areas: hunger, the spread of illness and disease, environmental degradation, health services, household formation, the labor force, marriage and divorce, care for the elderly, birth control, poverty, urbanization, business marketing strategies, and political power. An understanding of these is important as business, government, and individuals attempt to deal with the demands of the changing population.

SOC 43404. International Migration: Mexico and the United States II

(2-0-2) Bustamante

This course addresses relations between theory and methods for scientific research on international migration with emphasis on immigration to the United States; the objective is to prepare students to design research projects on this subject for theses and dissertations. The course will review basic questions on this subject and the methods through which these questions have been adequately or inadequately answered; the numbers, the impact, the nature, the structure, the process, the human experience, will be discussed in terms of the research methods commonly used to approach them.

SOC 43473. Latinos in American Society

(3-0-3) Cardenas

This seminar will focus on the breakdown of the Spanish empire in Latin America and the emergence of new nation-states in the region in the first quarter of the 19th century. Contrary to common expectations, the former colonies did not form a united nation but rather split into 10 different republics that developed their own unique histories, only to split further apart during the course of the century. This seminar will examine the origins and actors of the independence movements, the development of an ideology of emancipation, and the variegated causes of fragmentation.

SOC 43479. International Migration and Human Rights

(3-0-3) Bustamante

This course is an extension from the mini-course to a full term, with a wider coverage of international migration experiences in the world with an emphasis on human rights. It starts with a historical approach to various immigration waves to the United States, from the years of the Industrial Revolution to the present. It focuses on the current debate on the impact of the undocumented immigration from Mexico and Central America, with a discussion of the gap between public perceptions and research findings. Differences between Mexico and the United States' migration policies, and its social and economic implications, are discussed. The recent developments within the context of the United Nations' Commission of Human Rights on the relationship between migration and human rights are also covered.

SOC 43517. Conflict Resolution: Theory and Practice

(3-0-3) Fast

This course is designed to introduce students to the broad array of conflict theory that exists in the social sciences as it relates to our ability to manage and transform conflict, ranging from the interpersonal to international arenas, and to teach students a range of basic skills in conflict analysis and resolution. We will survey the literature focusing on the nature and dynamics of conflict, explaining the root causes of conflict and violence, as well as various strategies for peacefully resolving conflict. This course involves a combination of mini-lectures, seminar-style discussions, and interactive class exercises to promote student learning.

SOC 43524. Employment in a Changing Economy

(3-0-3) Hachen

How is employment changing? What distinguishes the new economy from the old economy? How do people find better jobs? What are employers looking for when they attempt to meet their labor needs? This course will attempt to answer these and other questions by contrasting the new and the old economy. In the old economy, some people worked for the same employer their entire lives. Why did workers stay with the same firm? Why did employers want to retain their employees? In the new economy, employers seem to want flexibility. Why do they want flexibility, and how do they attempt to achieve it? What consequences does the quest for flexibility have for how people become employed?

SOC 43527. Social Network Analysis

(3-0-3) Thomas

Social network analysis is the study of connections. In this class, we study individuals not as discrete entities, but instead by looking at how they are embedded in complex social networks. Rather than looking at individual attributes, we focus on the importance of social networks in influencing processes such as the development and use of power, the diffusion of collective action, the workings of exchange relationships, and the development and articulation of identity. We also consider how networks form, persist over time, and change.

SOC 43553. Building Democratic Institutions

(3-0-3) Valenzuela

Elements of democratic regimes emerged long before the regimes as such can be identified as being minimally in place. Beginning with a brief discussion of the essential features of democracies, the course examines how and why such institutions emerged and the critical moments in which the actual transitions to the new democratic regimes occurred. The course focuses on democratizations that took place before the Second World War, and will examine key European and Latin American cases.

SOC 43558. Comparing European Societies

(3-0-3) Fishman

This course offers students a review of major patterns of difference, along with some similarities, among the 15 member states of the European Union. Despite the larger contrasts with the United States and the pressures toward convergence generated by the process of European integration, European societies remain remarkably different from one another on a number of dimensions, including the overall level and form taken by employment and unemployment, systems of social protection and welfare state organization, demographic trends ranging from extremely low birth rates in most of southern Europe to significantly higher birth rates further north, the connections between urban and rural life, and the impact of education on inequalities. The role of institutions, cultures, national histories, and policies in accounting for this pattern of difference will be reviewed. The course will also examine the combinations of identities—national, regional, and European—found among citizens of Europe. Students will be encouraged to develop their expertise on at least one country while also doing comparative reading.

SOC 43563. Nationalism and Globalization

(3-0-3) Faeges

Nationalism divides humanity; globalization is pulling it together. Nationalism has been one of the most potent forces in the world over the past two centuries; globalization increasingly challenges the world of nation-states. In this course, we will study the origins, nature, evolution, and interaction of these two fundamental social forces. The main assignment will be a research paper on a topic chosen by each student according to their particular interests within the broad scope of topics embraced by nationalism and globalization, allowing them to pursue an existing interest further or to explore a new area.

SOC 43564. Global Sociology

(3-0-3) J. Smith

Globalization, or the spread of international communications and exchange, has impacted many aspects of contemporary societies. This course helps students understand the global economic and political forces that shape people's local and national experiences, and it considers the ways that citizens and states help shape the course of global change. We will explore how global economic and political change affect conflicts within and between nations, as well as how global change impacts the practice of democracy worldwide. The course examines some of the core sociological work in the area of global change, focusing on the development of national and global institutions, the expansion of capitalism, and the emergence of transnational networks of popular groups seeking to shape global conflicts and culture.

SOC 43590. Sociology of Economic Life

(3-0-3) Spillman

Economic actions such as working, buying, selling, saving, and giving are a fundamental part of everyday life, and all spheres of society, from family to religion to politics, are interrelated with economy. Sociologists examine how social relationships from small networks to transnational linkages affect economic actions and their outcomes, and the ways cultural meanings and political strategies shape those social relationships. The goal of this class is to provide students with new perspectives on economic actions by reading recent sociological studies of topics such as money, markets, work, businesses, industries, and consumer society.

SOC 43600. Religion and Classical Social Theory

(3-0-3) Christiano

The purpose of this course is, in the setting of a small seminar, to engage students in close reading and broad discussion of sociological writings about religion by classical theorists of the discipline. Works that may be nominated for treatment include such mainstays as The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life and other studies of religion by Emile Durkheim; The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism and The Sociology of Religion by Max Weber; portions of The German Ideology by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, as well as excerpts from Marx's Capital; The Future of an Illusion and Civilization and Its Discontents by Sigmund Freud; and various essays on religion by Georg Simmel. The course also will cover more recent works, both in the sociology of religion and in related fields, incorporating assumptions about and approaches to religion that can be traced to these pioneering authors.

SOC 43662. Religion and American Society

(3-0-3) Sikkink

The sociology of religion investigates the influence of the social environment on religion and the role that religion continues to play in shaping contemporary society. This course will focus on the interaction of religion and contemporary American society through reading and discussion of major sociological works on American evangelicalism, mainline Protestantism, and Catholicism. The course will draw on classic sociological works on the relationship of religion and society to illuminate processes of religious identity formation and the influence of American religion on social behavior.

SOC 43719. Self, Society, and Environment

(3-0-3) Weigert

This course focuses on social psychological aspects of relationships between humans and the natural environment. Issues include how humans interact with different environments, symbolic transformations of environments, and competing accounts or claims concerning human-environment relationships. The course is framed in a sociology knowledge perspective and touches on alternative ways of envisioning and valuing individual and institutional perspectives on human-environment relationships with an eye toward implications for social change.

SOC 43730. Crime and Deviance in Ideological Perspective

(3-0-3) Welch

Prerequisite: SOC 10002 OR SOC 10033 OR SOC 10722 OR SOC 13181 OR SOC 20002 OR SOC 20033 OR SOC 20228 OR SOC 20342 OR SOC 20722 OR SOC 20732 OR SOC 30672 OR SOC 30900

This seminar course will examine selected issues (e.g., white collar crime, interpersonal violence, victimless crimes, etc.) in the study of crime and deviance (issues will change each time the course is offered) and compare responses made by those representing different schools of thought. We will critique the adequacy of these responses from a sociological viewpoint. Prerequisite: any SOC course, except that you cannot take this course if you have already taken SOC 43732 Controversies and Crises in Modern Criminology because of overlap between the two courses.

SOC 43732. Controversies and Crises in Modern Criminology

(3-0-3) Welch

Prerequisites: SOC 30900 AND SOC 30902

This upper-level seminar course will focus on important current issues and controversies (e.g., racial profiling, victimless crimes, cyber-crimes, etc.) that are central to the study of crime and deviance in modern society. Students will be required to discuss and analyze these issues from a variety of sociological perspectives. The issues that are studied may change each time the course is offered. Students (even sociology majors) cannot take this course if they have already taken SOC 43730 Crime and Deviance in Ideological Perspective because of overlap between the two courses.

SOC 43774. Society and Identity

(3-0-3) Weigert

This course looks at sources, dynamics, and consequences of identity in contemporary society. Identity is conceived as definitions of an individual that self and others use as a basis for interacting with one another. Significant outcomes of the way we are defined are the life chances, evaluations, and emotional meanings we experience. The course format is a discussion. Seminar.

SOC 43839. Unequal America

(3-0-3) Carbonaro

Although America is world's richest nation, it has the most unequal distribution of wealth and income in the industrialized world. In this course, we will examine why this is so. In particular, we will examine the following questions: What social forces create inequality in society? Is inequality inevitable? Is there such a thing as "social class"? Who gets ahead, and why? Why is race/ethnicity and gender still related to social status, wealth, and income? Does America have a "ruling elite"? Who are "the poor," and what explains their poverty? Are there social policies that can create more equality in American society—and is that what Americans really want?

SOC 43849. Sociology of Masculinity

(3-0-3) Guntz

This seminar explores the social construction of masculinity and its many forms, both traditional and emerging, through readings, movies, discussions, and writing assignments. Members of the seminar will seek a better understanding of shifting roles, identities, and social structures that influence the way both males and females develop the meaning of masculinity. Topics include socialization, role conflicts, gender violence, sexuality, the impact of fathering and men's movements, and the masculinities in the United States and around the world. It is intended to complement the study of gender in other disciplines, but some familiarity with basic concepts in sociology is strongly recommended.

SOC 43904. Workshop: Professional Writing and Publishing in Sociology

(3-0-3) Faeges

The ability to write effectively is valuable in graduate school, no matter the field, and in most careers. In this course, students will develop their writing skills, with an orientation to professional publishing. The course has three linked components:

- (1) preparing a paper for submission to a professional journal;
- (2) learning to read with an editor's eye and give effective feedback to other authors; and
- (3) an introduction to professional publishing. We will conduct this course as a workshop: Students will present their writing to the class; students will read and review each other's writing; and, students will work on the sociology department's own journal Sociological Voices, which publishes research papers written by Notre Dame's undergraduates.

SOC 43948. Sociology of the Body

(3-0-3) Halton

The human body, that extraordinary organic basis of the self and its sign-making abilities, remains very much present in human communication and culture. Though many of our cognitive beliefs may have been developed in civilized societies and their cultural conventions, the self reaches deep into the human body, and that body was refined over many tens of thousands of years of hunter-gatherer life and developed over an even longer period of hominid, primate, and mammalian evolution. This course aims to focus directly on the organic human body, itself, as a center of self and society. We will explore a variety of readings related to the human body as organic matrix of meaning, and that reveal bodily bases of social life, such as Ashley Montagu's Touching: On The Significance of Skin, or issues of human development. We will also explore the body as a source of self-originated experience through class "practice" sessions, and ways contemporary technoculture seems to seek to displace bodily based experience.

SOC 45000. Sociology Internship

(V-0-V) Power

This is an experiential course designed to give students some practical experience in the area of urban affairs, social welfare, education, health care, or business, in order to test their interest, complement their academic work, or acquire work experience preparatory to future careers. Students are placed in a community agency in the South Bend area and normally work eight hours per week as interns under the supervision of an experienced practitioner. Hours are flexible, usually set to accommodate the intern's availability and the needs of the host agency. While there are no prerequisites, preference is given to sociology majors, ESS minors, PSIM minors, and students who have had course work in an area related to social concerns. This is a graded course. In addition to field work, academic work includes reading scholarly works related to the field placement, periodic group meetings with the instructor and others in the course, periodic short reports, and a final paper. (For more information and/or an application, contact Ann Power at power.4@nd.edu. The following is a list of agencies that have accepted interns. Students may also request placement in an agency they find on their own (subject to approval by the instructor). La Casa de Amistad; Near Northwest Neighborhood Inc.; Neighborhood Development Association; Safe Station (Youth Runaway Shelter); Salvation Army of St. Joseph County (Social Services); Sex Offense Services, Madison Center; Early Childhood Development Center; Good Shepherd Montessori School; Robinson Community Learning Center; Upward Bound; Washington High School, South Bend Center for Hospice and Palliative Care; St. Joseph County; Sr. Maura Brannick Health Center at Chapin Street; The CASIE Center (Child Abuse Services, Investigation and Education); Family Justice Center; and Indiana Legal Services

SOC 45900. Special Practicum in Journal Publishing

(V-0-V) Faeges

This course offers students the opportunity to learn professional journal publishing by working on the staff of Sociological Voices, the sociology department's own journal, which publishes research by undergraduates. Students will learn by participating in all aspects of the journal, both editorial and administrative, which include how to process papers submitted for possible publication, edit accepted articles, and prepare the journal for printing using Adobe's InDesign software. The course can be taken for 1–3 credit hours, with each credit requiring 2.5 hours of work/week (average). Students will have a large degree of flexibility in scheduling their hours. The specific work assigned will vary with the requirement of the journal. Prerequisites: recommendation by a member of the sociology faculty and approval of the instructor.

SOC 46000. Directed Readings

(V-0-V)

Students pursue an individual reading program on a topic not available in a regular class, designed with and supervised by a member of the faculty, leading to the production of oral and written reports reflecting deeper theoretical and empirical understanding. This course does not count toward the 40000-level major requirement.

SOC 48000. Directed Research in Sociology

(V-0-V)

Directed Research in Sociology (SOC 48000) affords students a chance to research sociological questions that are not covered in an established course outside the formal Honors Program. Together with a faculty director, the student formulates a research question and a research design to answer a question that will result in a major research report demonstrating deepened methodological skills, empirical knowledge, and theoretic understanding.

SOC 48001. Community-Based Research

(V-0-V) Guntz

Prerequisites: (SOC 30902 AND SOC 30903)

This variable-credit course enhances the students' research skills by applying them to an action research project for a not-for-profit social services organization in St. Joseph County. Building on skills developed in Methods of Sociological Research (SOC 30902), students work with a Notre Dame faculty member and an on-site supervisor to conduct needs assessment or evaluation research, typically in the form of interviews/surveys, focus groups, or content analysis. The practicum begins with an orientation to the organization's mission and the research project objectives, individual goal setting, and a review of relevant methodological skills. Students then work with the on-site supervisor to develop valid methods for the project, to resolve measurement issues and to collect appropriate data. Depending on the nature of the project, the student may also be involved in database construction, data analysis, and reporting. In most cases, the student will choose from a list of available projects, but the student may propose a new project as well. The overall objective is the development of the student's knowledge and skills by putting them at the service of the community. Permission by instructor required.

SOC 48002. Doing Sociology: Quantitative Senior Research Practicum

(3-0-3) Kelly

This is a chance for seniors to pull all the strands of their sociology major together. No matter whether they are going on to graduate or professional school, doing some post-baccalaureate service, or heading out into the job market, this opportunity to do some independent research and produce a substantive report will be a great asset. The format of the course will be much like a workshop. Within this framework, under the guidance of the instructor, students will be able to draw upon their knowledge of research methods, statistics, and sociological theory to investigate questions of their own choosing. Once the question is framed, students will choose a data set (from among a few large existing sets, one of which is the General Social Survey) and learn to extract a set of variables, do the appropriate analysis and interpretation, and produce a meaningful report on their investigation. Essentially, this is an opportunity to cap off a sociology major.

SOC 48009. Sociology Honors Capstone Project

(3-0-3)

A "capstone project" is the principal component of the Honors Track in Sociology. This course entails intensive independent study and research on a selected sociological topic, generating a departmental honors thesis, which is a scholarly paper in sociology. Each student in this course works under the direction of an individual faculty advisor in order to pursue a research project, which may be quantitative or qualitative in nature. Honors students are expected to submit their theses for publication in either Sociological Voices or another approved sociological research journal. Students ordinarily enroll in two semesters of SOC 48009 (for a total of 6 credits), but may enroll in just one semester of the course if approved by the director of undergraduate studies. (A formal application process is required — see the director of undergraduate studies for more information. Department approval is required.)

SOC 48040. Mexican Immigration: A South Bend Case Study

(4-0-4) Richman

This course uses experiential learning in the Mexican community of South Bend in order to understand how Mexican migrants conduct their lives across the vast distances separating South Bend and their homeland. The course begins with readings in social science and fiction about transnationalism, Mexican-U.S. migration and the history and sociology of the local community. Next we learn ethical fieldwork methods in preparation for community research. Students working in two-person teams will gather data on local and transnational households and kin networks, political involvement, employment, consumption practices, cultural activities, and religious life, working through contacts with social service agencies, the Mexican consulate, and Mexican or Latino-run media, businesses, food stores, and sports leagues. We will document the innovative adaptations of this migrant community, especially the growth of an ethnic enclave of small businesses that both unite Mexicans as an ethnic group and sustain their ties to their homeland. We intend to compile the research in a volume published by Latino Studies to be given to those who shared their lives with us and to entities that are committed to helping them.

SOC 48501. Analysis of Collective Contention I

(3-0-3) McVeigh; Summers-Effler

This course and SOC 48502 Advanced Analysis of Collective Contention together form a single yearlong class examining theoretical developments and empirical analysis of collective contention. Students will conduct intensive research projects involving thorough literature review, formal proposal, statistical and interpretive analysis, and the writing of a professional research report. SOC 48501 and 48502 must be taken sequentially in the same academic year.

SOC 48502. Advanced Analysis of Collective Contention II

(3-0-3) McVeigh; Summers-Effler

Prerequisite: SOC 48501

This course and SOC 48501 Intermediate Analysis of Collective Contention together form a single yearlong class examining theoretical developments and empirical analysis of collective contention. Students will conduct intensive research projects involving thorough literature review, formal proposal, statistical and interpretive analysis, and the writing of a professional research report. SOC 48501 and 48502 must be taken sequentially in the same academic year. Permission of instructor is required.

SOC 48701. Research on Moral Decision Making in Group Settings

(3-0-3) Carbonaro

Prerequisite: SOC 30902

How do people make moral decisions? Recent research in the field of neuroscience indicates that humans have a "moral sense" that is hard-wired into brains. In addition, social psychological research suggests that social context matters greatly in shaping how people behave when faced with moral issues. In this class, we will examine how the interaction between social environment and the human brain guide people in making moral decisions. As part of the class, students will be involved in running an experiment involving judgments about moral dilemmas in group settings. Aspects of research design, causal inference, measurement, and data analysis will also be discussed as part of the class. Permission of the instructor is required to register for this class. Honor students may use the data from this project to write their major research project in their senior year.

Department of Science, Technology, and Values

STV 20105. Theories of Sexual Difference

(3-0-3) Kourany

Corequisite: STV 27999

An examination of the following questions: What kind of differences separate men and women? Are these differences natural, or are they socially produced? And are these differences beneficial to us, or are they limiting? What does equality mean for people characterized by such differences?

STV 20109. Knowledge and Mind

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

An introductory survey of a number of issues in the theory of knowledge and the philosophy of mind. Issues to be addressed include: What is knowledge? What is consciousness, and what might a satisfactory explanation of consciousness look like? What is the "self," and how do we know it? What is perception, and what, exactly, can we come to know by perception? What, if anything, can we know without relying on perception? Could we be wrong about everything we take ourselves to know?

STV 20110. Environmental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

A philosophically integrated examination of current environmental issues, drawing on familiar literature from ecology (Leopold), economics (Boulding), and ethics (Singer), as well as recent fiction (Tolkien, Herbert).

STV 20114. Introduction to the Philosophy of Biology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

An examination of key concepts and controversies in contemporary biology. The meaning of gene, organism, and environment and their interrelationships in the context of development, evolutionary theory, and ecology are closely considered.

STV 20115. Gender, Politics, and Evolution

(3-0-3)

An examination of ethical/political models of gender-neutral access to public and domestic requisites for the development of basic human capabilities, and a comparison of these models with current studies of the significance of human sexual dimorphism in evolutionary psychology.

STV 20116. Human Nature and New Technology

(3-0-3) Mayo

An examination of philosophical and ethical questions associated with the two most revolutionary technologies of the 21st century, the Internet and biotechnology.

STV 20120. Alcohol and Drugs: Anthropology of Substance Use and Abuse

(3-0-3)

This class will cover biological, cultural, and applied aspects of how anthropology approaches the diversity of substance use practices around the world, as well as resultant social problems and social reactions. The course will draw on both historical and ethnographic analyses to situate alcohol and drug use in the realm of human behavior and experience. Addiction as a concept will be critically analyzed from both biological and cultural perspectives.

STV 20124. Memoirs of Madness

(3-0-3)

This course has three major dimensions: (1) comparative description and analysis of biomedical and psychodynamic models of psychiatric training; (2) comparative analysis of personal accounts of mental illnesses; and (3) philosophical analysis of psychodynamic models of mental illness and therapy.

STV 20125. Philosophy and Science Fiction

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: PHIL 22620; STV 27999

The goal of this course is to introduce students to some central philosophical problems via reflection on classic and contemporary works of science fiction in conjunction with classic and contemporary texts in philosophy.

STV 20134. The Technological American

(3-0-3)

In this course, we will explore the impact new technologies have had on our domestic and economic lives. We also will discuss how new technologies have changed the way we communicate and the kinds of leisure entertainment we enjoy. Though technology is often celebrated for the promise of liberation, we will see how new inventions have also raised fears of alienation and loss of control.

STV 20139. Minds, Brains, and Persons

(3-0-3)

This course will treat some central issues in the philosophy of mind, such as freedom of the will, personal identity, and the relationship between mind and body.

STV 20142. Architectural History II

(3-0-3) Doordan

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course continues the history survey, beginning with Renaissance and Baroque Europe and continuing to the 18th and 19th centuries in Europe and the United States. It extends to the modern movement as it affected countries as far-reaching as Japan and Australia.

STV 20146. History of Communication Technologies

(3-0-3)

The Internet is revolutionizing the ways we produce, communicate, and organize information. This course seeks to deepen our understanding of current issues about the access to information, the ownership and authority of ideas, and the possibilities for change. We can gain a new perspective by examining the history of previous shifts in the technology of communication in ancient medieval and early modern societies. We will begin by learning about the earliest forms of writing had on ancient societies. Next we will discuss the role of Christianity in the transfer from the scroll of the codex. The third, larger section will explore the development of different kinds of books, from illuminated manuscripts to mass-produced books for university students. We will then examine the shifts following the invention of the printing press in the 15th century. Finally, we will consider some of the 20th-century developments in communications technology, including the revolution of cyberspace.

STV 20149. Environmental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A philosophically integrated examination of current environmental issues, drawing on familiar literature from ecology (Leopold), economics (Boulding), and ethics (Singer), as well as recent fiction (Tolkien, Herbert).

STV 20152. Visual America II

(3-0-3)

An introductory course that explores dimensions of several types of visual expression popular photography, cartography, genre and historical painting, chromolithography, and the commercial and graphic arts in American cultural history from Louis Daguerre's development of photography in 1839 to the public exhibition of television at the 1939 New York World's Fair.

STV 20154. Modern Physics and Moral Responsibility

(3-0-3) Howard

Corequisite: STV 27999

This class examines such questions as: What are the moral responsibilities of the scientist? Should the scientist be held accountable for what might be done with the results of his or her scientific research? Does the scientist have any special role to play, as a citizen, in public debate about science policy? Should the scientist sometimes simply refuse to engage in some kinds of research because of moral concern about the consequences of research of that area? No special background in physics will be assumed.

STV 20163. Science and Religion

(3-0-3)

An examination of the interrelation and tension between contemporary science and traditional religious belief.

STV 20164. Science and Religion in Historical Perspective

(3-0-3) Pitts

Corequisite: STV 27999

The relationship between science and religion (especially Christianity) has attracted much attention recently. Historians have shown that this relationship has not been primarily a matter of conflict. It has been claimed that the relationship between science and religion can be characterized by conflict, independence, dialog, and/or integration, for example. This course aims to survey some important events and themes in the relationship between science and Christianity.

STV 20179. Science and Theology

(3-0-3)

Both science and religion generate assertions that are held to provide true descriptions of the world and our place in it. Both science and theology subject these assertions to disciplined inquiry and testing within specific communities. In societies (like ours) in which both science and religion are vital forces, these processes of enquiry and testing overlap and interrelate in complicated ways, resulting sometimes in conflict and sometimes in mutual enrichment. This course will investigate these interrelations by means three case studies: the Galileo affair, the conflict of evolution and creationism, and the ethical issues that arise from new genetic biotechnologies.

STV 20216. Biomedical Ethics and Public Health Risk

(3-0-3)

Designed for pre-med, science, and engineering students, the course will survey ethical issues associated with current public health problems, such as pollution-induced cancers; universal health care; occupational injury and death; and inadequate medical attention to prevention, nutrition, and environmental health.

STV 20221. Biomedical Ethics

(3-0-3)

A discussion of ethical problems in the medical profession in light of natural law and Christian moral principles.

STV 20225. Ethics of Technology

(3-0-3) Reed

An examination of the role of technology in our lives and whether and in what ways technological innovations make us better or worse.

STV 20226. Ecology, Ethics, and Economics

(3-0-3) Sayre

Corequisite: PHIL 22626; STV 27999

An examination, through literature and reasoned argument, of (1) social values behind the economic excesses that have led to our ecological crisis, and (2) alternative values by which the crisis might be alleviated.

STV 20245. Medical Ethics

(3-0-3) Solomon

Corequisite: PHIL 22602

An exploration from the point of view of ethical theory of a number of ethical problems in contemporary biomedicine. Topics discussed will include euthanasia, abortion, the allocation of scarce medical resources, truth telling in the doctor-patient relationship, the right to medical care, and informed consent and human experimentation.

STV 20246. Medical Ethics

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

A discussion of ethical problems in the medical profession in light of natural law and Christian moral principles.

STV 20247. Environmental Ethics

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course is concerned with the relationship between human beings and the rest of the natural world, and critically examines various proposals that have been made about how we ought to treat plants, animals, ecosystems, future generations, and scarce natural resources.

STV 20248. Modern Science and Human Values

(3-0-3)

The purpose of this course is to introduce students to some of the most important ethical theories in Western philosophical and religious thought and to study the applications of those theories to moral problems that arise in the context of the life sciences.

STV 20258. Philosophy of Technology

(3-0-3)

Topics covered will be early philosophy of technology, recent philosophy of technology, technology and ethics, technology and policy, technology and human nature, and technology and science. Readings will be principally derived from David M. Kaplan (2004) Readings in the Philosophy of Technology and Francis Fukuyama (2002) Our Posthuman Future.

STV 20260. Theology, Ethics, and the Environment

(3-0-3)

Does our ecological awareness require radically new theologies and moralities? What moral claims, if any, do nonhuman entities make on us? Can current Christian and philosophical moral theories address these claims? This course raises these questions on both theoretical and practical levels. Theoretically, we will examine various theological and philosophical views of the moral status of nonhuman nature. Practically, we will explore the implications of these views for issues such as wilderness conservation/preservation, treatment of animals, agricultural biotechnology, and others. The diversity of positions we will consider will range from those who embrace standard, modern human-centered theologies and moral theories to critics (such as deep ecologists, ecofeminists, and others) who hold that the very theoretical stance of our dominant theologies and moral theories is incompatible with a genuinely ethical orientation to the environment.

STV 20282. Health Care Ethics in the Twenty-First Century

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course examines religious and moral questions raised in health care today. Basic concepts in bioethics will be introduced, and a range of contemporary issues in bioethics will be treated, e.g. physician-assisted suicide and euthanasia, organ donation, genetic testing and genetic therapies, and decisions in neonatology. Special emphasis will be given to the contribution of the Roman Catholic moral tradition to contemporary debates.

STV 20304. Energy and Society

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

A course developing the basic ideas of energy and power and their applications from a quantitative and qualitative viewpoint. The fossil fuels (coal, oil, natural gas) are studied, together with their societal limitations (pollution, global warming, diminishing supply). Nuclear power is similarly studied in the context of the societal concerns that arise (radiation, reactor accidents, nuclear weapons proliferation, high-level waste disposal). The opportunities as well as the risks presented by alternative energy resources, in particular solar energy, wind, geothermal, and hydropower, together with various aspects of energy conservation, are developed and discussed. This course is designed for the non-specialist.

STV 20306. Environmental Chemistry

(3-0-3) Kamat

Corequisite: STV 27999

Discussion of basic chemical processes occurring in the environment, particularly those relating to the impact of humanity's technological enterprise.

STV 20411. Evolving Science Fictions

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Science is something that our culture has almost complete faith in; we use its technological products almost every day, without thought, from the vehicles we drive to the medical treatment that we accept. But it is also something that we often feel uneasy about as well: Science is often the harbinger of catastrophe (global warming) and often causes us to question our identity (cloning, embryonic research). This course is designed to let us examine, among other things, the development of science's impressive cultural authority as well as the attendant cultural anxiety. We will begin in the early-19th century, and follow the development of science fiction into the early-21st century. However, we will not be limited to the science-fiction genre; we will examine a number of works and genres that incorporate scientific discourse. Our tentative reading list will include: Mary Shelley's Frankenstein; selections from the poetry of Alfred Tennyson; The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde by Robert Louis Stevenson; War of the Worlds by H.G. Wells; Foundation by Isaac Asimov; short stories by Arthur C. Clarke and Ray Bradbury; Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? by Phillip K. Dick; The Left Hand of Darkness by Ursula K. LeGuin; Oryx and Crake by Margaret Atwood; and Never Let Me Go by Kazuo Ishiguro. We will also read brief selections from scientists and thinkers such as Charles Darwin, Albert Einstein, and Stephen Hawking. Assignments will include two papers, a midterm exam, and a final exam. Short, occasional reading quizzes will also be given.

STV 20413. Science in Fiction

(3-0-3) Benedict

Corequisite: STV 27999

Readings in literature that explore science. Designed for pre-professional students in the colleges of arts and letters and of science.

STV 20419. Brief History of Time/Space/Motion

(3-0-3)

An examination of the historical evolution of the philosophical conceptions of time, space, and motion from Plato to Einstein. Special attention will be paid to the influence of developments in physics on this evolution in philosophical theorizing (and vice versa).

STV 20423. Scientific Images of Human

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Attempts to "biologize" everything from religion and morality to love and friendship appear continuously in the popular and scientific media. Genes for traits as various as homosexuality and chocolate consumption are proposed. How should we revise our understanding of human nature in light of these claims? This course examines the tensions between our images of ourselves as human beings and the portraits that the sciences—especially biology—provide.

STV 20431. Philosophy and Cosmology: A Revolution

(3-0-3) Bland

Corequisite: STV 27999

In the 17th century, there was a revolution in our view of the cosmos and of our own place in it. Most vivid, perhaps was the change from believing that the Earth is at the center of everything to believing that the Earth is just one planet among many orbiting the sun. This course will consider how and why these changes took place.

STV 20435. The Ethics of Energy Conservation

(3-0-3)

This is a joint theology and engineering course exploring the ethics of energy conservation by using the method of community-based learning. Students will begin by using the university campus as a "trial laboratory" for measuring energy efficiency and thinking creatively about possible energy conservation measures. We will then ask them to conduct a limited energy efficiency and conservation study for selected nonprofit organizations in the South Bend community. This course will fulfill a number of civic learning goals, including the cultivation of theological and scientific competence in environmental ethics; the identification of leadership skills necessary to address the concrete concerns facing nonprofit organizations as they strive to meet pressing human needs in an environmentally sound manner; and formation of consciences sensitive to the social responsibility of caring for the environment.

STV 20441. Environmental Studies

(3-0-3)

This course investigates the relationship between the built environment and the natural environment. Lectures, readings, and exercises explore the ethical and professional responsibilities of the architect relative to ongoing environmental issues. Topics include a survey of the effects of the built environment on natural systems, a survey of evolving environmental studies, and design issues with the focus on in-site planning, landscape design, and passive energy measures for architecture.

STV 20452. Ethics, Ecology, Economics, and Energy

(3-0-3)

A critical examination of the following hypotheses: (1) that continuing economic growth requires ever-increasing consumption of energy, (2) that increasing energy consumption results in increasing degradation of the biosphere, and (3) that increasing degradation of the biosphere poses an increasing threat to human existence.

STV 20461. Nuclear Warfare

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Nuclear phenomena; nuclear fission and fusion. Nuclear weapons. Effects of blast, shock, thermal radiation, prompt and delayed nuclear radiation. Fire, fallout, ozone-layer depletion, electromagnetic pulse, "nuclear winter." Medical consequences, physical damage, effects on the individual and on society. Defensive measures and their feasibility. Scenarios for war and peace, proliferation of nuclear weapons material, recent diplomatic history. U.S. Bishops' Pastoral Letter. The course is open to all students and counts for science majors as a general elective credit.

STV 20556. Science, Technology, and Society

(3-0-3) Peterson

Corequisite: STV 22556 AND STV 27999

This course introduces the interdisciplinary field of science and technology studies. Our concern will be with science and technology (including medicine) as social and historical, i.e., as human, phenomena. We shall examine the divergent roots of contemporary science and technology, and the similarities and (sometimes surprising) differences in their methods and goals. The central theme of the course will be the ways in which science and technology interact with other aspects of society, including the effects of technical and theoretical innovation in bringing about social change; and the social shaping of science and technology themselves by cultural, economic, and political forces. Because science/society interactions so frequently lead to public controversy and conflict, we shall also explore what resources are available to mediate such conflicts in an avowedly democratic society.

STV 27999. STV Minor Gateway Course

(0-0-0)

This course is used as a corequisite for administrative purposes so that students in the science, technology, and values minor program will be able to Web-register for other STV courses.

STV 30110. Health, Healing, and Culture

(3-0-3) Lende

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course introduces the field of medical anthropology, which examines beliefs, practices, and experiences of illness, health, and healing from a cross-cultural perspective. This course will consider the ways in which medical anthropology has historically been influenced by debates within the discipline of anthropology, as well as by broader social and political movements. Particular emphasis will be placed on the importance of viewing biomedicine as one among many culturally constructed systems of medicine.

STV 30111. Environmental Sociology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course will explore the relationship between human societies and the larger natural environment of which they are a part. The main focus of the course will be modern society, but we will also review the history of resource use, pollution, wilderness preservation, environmental movements, and other environmental developments. This course is mainly oriented towards a theoretical perspective and will cover different schools of thought to help students understand the ecological world that surrounds them. The course will be divided into four parts (the moral, the material, the ideal, and the practical).

STV 30113. Classical Origins of Medical Terminology

(3-0-3) Ladouceur

Corequisite: STV 27999

Scientists have long recognized that considerable learning in science is based on education in vocabulary. More than 95 percent of medical technical terminology is drawn from Greek and Latin. This complex terminology satisfies a need for precise words to facilitate the exchange of ideas and arose because people of learning employed the classical languages for their concepts and descriptions well into the 19th century. To the modern student without Greek and Latin, terms like hemiballismus, encephalomalacia, and chistosternia are indecipherable. This course will introduce the student to the elements of Greek and Latin sufficient to dissect and decode even the most unusual terms. It will focus on the basic roots, suffixes, and prefixes, but also place them within the intellectual context of ancient and modern medical theories so that the student will come away from the course with some sense of the history of medicine and its language. Lectures on mythical figures will also illuminate the origin of certain bioscientific terms: the extremely poisonous alkaloid atropine, for example, derives its name from Atropos, one of the three sisters of fate who measure out a person's life. Anatomic models and charts will be employed, as well as slides examining a wide range of pathologies.

STV 30132. U.S. Environmental History

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course is an introduction to the new field of environmental history. While many people think “the Environment” suddenly became important with the first “Earth Day” in 1970 (or a few years earlier), environmental issues have in fact long been of central importance. In recent decades, historians have begun actively to explore the past sensibilities of various groups toward the quality of their air, water, and land; the passionate discussions of philosophers, theologians, and social and natural scientists about resource use, the safety of the environment, and long-term prospects for humanity; and the customs, laws, and managerial systems that guided use of the environment. Historians have also increasingly paid attention to the ways environmental factors have affected the course history: the effects of the distribution of water, foodstuffs, wood, minerals, and of changes in climate or endemic disease. This course will range widely—in methodology from the history of ideas to paleoclimatology, geographically from the ancient Near East to modern America; topically from wood-cutting rights in medieval France to the rise of the organic farming movement and water-allocation laws in the 20th-century American west. Lecture discussion format.

STV 30138. Science and Medicine in Ireland: 1600–1900

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course surveys the history of science and medicine in Ireland from the 17th to the 19th centuries. The course will consider the role of science and medicine in Irish social and political life and will offer a fresh dimension to the cultural and intellectual history of Ireland. Lectures will situate scientists and doctors within their historical contexts, showing how intellectual history intersects with political history. Topics will include science as an instrument of colonialism in Cromwellian Ireland, the scientific satires of Jonathan Swift, the role of the medical community during the Great Famine, women in Irish science, and the role of science in the Cultural Revival. Note that no scientific knowledge is assumed or required.

STV 30142. History of Ancient Medicine

(3-0-3) Ladouceur

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course traces the development of medicine in the ancient Mediterranean world, concentrating on the medical beliefs, theories, and practices of the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. The course emphasizes the value of studying written sources such as the Hippocratic treatises and the works of Galen with artistic evidence and human remains. A connection between ancient and modern medicine is made by considering two contrasting models of disease, the biomedical and the biopsychosocial, that figure as the focus of a contemporary debate on health care.

STV 30146. History of Communication Technologies

(3-0-3)

A history of the survival and destruction of books, from Alexandria to the Internet. Our understanding of historical events is based primarily on written evidence. But have you ever stopped to consider how these documents were made, how they were preserved, and how it is that we possess them now? This course questions how we “know” anything about the past by examining the transmission of written sources through time. We will survey the different ways that people have recorded their histories (in stone, on papyrus scrolls, in handwritten and printed books, on websites) and how their choices have affected the way we now understand the past. We will also consider how libraries have helped to create and shape “knowledge” through their accumulation and preservation of these sources.

STV 30149. Environmental Philosophy

(3-0-3)

A philosophically integrated examination of current environmental issues drawing on familiar literature from ecology, economics, and ethics, as well as recent fiction.

STV 30152. History of Western Medicine

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to the history of Western medicine from the pre-Socratics to penicillin; it concludes by applying that history to modern medical questions, including professional identities, emerging diseases, and genetic manipulations. Major themes/topics include changing disease concepts, medical education, medical practitioners, “scientific” medicine, therapeutics, hospitals, and the body; sub-themes include women and medicine, race and medicine, and the patient. Class periods will be divided between lectures and seminars, the latter relying largely on discussions of primary source readings. Students will be encouraged to explore their own particular interests in a research paper.

STV 30153. Madness and Us: A History of Psychiatry from the End of the Eighteenth Century Through the Present

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

The course is a thematic overview of the history of psychiatry from its inception at the end of the 18th century to the present day. It raises issues concerning the nature of the self and its relationship with social compulsion and state power; the connection between body and mind; the nature of disease and illness; the relations between the individual and the expert; and the position of marginal groups (women, colonial subjects, homosexuals, etc.) vis-à-vis social norms and authority.

STV 30154. Gender and Science

(3-0-3) Kourany

Corequisite: STV 27999

An exploration of the ways in which science is gendered, starting with the ways in which women have been excluded from science, and moving through such issues as the invisibility and shabby treatment of women with the products of scientific research, the contributions of women to science and whether these are different in kind from the contributions of men, and the differential effects of science on men's and women's lives.

STV 30155. History of Photography From the 1830s to World War I

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This class examines the evolution of photography from its earliest days to the birth of modernism. Topics to be considered include the invention of the medium, the evolution of photography in the 1850s in France and in Victorian England, and travel photography. In the United States, attention will be paid to the photography of the Civil War, the Western exploratory expeditions, and the rise of the documentary mode. New acquisitions by the Sniite Museum will complement a brief survey of Asian and Latin American 19th-century photographs. Finally, the course will examine the international rise and fall of pictorialism, and the beginnings of the snapshot. Regular visits to view original images from each period will take advantage of the Sniite Museum's extensive holdings of photographs from the various periods studied.

STV 30157. Introduction to the Philosophy of Biology

(3-0-3)

An examination of key concepts and controversies in contemporary biology. The meaning of gene, organism, and environment and their interrelationships in the context of development, evolutionary theory, and ecology are closely considered.

STV 30161. History of Television

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999; STV 31161

This course analyzes the history of television, spanning from its roots in radio broadcasting to the latest developments in digital television. In assessing the many changes across this span, the course will cover such topics as why the American television industry developed as a commercial medium in contrast to most other national television industries; how television programming has both reflected and influenced cultural ideologies through the decades; and how historical patterns of television consumption have shifted due to new technologies and social changes. Through studying the historical development of television programs and assessing the industrial, technological, and cultural systems out of which they emerged, the course will piece together the catalysts responsible for shaping this highly influential medium.

STV 30175. Environmental History

(3-0-3)

This course is an introduction to the new field of environmental history. In recent decades, historians have begun to actively explore the past sensibilities of various groups toward the quality of their air, water, and land; the passionate discussions of philosophers, theologians, and social and natural scientists about resource use, the safety of the environment, and long-term prospects for humanity; and the customs, laws, and managerial systems that guided use of the environment. Historians have also increasingly paid attention to the ways environmental factors have affected the course of history: the effects of the distribution of water, wood, and minerals and of changes in climate or endemic disease. This course ranges widely in methodology from the history of ideas to paleoclimatology, geographically from the ancient Near East to modern America, topically from wood-cutting rights in medieval France to the rise of the organic farming movement and water-allocation laws in the 20th-century American West.

STV 30181. Science and Medicine in the Islamic World: 700–1500

(3-0-3)

This course traces the major trends in the history of Islamic science and medicine from the rise of Islam to the early modern period. By examining the conceptual developments in the practice of science, and its position within Islamic societies, it seeks to assess the merits of the various accounts for the inception, and subsequent fate, of the Islamic scientific enterprise. In particular, we will re-evaluate the standard periodization that posits a linear development of Islamic sciences starting with translation and assimilation of the Persian, Indian, and Greek scientific legacies; then, a period of original contributions; and, finally, the transmission of Islamic sciences to Europe.

STV 30186. History and Photography

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Both history and photography were practices invented and developed in the 19th century, and they share a capacity to illuminate events in the past. Both history and photography can depict human suffering and point to political practices that might alleviate that suffering. Both must grapple with the nature of time. Both, in odd ways, transcend, but also cement, the finality of death. Both promise a form of truthfulness they do not always achieve. Given these similarities, it is no wonder that so many writers have considered them together. Often however, when compared, the distinctive qualities of each come to the fore. By reading about photography and history and by looking at images, students in this course will explore the limits and possibilities of each modern pursuit.

STV 30189. Philosophical Issues in Physics

(3-0-3) Bland

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course is intended for non-science students who desire to begin an examination of the origins of the modern laws of physics and for science students who wish to know the actual route to the discovery and the broader implications of the formal theories with which they are already familiar. The historical background to and philosophical questions associated with major laws of physics will be discussed, in large measure by examining directly relevant excerpts from the writings of some of the creators of seminal concepts and theories in physics. The latter part of the course will concentrate on historical and philosophical issues related to relativity and especially to quantum theory and its interpretation.

STV 30201. Introduction to Clinical Ethics

(3-0-3) Foster

Corequisite: STV 27999

The focus of the course will be an examination of the advances in medicine over the last 30 years that have challenged traditional values and ethical norms, and the institutional processes and procedures in place that facilitate decision making in the health care setting. It will include a sketch of the most recent advances in the various fields of medicine, followed by an examination of the clinical and ethical questions they raise and how they have affected the physician-patient relationship. Note: This course counts as a general elective. Fall and spring.

STV 30310. Global Sustainability

(3-0-3)

This course examines the growing need for addressing "sustainability" as a parameter in the practice of engineering as well as in related disciplines. The course begins with an introduction of the origin of resources on Earth and their fragile connection with life on Earth, both on the ecology and, ultimately, on the human population. The basic laws regulating the flow of energy and materials through ecosystems and the regulation of the distribution and abundance of organisms are reviewed. A model of the interaction between population, resources, and pollution is analyzed based on the World3 model proposed by Meadows, Randers, and Meadows (Limits to Growth, 1972). The model predictions made in 1972 are compared with results compiled in 2002. The model includes analysis of the state of land, soils and food, water, forests, nonrenewable resources, energy, and capital. Emphasis is placed in analyzing energy sustainability and assessment of current and potential future energy systems. This includes availability, extraction, conversion, and end-use to meet regional and global energy needs in the 21st century in a sustainable manner. Different renewable and conventional energy technologies will be discussed and their attributes described within a framework that aids the evaluation and analysis of energy technology systems in a global context. The effect of human activity on the environment with emphasis on climate change will be also analyzed. The World3 model will be used to discuss different scenarios of the state of our planet based on population, industrial output, food, and population, as well as materials standards of living and human welfare and human footprint. The course closes with a discussion of what we can do as engineers and professionals to insure that growth is consistent with a sustainable future.

STV 30311. Introduction to the American Health Care System

(3-0-3) Navari

Corequisite: STV 27999

The course will begin with a short history of the American health care system and will be followed by a discussion of the major components of the system (patients, providers, payers), health insurance coverage, managed care programs, the movement for quality health care, physicians in the changing medical marketplace, health care expenditures, and academic medical centers.

STV 30343. Environmental Politics

(3-0-3) Doppke

Corequisite: STV 27999

The first half of the course provides an overview of major American environmental policies such as regulating land use and preservation, water, air, and endangered species. The second half of the course deals more directly with issues of policy formulation, implementation, and enforcement.

STV 30382. Technology of War and Peace

(3-0-3)

This course surveys the impact of military technologies on world history. Topics include the rise of gunpowder weaponry and the fortification revolution in the early modern period, navalism, particularly in the 19th century, the role of military technologies in European colonial expansion, and the science-based military of the 20th century, leading up to the age of nuclear weapons. The course considers also military technologies as deterrents, and issues of war and peace as stimuli to technological development.

STV 30445. Technologies and Shaping of America

(3-0-3)

This course assumes a basic knowledge of American history, and offers a social history of the ways Americans have woven technologies into everyday life. Focusing primarily on the 19th and 20th centuries, it will show how shifts in technological systems are inextricably linked to changes in class relations, national identity, patterns of consumption, and definitions of the self, including race and gender. The short survey text will be Carroll Pursell, The Machine in America (Johns Hopkins University Press), supplemented by primary sources and case studies, such as David E. Nye, Electrifying America (MIT Press). Visual materials will be emphasized in class, including paintings, photography, maps, and film.

STV 30476. Place, Environment, and Society in Australia and Melanesia

(3-0-3)

Aboriginal Australian and Melanesian approaches to place have long intrigued and puzzled outsiders, challenging commonly held assumptions about the division between nature and culture or between human societies and their physical environments. This course introduces students to some of these exotic approaches to place and encourages them to see their own environment in a new way. It also considers how indigenous Melanesian and Australian conceptualizations of place are being transformed through engagement with a global capitalist economy and in the context of modern nation states. How do notions of place change when land becomes a commodity? How are shifting connections to place transformed into legal ownership? What happens when kin networks are divided by national boundaries? Students will read several ethnographic monographs that convey a holistic sense of social life in particular locales. Topics that may be of particular interest include mythic and ritual relationships to the land; connections between language, place, and cultural identity; the ways that modern states enforce geographic boundaries; legal battles for land rights; and the relationship between global environmentalism and indigenous people.

STV 33195. Technology and Social Change

(3-0-3)

This class examines how technology has often served as the catalyst for social change for hundreds (indeed, thousands) of years (and vice versa). The course will be divided into several sections, some of which will trace from a historical perspective the social impact of specific technologies. Other course sections will examine technology and social change in specific contexts (e.g., the medical and communication contexts). The first portion of the class will be devoted to some of the basic issues in our collective understanding of technology and social change. Issues such as de-skilling of workers, institutionalization of technology into society, and innovation will be examined, as will various approaches to understanding technology, such as the social construction of technology and technological determinism.

STV 33370. Economics of Science

(3-0-3) Mirowski

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course describes the changing history of the organization and subsidy of scientific research, then surveys the different methods of economic theories and applied scientific process.

STV 33401. Animal Welfare and the Human-Animal Bond: Community-Based Learning Seminar

(1-0-1) Whaley

Corequisite: STV 27999

Consider the fact that in six short years, one female dog and her offspring can give birth to 67,000 puppies. In seven years, one cat and her young can produce 420,000 kittens. Three to four million dogs and cats are euthanized each year. It is estimated that there are 60 million feral cats in the United States. In a society that considers pets as part of their family, watches Animal Planet, and spends millions of dollars on pet products, it is imperative that we acknowledge and educate ourselves on the issues of overpopulation of pet animals in our society. What is our responsibility to these animals, and how can we solve these pressing problems? The focus of this course will be on animal behavior from an evolutionary perspective. The students will learn to recognize both desirable and undesirable behaviors in pet animals. They will learn how to use evolutionary behavior training methods to alter detrimental behaviors and reinforce those that are advantageous. This course will also cover animal welfare issues, and will intimately and meaningfully connect the state of humans, to that of animals. The students will carry out community research projects of their choice and will immerse themselves in an important issue and generate a product that can help the plight of animals (and therefore humans) in our community.

STV 40113. Computer as Social Phenomenon

(3-0-3)

This course takes the perspective of "science studies" and applies it to issues that do not fit easily into either computer science or economics. These include: Does the computer have a well-defined existence? How has the computer influenced our theories of human nature? Is the "new information economy" a real phenomenon? It also deals with some emerging issues in Internet commerce.

STV 40118. Witchcraft and the Occult

(3-0-3)

The history of witches, witchcraft, and the occult sciences fascinate and challenge historians. This course explores these related histories and seeks to develop a historically sensitive understanding of them. Modern science has banished much of the belief in witchcraft, magic, spirits, and the various occult sciences. Historians often trace the triumph of science over the forces of superstition back to the High Renaissance and the Scientific Revolution of the 16th and 17th centuries. It was, however, precisely this period that witnessed some of the most fervent persecution of witches and eager pursuit of the occult sciences and forms of divination. The numbers of witches executed was not as great as commonly thought, but the notoriety of some cases and the widespread use of the concept “witch” as a derogatory category considerably shaped the definition of womanhood and female. In the sciences, people such as Kepler, Galileo, and Newton were as interested in transmuting metals and casting horoscopes as they were in developing the sciences of astronomy and physics. Moreover, alchemy, astrology, black magic, and natural magic all occupied important places in the political and social world of the 16th and 17th centuries. Although the powers and efficacy attributed to witchcraft, witches, and the occult sciences varied widely, scarcely anyone rejected them. By combining a close reading of primary sources—ranging from texts to trial records to paintings and literature—with secondary sources, we will confront the challenges these activities pose for our understanding of the past and, indeed, the present.

STV 40119. Monsters, Cyborgs, and Other Created Bodies

(3-0-3)

A critical analysis of monsters, cyborgs, and other “created bodies” in literature.

STV 40121. Human Diversity

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Issues concerning the nature of human diversity (race, intelligence, sex, gender, etc.) are a continuing source of social and scientific debate. This course is designed to present the issues and methods used by physical anthropologists to study both the biological basis of human differences, as well as the ongoing process of human adaptation and evolution in response to climate, nutrition, and disease. Integration of the social, biological, and medical sciences will be employed to investigate modern human variation.

STV 40122. Methods in Medical Anthropology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This class will provide extensive classroom and hands-on training in research methods for medical anthropology. It will place slightly greater emphasis on qualitative methods, such as participant observation and interviewing, but will provide an overview of quantitative methods (including building surveys and some basic statistical analysis). Students will learn by doing, conducting original research on contemporary health issues in the local community (such as HIV/AIDS and substance abuse).

STV 40125. Gender and Health

(3-0-3) Smith

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course looks at the intersection of gender, health policy, and health care organization around the world. Some of the issues to be discussed include medicalization of the female body; critical medical anthropology; the politics of reproduction; social production of illness and healing; politics, poverty, and health; and national and international health and development policies.

STV 40126. Philosophy of Cognitive Science

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

In this course, we will explore three main topics: philosophical foundations of cognitive science, philosophical critiques of contemporary cognitive science, and the implications of cognitive research for traditional philosophical issues. The first part of the course will examine the ways in which certain philosophical theories about the mind provide support for the basic assumptions of cognitive science, while others have challenged these assumptions. In the second part we will look at specific ways empirical work in psychology is thought to be relevant to issues in philosophy of mind, epistemology, philosophy of science, and other areas of philosophical inquiry. Questions to be addressed will include the following: Is it possible for a computer to be conscious? Are we born with certain kinds of knowledge? To what extent are humans rational creatures? What is the relevance of neuroscience to psychology, and vice versa?

STV 40130. Crime, Heredity, and Insanity in American History

(3-0-3)

The 19th century witnessed a transformation in the understanding of the origins of criminal behavior in the United States. For many, a religious emphasis on humankind as sinful gave way to a belief in its inherent goodness. But if humans were naturally good, how could their evil actions be explained? Drawing on studies done here and abroad, American doctors, preachers, and lawyers debated whether environment, heredity, or free will determined the actions of the criminal. By the early 20th century, lawyers and doctors had largely succeeded in medicalizing criminality. Psychiatrists treated criminals as patients; judges invoked hereditary eugenics in sentencing criminals. Science, not sin, had apparently become the preferred mode of explanation for the origins of crime. But was this a better explanation than what had come before? Discussion will be the primary form of instruction.

STV 40135. Philosophy of Science

(3-0-3) Pitts

Corequisite: STV 27999

Does science represent a distinct way of knowing, set apart from other forms of knowledge by the security and universality of its claims? What is the basis of scientific knowledge? What are its methods? What are its scope and limits? This course will provide a survey of the major concepts and issues examined in contemporary philosophy of science, including explanation, confirmation, the role of convention in science, and the realism/instrumentalism debate. The emphasis will be on the way these issues have been treated in the mainstream analytic tradition during the 20th century, but we will also look at challenges to that tradition deriving from such sources as Thomas Kuhn’s historicist approach to the philosophy of science, social constructivism, and feminist philosophy of science.

STV 40137. Philosophy of Mathematics

(3-0-3) Bays

Corequisite: STV 27999

A survey of central issues in the philosophy of mathematics.

STV 40140. Science and Social Values

(3-0-3)

A consideration of such questions as: Should science be value-free, or should it be shaped by the needs and ideals of the society that supports it? If the former, how can scientists shaped by society contribute to it, and what claim to the resources of the society can scientists legitimately make? If the latter, how can scientists still claim to be objective?

STV 40144. Religion and Science

(3-0-3)

An examination of the nature and limits of both scientific and religious knowledge, and a discussion of several cases in which science and religion seem to either challenge or support one another.

STV 40147. History/Design Forms, Values, and Technology

(3-0-3)

This course will provide a historical perspective on the development of industrial, product, and graphic design in the 19th and 20th centuries. More than the aesthetic styling of products, design mediates the intersection of technology and cultural values in the modern era. The role of the modern designer as both a facilitator and a critic of industrial technology will be examined.

STV 40151. Psychology and Medicine

(3-0-3) White

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course has two basic objectives. First, it examines from a lifespan and psychological perspective the factors that place individuals at different stages of life at risk for illness and assist them in maintaining their health. In addition, it addresses a variety of challenging psychological and social issues that physicians and other healthcare professionals must face in the practice of medicine. The course covers a range of topics dealing with health issues related to different stages of human development (childhood, adolescence, and adulthood), disabled populations, culture and gender, stress, physician-patient interactions, death and dying, professional ethics, and social policies relating to health care. The course is primarily intended for students intending to enter medical school. Most classes will involve brief formal presentations by the instructors and invited guests, followed by discussion of assigned readings pertinent to the day's topic. In addition, students will be exposed, through a limited practicum, to a variety of medical settings.

STV 40152. History of Medicine to 1700

(3-0-3)

The course surveys the history of Western biomedical ideas, research, and health care practices from its ancient Mediterranean and Middle Eastern foundations to the medical reforms and materialistic theories of the mid-18th century. The canonical approach emphasizes the growth of rational medicine, focusing on the development of medical epistemology and method, but also considers how medicine as it has been practiced in the West reflected classical theory, embraced folk beliefs and treatments, and integrated the therapeutic and doctrinal knowledge of Medieval Islam. Medical thought and practice was shaped by the intellectual, social, and religious changes that shook Europe in the late Middle Ages and early modern period, resulting in a profound transformation of natural philosophy and efforts to reform society during the scientific revolution and nascent Enlightenment. Many of the basic elements of modern medical ethics, research methodology, and the criteria for sound scientific thinking that first emerged in late classical Greek thought were refined during this period, and much of the diversity of healing paradigms in American and European national cultures today, as well as many of the reactions of Western medical authorities to non-Western ideas and practices, can be understood if viewed in the context of antecedent medical principles.

STV 40153. Visits to Bedlam

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Literary, medical, and social views of madness in the 18th century.

STV 40154. Cultural Aspects of Clinical Medicine

(3-1-4) Wolosin

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course focuses on social science approaches to sickness and healing. The medical encounter is examined from anthropological perspectives. The course emphasizes the difficulties traditional biomedicine has in addressing patients' expectations for care. Students serve an internship as patient ombudsman in a local hospital emergency room four hours per week. Students MUST have access to transportation to participate in the ER internships. Students are required to sign a waiver, present evidence of immunizations, and receive a TB skin test.

STV 40155. Christ and Prometheus: Evaluation/Technology

(3-0-3)

The history of technology in Western culture has been influenced in complex ways by religious and theological conceptions. These include understandings of what it means to be created in the image and likeness of God, the value of intra-mundane work in a world marred by sin and thus passing away, and understandings of sin as prideful self-assertion (the sin of Prometheus). For many, technology has represented the primordial temptation, "you shall be like gods." For others, technology has been a privileged way for human beings to fulfill the mandate to flourish and subdue creation, and even to cooperate with the divine work of redeeming humankind by restoring through our technological prowess the broken image and likeness in humanity. This course will examine the diverse historical connections between the rise of technology in Western Christian societies and Christian religious self-understanding, reading from figures such as St. Augustine and Francis Bacon. We will also consider two divergent modern evaluations of the theological significance of our contemporary technological society: that of Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, and that of Jacques Ellul.

STV 40157. Philosophy of Biology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

An examination of key concepts and controversies in contemporary biology. The meaning of gene, organism, and environment and their interrelationships in the context of development, evolutionary theory, and ecology are closely considered.

STV 40166. History of Modern Astronomy

(3-0-3)

The course traces the development of astronomy and cosmology from the late-17th century to the 1930s. Attention is given to the interactions of astronomy with other areas of science and with philosophical, religious, and social factors.

STV 40167. Global Food Systems

(3-0-3)

This is a course on food in society. The role food plays in the life course of a society may seem self-evident or commonplace to some. Yet food is more than the physical substances that sustain life. Food is intertwined with religion and central to many rites and rituals. Food is linked to medicine, which was largely based on dietary principles until well into the 18th century. Technology related to production of food has affected the inequalities found in all societies. The politics of food plays a major role in understanding the "social issues" affecting many nations around the globe. This is a fascinating area of study: That which we take for granted so much of the time is intertwined with economics, politics, psychology, social life, and law.

STV 40172. History of Chinese Medicine

(3-0-3) Murray

Corequisite: STV 27999

In light of the contemporary currency of certain Chinese practices in the field of alternative medicine, this course will explore the phenomenon of Chinese traditional medicine in both its historical and contemporary settings. The first unit, Medicine in Ancient China, will explore the earliest medical ideas of the Chinese and will demonstrate how the state's political unification gave rise to a correlative cosmology that not only included Heaven and Earth, but also human beings as integral elements of an organic cosmos. The second unit will explore the influences and contributions of Taoism (Daoism) and Buddhism to Chinese medicine and will explore what it meant to be both physicians and patients in late imperial China. The third unit will focus on medicine in contemporary China and will feature the experiences of Elisabeth Hsu, a student of Chinese medical anthropology who, as a part of her doctoral research, enrolled as a student in Yunnan Traditional Chinese Medical College between September 1988 and December 1989. We will conclude the course with a brief examination of the influence of Chinese medicine on the contemporary world.

STV 40174. Philosophy and Psychiatry in the Twentieth Century

(3-0-3)

The course deals with (1) the intellectual history of psychiatry from the time of Freud and Kraepelin to the present, (2) the social history of the care of the mentally ill since World War II, and (3) the interpretation and critique of Freud and psychiatry.

STV 40181. Philosophy of Human Biology

(3-0-3)

The course examines central issues in the philosophy of science from the perspective of the life sciences with particular emphasis on topics in evolution theory and sociobiology and upon the topic of inter-theoretical integration in the life sciences (from organic chemistry to cognitive neuroscience). Topics to be covered include teleology; reductionism and supervenience; the biological basis of cognition, explanation, scientific realism, and theory change; and the critical appraisal of alternate research strategies.

STV 40186. Medicine and Public Health in U.S. History

(3-0-3)

An exploration of themes in European and American medicine. This course integrates the perspectives and issues of social history—who were the medical practitioners, who were their patients, what relations existed between these groups, how have the realities of illness and death figured in the lives of ordinary people in different places and time—with the perspectives and issues of the history or medicine as a science: What understandings of the human body and its ills have practitioners had? What tools have they developed and used for intervening in illnesses? Topics include the humoral pathology, epidemics as social crises, the rise of pathological anatomy, the germ theory and public health, the transformation of the hospital, the history of nursing, changing modes of health care, finance and administration, and relations between “regular” doctors and sectarian medical traditions such as homeopathy and osteopathy.

STV 40187. Technology in History

(3-0-3)

A thematic survey of the history of technology, from the Neolithic discovery of agriculture to the information age. Topics include the chemistry and metallurgy of antiquity (high-tech ca. 1000 B.C.), technology in Christian theology; the power revolution of 1200; arms races from the 15th century onward; the marriage of art and science; the industrial, agricultural, transport and communications revolutions; the American system of manufactures; the evolution of the engineering profession; and modern efforts to plan the technological future. These topics form the basis for exploring the following themes: How does technology change? How did we get where we are—do we have the technology now that we must have, should have, or need to have? What guides technical creativity? How have social effects of technologies been assessed and dealt with? How have technologies fundamentally changed ordinary life and societal organization?

STV 40203. Theology of Medicine

(3-0-3)

An examination of moral problems in medicine in the context of key theological themes, e.g., creation, providence, the nature of Christian personhood, suffering and redemption, freedom and grace. Various normative problems will be explored, e.g., physician-assisted suicide, artificial reproduction, and access to health care.

STV 40216. Biomedical Ethics, Scientific Evidence and Public Health Risk

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

Corequisite: STV 27999

An analysis of the ethical theories provided by contemporary philosophers to guide research and practice in biomedicine. The course will focus on analysis of contemporary public health problems created by environmental/technological pollution and will address classic cases of biomedical ethics problems. Students who are not pre-med, engineering, or science majors need the professor's permission to take this course.

STV 40230. Internet and Society

(3-0-3) Monaghan

This course will spend the semester studying the impact the World Wide Web has had on several key areas of our society, including communications, commerce, marketing, productivity, education, collaboration, and our sense of community. Through a combination of discussion, group presentation, guest lectures, and out-of-class research, students will be exposed to some of the profound effects this medium has had on our culture. In spite of the bursting of the dot com bubble, the Web has left all of the abovementioned areas substantially changed, many for the long term. The positive and negative forces brought on by this technology must be recognized, studied, and dealt with if we are to truly embrace the momentous opportunities brought about by the World Wide Web.

STV 40275. Ethical and Professional Issues in Computer Science and Engineering

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course seeks to develop a solid foundation for reasoning about the difficult ethical, professional, and social controversies that arise in the computing field. Emphasis is placed on identifying the appropriate legal and professional context and applying sound critical thinking skills in the analysis of a problem. The course relies heavily on analysis of real-life case studies, both historical and current. Topics covered include professional codes of ethics, privacy issues, freedom of speech issues, computer security, safety-critical systems, whistle-blowing scenarios, intellectual property issues in computing technology, and social transformation driven by computing technology.

STV 40304. Sustainable Energy

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

The course provides a comprehensive treatment of the role of energy in society. After reviewing the benefits and problems associated with today's dependence on fossil fuels, attention is directed to the opportunities and challenges of transitioning to a sustainable energy future. Course content is developed along two essential and interrelated tracks, one scientific/technical and the other socio/economic/political.

STV 40319. Self, Society, and Environment

(3-0-3) Weigert

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course introduces students to social psychological aspects of the natural environment. Issues considered include interacting with different environments, symbolic transformations of environments, competing accounts, and claims concerning environments. With an overview of basic information, these issues are discussed from the perspectives of individual self and sociocultural institutions. The course touches on alternative ways of envisioning, interacting, and valuing human-environment relations with an eye toward individual and collective change.

STV 40325. GLOBES: Humans Genetic Environment

(3-0-3) Hollocher

Globally humans inhabit and alter landscapes creating anthropogenic ecologies impacting all resident organisms. The distribution and structuring of genomes, the movement and virulence of pathogens, and the patterns of coexistence of organisms are all interconnected at multiple levels. In this course we focus on the dynamic transaction between organisms and environments at these multiple levels, with a specific consideration of impacts on health, interspecies interfaces, and population genetics. We will consider theoretical perspectives and specific examples from population genetics, ecology, evolutionary biology, anthropology, and political ecology to examine scenarios of interaction between humans, genes, and the environment. Objectives: (1) understand the transactional nature of organism-environment interactions and the importance of collaboration in its study; (2) recognize the importance of considering disparate theoretical perspectives in understanding the patterns and processes of behavioral, genetic, and cultural interactions in anthropogenic contexts; (3) gain the ability to construct scenarios and plans of approach to issues facing humans, genes, and the environment integrating diverse disciplinary orientations.

STV 40347. Health Economics

(3-0-3) Evans

Corequisite: STV 27999

The first segment of the course demonstrates how economics can be applied to the analysis of the health care sector. The second part focuses upon the pending policy debate of how we as a society will provide for the health care needs of the elderly.

STV 40357. Computer Ethics and Public Policy

(3-0-3)

The profound impact computer technology has on society is difficult to overstate; it has changed the nature of our interactions in the social, economic, and political realms and will continue to do so. These changes often raise important ethical questions about personal and professional responsibility, intellectual property, personal privacy, crime, and security. They also raise questions about the changing relationships between individuals and institutions (i.e., private sector corporations and public sector agencies). This course examines these trends and changing relationships, and the ethical issues that are faced by computer professionals, policymakers, and computer users in trying to grapple with them.

STV 40360. Science and Environmental Policy in the United States

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This class will meet in a seminar format. We'll examine the history of U.S. scientific and environmental policy from 1850 to the present day. Particular attention will be paid to what kinds of research are funded by the federal government in each period and how this reflects the changing concerns of the populace. We also examine the role of both the executive and legislative branches of government in supporting science and identify interest groups that have been influential in shaping science policy. Attending a conference on The Commerce and Politics of Science, being held at Notre Dame this fall, will be required of students in this course. This will introduce students to two central concerns: first, how do commercial and political interests shape scientific inquiry, knowledge, and practice, both now and in the past? Second, is it possible to say that one or another economic or political context is favorable or unfavorable to science or more likely or less likely to produce "good science"? The final portion of the course will be devoted to case studies in current scientific and environmental policy. Students will be required to research the development of a particular policy—stem cell research, the clean air act, the space station—and present to the class and analysis of both the history of the policy and an evaluation of its impact on public life.

STV 40401. The Future of Energy

(3-0-3)

This 3-credit course provides a comprehensive treatment of the role of energy in society and may be taken concurrently by engineering and non-engineering students. It proceeds along two parallel tracks, one dealing with the scientific/technical foundations of energy utilization and the other with its economic, political, environmental, and ethical implications. Scientific/technical issues will be treated at a level that is appropriate for non-engineers and at the same time beneficial to both engineers and non-engineers. The required background in mathematics is largely confined to high school algebra, with occasional use of elementary concepts from differential and integral calculus.

STV 40402. Wireless Communications: The Technology and Impact of 24/7 Connectivity

(3-0-3)

This survey-style course offers an opportunity to gain a basic understanding of the technical, regulatory and business aspects of the wireless revolution and its impact on society. It is intended for both engineering and non-engineering students. The course will include such topics as the representation, transmission, and reception of information in electrical form, the physical properties of radio signals and other wireless media, the principles and challenges of sharing a common medium, and privacy and security issues, as well as the social and commercial implications of wireless communications.

STV 40403. Nanotechnology: Opportunities and Challenges

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course will provide a comprehensive introduction to the emerging fields of nano science and nano engineering, with an emphasis on the main ideas and concepts. Through directed readings and discussion, students will study the scientific underpinnings, and explore the societal impact and ethical implications of nanotechnology. They will also explore the potential for nanotechnology to impact a wealth of innovative applications across a vast array of fields including health care, environment, biotechnology, energy and food production, information technologies, and aerospace.

STV 40420. Information Security

(3-0-3)

This course provides the students with a working knowledge of information security topics through a focus on best practices, applications and implementation strategies. Students will learn the fundamental principles of information security and explore contemporary topics in the field, including access control methodologies, business continuity/disaster recovery planning, firewalls, network security, operating system security, intrusion detection, cryptography, and incident handling.

STV 40424. Technology and Development in History

(3-0-3)

Technologies are often seen as either the product of human genius and achievement, or as an alienating, inhuman, and sometimes destructive force. Both perspectives argue that technological change has been one of the most important forces shaping world history over recent centuries. This course examines technological developments and theories of technological change in world history. It focuses on the relationship between new technologies, social change, and economic development since 1750, surveying cases from Britain, the United States, China, Japan, and Latin America. We will pay special attention to technology transfers: the movement of new machines and processes and knowledge from one society to another, and the ways that social, cultural, and political forces have shaped technological change in different parts of the world.

STV 40434. Human Diversity

(3-0-3)

Issues concerning the nature of human diversity (race, intelligence, sex, gender, etc.) are a continuing source of social and scientific debate. This course is designed to present the issues and methods used by physical anthropologists to study both the biological basis of human differences, as well as the ongoing process of human adaptation and evolution in response to climate, nutrition, and disease. Integration of the social, biological, and medical sciences will be employed to investigate modern human variation.

STV 40435. Methods in Medical Anthropology

(3-0-3)

This class will provide extensive classroom and hands-on training in research methods for medical anthropology. It will place slightly greater emphasis on qualitative methods, such as participant observation and interviewing, but will provide an overview of quantitative methods (including building surveys and some basic statistical analysis). Students will learn by conducting original research on contemporary health issues in the local community (such as HIV/AIDS and substance abuse).

STV 40498. Energy and Climate

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course integrates the principles of physical sciences and engineering as they pertain to energy, its sources, and uses, and the impact of these on the environment. The great majority of energy used by society comes from fossil fuels. The consequences are that carbon dioxide levels in the atmosphere have been increasing and that readily available sources of oil have been depleted. Prospects for sustainable energy use will be discussed including an engineering cost/benefit analysis of different sources. A question that will be examined in particular detail, is the effect of energy use on climate change both now and in the future. To do this we will analyze the complex couplings and feedback mechanisms that operate between the geosphere, the biosphere, the atmosphere, and the hydrosphere as related to global climate change.

STV 43111. The Life and Works of Darwin

(3-0-3) Ramsey

Corequisite: STV 27999

Through Darwin's work and biographic material about Darwin, we examine his ideas as well as the social context in which these Ideas were developed.

STV 43112. Darwin, Philosophy, and Religion

(3-0-3) Ramsey

Corequisite: STV 27999; STV 43113

This course examines the life and work of Darwin in its historical context and investigates the continuing impact of Darwinism on how we see the natural world and our place in it.

STV 43113. Darwin, Philosophy, and Religion

(3-0-3) Ashley

Corequisite: STV 27999; STV 43112

This course examines the life and work of Darwin in its historical context and investigates the continuing impact of Darwinism on how we see the natural world and our place in it. The year 2009 marks both the 200th anniversary of Darwin's birth and the 150th anniversary of the publication of his On the Origin of Species. The Origin has had a profound effect, not just on biology, but also on how we think about ourselves, about human nature, religion, and morality. This class will begin by reading Darwin (the Origin and excerpts from Descent of Man) and biographical material about Darwin's life. We will then embark on an exploration of the impact of Darwin's ideas, focusing on their theological and philosophical implications. This class will provide a deeper understanding of the birth and context of Darwin's ideas and their ongoing significance in the 21st century. Requirements include in-class participation (including occasional presentations), some activities outside of class (including attending some films and a conference on the ND campus, as well as two brief out-of-state field trips), a midterm, and final paper.

STV 43131. Philosophy of the Human Sciences

(3-0-3)

An inquiry into the central forms of explanation employed in the social sciences: rational choice, intentional, functional, structural, and interpretive. One emphasis will be on understanding the ways in which these approaches conform to or differ from explanatory strategies in the natural sciences. A second emphasis will be on the micro-foundations of social theory: What assumptions about human nature and social life are presupposed in adopting a particular explanatory strategy?

STV 43134. Addiction, Science, and Values

(3-0-3)

Students will be introduced to topics in the ethics of care for the indigent; to alternative therapies for recovery and maintenance; and to current brain models of addiction. They will be placed as volunteers (for 14 weeks) with institutions serving indigent recovering addicts in St. Joseph and Elkhart counties.

STV 43136. Nature in America

(3-0-3)

A seminar designed to explore the concept of nature in the American historical and contemporary experience within an interdisciplinary context of art, history, literature, and ecology. In addition to weekly reading discussions, the seminar will meet, on a number of occasions, at several "nature" sights: Morris Conservatory and Muessel-Ellison Tropical Gardens; Potawatomi Zoo, Elkhart Environmental Center; Shiojiri Niwa Japanese Garden; Fernwood Botanical Garden and Nature Preserve; University of Notre Dame Greene-Nieuwland Herbarium. Purpose: To study nature in American art (painting, photography, sculpture). Seminar meetings will be held at the Snite Museum of Art; South Bend Regional Museum of Art; South Bend Regional Museum of Art; and the Midwest Museum of American Art.

STV 43169. The Darwinian Revolution

(3-0-3)

A combined historical and philosophical approach to the revolution created by the work of Charles Darwin. The course deals with the origins of Darwinism; the 19th-century debate over evolution; the subsequent development of mathematical and genetic approaches to natural selection theory; and the formulation of neosynthetic evolutionary theory. The course will close with consideration of more recent developments connected to developmental genetics, punctuated equilibrium theory, and chaos-theoretical approaches to evolution. Students will be introduced to the historical and philosophical literature of current interest.

STV 43171. History and Conceptual Foundations of Space/Time

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

An introduction to contemporary metaphysics and its relation to the philosophy of science. Three topics to be covered in depth are special relativity, the debate over relative and absolute space, and Kant's views on space.

STV 43243. Ethics and Science

(3-0-3)

Use of four ethical theories and five classical logical/analytical criteria to ethically evaluate case studies in contemporary science. Problems analyzed via contemporary science include practical issues of plagiarism, attribution, peer reviewing, data sharing, data ownership, collaborative science, scientific misconduct, paternalism, whistle blowing, conflicts of interest, secrecy in science, and advocacy in science. Methodological issues to be dealt with include scientists misrepresenting their opinions with confirmed science, cooking and trimming their data, failure to attend to the purposes for which their research may be used or misused, and scientists' use of evaluative presuppositions, questionable inferences and default rules, question-begging validation and benchmarking, and misleading statistics.

STV 43279. Joint Seminar: Philosophy/Theology

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

The topic of the joint seminar is determined each year by the assigned faculty members.

STV 43283. Ethics and Risk

(3-0-3)

An investigation of classical ethical papers, all in contemporary, analytic, and normative ethics, that attempt to develop the ethical theory necessary to deal with legitimate imposition of risk of harm.

STV 43328. Politics and Science Policy

(3-0-3)

This class will meet in seminar format. We will examine the general process for science policymaking and emphasize the role played by politics in several specific science programs such as the space program and the Human Genome Project. The first part of the seminar will be devoted to an overview of science policy in the United States, to provide students with a grounding in how science has generally been undertaken by the federal government up until World War II. We will also examine the role of both the executive and legislative branches of government in supporting science and identify interest groups that have been influential in shaping science policy. The final portion of the course will require students to undertake an actual exercise in budget allocation, based on budget figures for various science programs in the federal government. The readings for the class will consist of excerpts from several books about science policy and politics, federal budget documents, and potentially transcripts of Congressional committee hearings. Students will be evaluated on the basis of one essay exam, one presentation, a group project (the budget exercise), and one research paper. Class participation will also be evaluated toward the final grade.

STV 43363. Spy Culture: Surveillance, Privacy, and Society

(3-0-3)

Whether it be surveillance cameras “watching” us in public places, “spyware” planted on our computers, webcams broadcasting our daily activities, “reality” programs on television, tracking technologies in cars and cell phones, easy availability of spy satellite imagery, or cell phone cameras surreptitiously taking pictures that are posted on the Web, more and more we are bombarded with the images and realities of surveillance. This course will examine various aspects of surveillance in society (technological, psychological, cultural, and historical) in various contexts (commercial, military, national security, and law enforcement). We will draw on psychology literature to discuss the different feelings involved in our dichotomous roles of purveyor and target of surveillance. Our discussions will also draw on examples from various media, such as television, film, advertising, literature, websites, and music.

STV 43364. Technology, Privacy, and Civil Liberties

(3-0-3)

This seminar will examine the many ways in which technology has had (and is having) an impact on civil liberties in the United States. It will also explore how technology affects privacy in the United States and other countries. We will explore various technologies and applications, such as information technology, genetic profiling, radio-frequency identification tags, data mining, thermal imaging, and bio-behavioral technologies (e.g., “functional MRI” of the brain). The course will also examine exactly what we mean by “civil liberties,” by focusing on the U.S. Constitution and Supreme Court case law. We will also examine U.S. law and European Union directives on privacy, to compare and contrast the approaches each takes to protecting personal privacy vis-à-vis information technologies, in particular. The course will rely on the Constitution, case law, texts, and newspapers and magazines as its core reading material.

STV 43396. Environmental Justice

(3-0-3) Shrader-Frechette

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course will survey environmental impact assessment (EIA), ecological risk assessment (ERA), and human-health risk assessment (HHRA); and ethical and methodological issues related to these techniques; then apply these techniques to contemporary assessments for which state and federal governments are seeking comments by scientists and citizens. The course is hands-on, will have no tests, but will be project-based, with students working on actual assessments that they choose (about 2,500 are done in the United States each year). The goal will be to teach students EIA, ERA, and HHRA and how to evaluate draft analyses, particularly those used to site facilities or make environment-related decisions in which poor people, minorities, and other stakeholders are themselves unable to provide comments. Course will cover flaws in scientific method and flaws in ethics that typically appear in these assessments. Students who are not pre-med, engineering, or science majors need the professor’s permission to take this course.

STV 43409. Evolutionary Psychology and the Sacred

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

Anthropologists and archeologists have long argued that religious rituals and sacrificial ceremonies addressing the most serious aspects of human life are prehistoric and antedate the development of spoken language, perhaps by hundreds of thousands of years. Today evolutionary psychologists look at evidence suggesting that the concept of the sacred arises naturally from the “functional architecture” of the evolved human mind. We take a critical look at the possibility of integrating those two currents of thought.

STV 43414. Abortion, Euthanasia, and Capital Punishment

(3-0-3)

This course involves an examination of recent philosophical work on abortion, euthanasia, and capital punishment. Though the focus is on the philosophical debates, some attention is given to relevant legal and public policy discussions.

STV 43445. The Internet—Interpretations

(3-0-3)

This is not a “how to” course, nor an explanation of hardware and software. Rather, we will explore the different stories, or narratives, that Americans invented to make sense of the Internet c. 1990. For the last decade, there has been an explosion of writing on this subject, with every conceivable position represented, whether Marxist, liberal, capitalist, feminist, Luddite, etc. On one level, this is an interdisciplinary seminar that combines some literature and film with analytical readings. On another level, we will concern ourselves with historiography (i.e., case studies of the different interpretations of a new technology, the traditions from which these interpretations come, which social groups tend to make what arguments, and examples of similar arguments made in the past about previous new technologies, notably the telegraph, film, radio, and television.) The goal of the seminar is to engage students in the history of technology as a general subject and to show the value of a humanistic approach.

STV 43470. Molecular Revolution

(3-0-3)

Corequisite: STV 27999

This course offers a historical and philosophical analysis of the origins and development of the molecular revolution in biology that broke into full public view in the early 1950s with dramatic discoveries of the molecular structure of DNA and the biophysical mechanism of the action potential in the nervous system. The course will approach this with an analysis of the development of the chemistry and physics of living materials from Lavoisier and the German biophysical school (Helmholtz), through the remarkable advances in physiology of the French school (Bernard) and the development of genetics. The course will terminate in the examination of molecular approaches in contemporary work in human genetics (the Human Genome Project).

STV 43496. Is There an Environmental Crisis?

(3-0-3) Howard

Corequisite: STV 27999

Whether one believes there is an environmental crisis or not, we should all be aware of the changes in our world (growing world populations, increased burning of hydrocarbons, etc.) that are hypothesized to produce threats to our ecosystems. Understanding why human actions might be producing global changes is a complex task. This course will concentrate on the roles that various disciplines (e.g., economics, materials science, biology, psychology, theology) might play in understanding and (perhaps) alleviating human-produced environmental changes.

STV 46197. Directed Readings—Human Dimensions

(3-0-3)

Directed readings in the 1st cluster— Human Dimensions of Science and Technology

STV 46297. Directed Readings— Ethics

(3-0-3)

Directed readings in the 2nd Cluster—Science, Technology, and Ethics

STV 46397. Directed Readings—Public Policy

(3-0-3)

Directed readings in the 3rd Cluster—Science, Technology, and Public Policy.

STV 46497. Directed Readings/Research

(V-0-V)

Independent research or readings taken under the supervision of an STV faculty member. An approved proposal for the research/readings will be filed with the STV office. (In order to receive STV credit, the student’s proposal will need to be approved by the faculty member supervising the student’s research/readings and by the director of the STV program.)

Poverty Studies

PS 10000. Introduction to Poverty Studies

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to academic research about the nature and consequences of poverty (in both advanced and developing nations), highlighting the contributions of scholars from the social sciences, humanities, and the law. We begin by examining several multifaceted definitions of poverty put forth by governments and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and by mapping the incidence of poverty (geographically and demographically). We then examine a series of policy issues crowding the political agenda, including low wage rates; sub-prime lending practices; discrimination in hiring and promotion; enforcement of fair labor standards and treatment of low-skilled immigrants and migrant workers; inadequate access to quality education and health care; rehabilitating addicts, alcoholics, and ex-convicts; sexual abuse and broken families; and nutrition problems ranging from malnourishment to obesity. Throughout, the readings and lectures reveal that collaboration across the various disciplines enhances our understanding of what it means to be poor and of the array of interlocking problems that lead to poverty, and guides the formulation of policies to prevent and alleviate poverty.

PS 20000. Introduction to Poverty Studies

(3-0-3)

This course introduces students to academic research about the nature and consequences of poverty (in both advanced and developing nations), highlighting the contributions of scholars from the social sciences, humanities, and the law. We begin by examining several multifaceted definitions of poverty put forth by governments and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and by mapping the incidence of poverty (geographically and demographically). We then examine a series of policy issues crowding the political agenda, including low wage rates; sub-prime lending practices; discrimination in hiring and promotion; enforcement of fair labor standards and treatment of low-skilled immigrants and migrant workers; inadequate access to quality education and health care; rehabilitating addicts, alcoholics, and ex-convicts; sexual abuse and broken families; and nutrition problems ranging from malnourishment to obesity. Throughout, the readings and lectures reveal that collaboration across the various disciplines enhances our understanding of what it means to be poor and of the array of interlocking problems that lead to poverty, and guides the formulation of policies to prevent and alleviate poverty.

PS 30001. Experiential Learning: One-credit Bundle

(1-0-1) Beckman

This is a required course for students choosing to satisfy the experiential learning requirement by satisfactorily completing three designated 1-credit Center for Social Concerns Seminars. Students will complete a project or paper intended to show an integration of learning from the seminars and their relationship to a broader understanding of the poverty issues. Enrollment normally follows completion of the last 1-credit seminar.

PS 30002. Experiential Learning: Variable Graded Credit

(0-0-V) Beckman

Students choosing to satisfy the experiential learning requirement by satisfactorily completing three 1-credit semester-long internships (approximately 12 hours per semester) with community agencies and organizations serving the poor will receive credit for these experiences by enrolling in this course during each semester of the internship. After completing the final internship, students should enroll in PS30001 and complete a project or paper intended to reflect the integration of learning from the internships and their relationship to a broader understanding of the poverty issues. Similarly, students choosing to satisfy the experiential learning requirement by satisfactorily completing one approved 3-credit community-based learning or research course (not on the list of approved courses) should enroll in this course. The scholarly output agreed upon with the instructor/director of the course will satisfy the requirements of this course.

PS 40000. Capstone Seminar

(3-0-3) Beckman

The Capstone Seminar will be topic-oriented drawing on literature from multiple disciplines. The students themselves will be from different majors and will share both the perspectives of their major disciplines as well as their varied experiences in the field thus ensuring that interdisciplinary nature of the inquiry. Experts with diverse perspectives and professional experiences will join the seminar as special guests.

PS 40001. Special Studies Capstone

(0-0-3) Beckman

Special studies with one of the minor's affiliated faculty. In this case the student will produce a product (manuscript, work of art, composition, poster board display of research results, etc.) that can be displayed, and will present this product to the members of the PSIM at a special colloquium held in the spring semester of each academic year.

Department of Theology

THEO 10001. Foundations of Theology: Biblical/Historical

(3-0-3)

This first course in theology offers a critical study of the Bible and the early Catholic tradition. Following an introduction to the Old and New Testaments, students follow major post-biblical developments in Christian life and worship (e.g., liturgy, theology, doctrine, asceticism), emphasizing the first five centuries. For details on emphases of individual instructors, see the Department of Theology Course Description Booklet or the departmental website: nd.edu/~theo.

THEO 13183. Theology University Seminar

(3-0-3)

This first course in theology offers a critical study of the Bible and the early Catholic tradition. Following an introduction to the Old and New Testaments, students follow major post-biblical developments in Christian life and worship (e.g., liturgy, theology, doctrine, asceticism), emphasizing the first five centuries. For details on emphases of individual instructors, see the Department of Theology Course Description Booklet or the departmental website: nd.edu/~theo.

THEO 20001. Foundations of Theology: Biblical/Historical

(3-0-3)

This first course in theology offers a critical study of the Bible and the early Catholic tradition. Following an introduction to the Old and New Testaments, students follow major post-biblical developments in Christian life and worship (e.g., liturgy, theology, doctrine, asceticism), emphasizing the first five centuries. ### THEO 20002. Honors Foundations of Theology: Biblical/Historical

(3-0-3) Cunningham; Ernst; Kollman; Leyerle

Prerequisite: ALHN 13950

This first course in theology offers a critical study of the Bible and the early Catholic tradition. Following an introduction to the Old and New Testaments, students follow major post-biblical developments in Christian life and worship (e.g., liturgy, theology, doctrine, asceticism), emphasizing the first five centuries. For details on emphases of individual instructors, see the Department of Theology Course Description Booklet or the departmental website: nd.edu/~theo.

THEO 20101. Re-Membering Jesus

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course looks at the traditions about Jesus as they are reconfigured by the lives and hopes of succeeding generations of Christians. It will explore the images of Jesus in the gospels, questions about the Jesus who lies behind and inspires them (the “Quest for the Historical Jesus”), the process by which the Church came to explain and relate divinity and humanity in the person of Jesus, and contemporary re-appropriations of the meaning of Jesus in light of post-Holocaust, liberation, and feminist theologies. In addition to the gospels and texts from the early Church, and contemporary theological essays, students will review two or more novels and two or more films that re-member Jesus and bring him back alive into a new context.

THEO 20102. Gendering Christianity

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course is an introduction to feminist approaches to spiritual and philosophical traditions in the Christian West. Beginning from the pastoral and practical issues raised by gender assignments in the context of religious experience, it addresses major topics of theological thinking (such as sin, salvation, images of God, and Christology) relating historical development and contemporary feminist re-readings. The approach is both critical (i.e., analytical) and constructive; the primary focus is on Christian and post-Christian theological and literary texts, but some attention is given to other religious perspectives.

THEO 20103. The One Jesus and His Many Portraits: The Various Images of Jesus in the New Testament and Beyond

(3-0-3) Meier

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course explores the many different faith-portraits of Jesus painted by various books of the New Testament: e.g., from suffering servant abandoned by God through high priest interceding with God to Godself. In each case, the course will ask how this particular portrait did or did not have an impact on subsequent Christian faith and what it may say to faith in Christ today. The course will combine a lecture format with discussions, readings, and reflections on the readings.

THEO 20104. Apocalyptic Visions

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002)

At the heart of the Christian faith lies the conviction that the imminent end of God’s ongoing struggle with the powers of darkness in history has been revealed. This revelation shows us that we are all, wittingly or unwittingly, participants in a cosmic drama—a war between God and Satan, Christ and Antichrist, good and evil. This course explores apocalypticism in the biblical canon, as well as the interpretation and appropriation of this literature in the early, medieval, and modern periods of the history of Christianity. It begins and ends by reflecting on the prevalence of apocalypticism in the contemporary world. Throughout we will wrestle with the question of how we should reckon with this phenomenon today.

THEO 20106. Inspiration and Revelation

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002 OR THEO 13183

Christianity has at its core the idea that God is revealed to humanity. A concomitant of revelation is the notion of inspiration. Understandings of the concepts of both inspiration and revelation have informed the way Christians have understood their sacred text, the Bible. This course will examine the ideas of major Christian thinkers concerning the concepts of revelation and inspiration, highlighting particularly the role these concepts play in understanding Scripture and its relation to Christian tradition.

THEO 20107. Theology of the Psalms

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20002

Over the centuries, the Book of Psalms has played an important role in the prayer, spirituality, and liturgy of the Church. This course will explore the main theological themes and literary forms of the Psalms in relation to their historical and religious backgrounds, their history of interpretation and use in the life of the Church, and their contemporary significance for theological reflection, prayer, and worship.

THEO 20201. God

(3-0-3) Daley

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

The outstanding feature of human dignity, the Second Vatican Council reminds us, is that human beings have been called to communion with God. (Gaudium et Spes 19) In encountering the divine mystery through our experience in the world, especially through the teaching and worship of the Church, we are led to center our lives on faith in God, ultimate reality, and to find in that faith a meaning for human life, a cause to hope and an impulse to love. In this course, we will reflect on both the challenges and the blessings of this encounter with God as transcendent mystery, and on how our experience of God is formed by the Church preaching of the risen Jesus. Beginning with the Bible presentation of the mystery of God, we will read selections from Church Fathers, St. Anselm, St. Thomas Aquinas, 16th-century mystics, John Henry Newman, and several 20th-century authors; we will reflect on the modern phenomenon of atheism, and on what is actually involved in living faith in a living God.

THEO 20202. Why God Became Human

(3-0-3) Zachman

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course will investigate historically and systematically the central Christian confession that God became human in Jesus of Nazareth, especially in light of the death of Jesus on the cross. We will consider theologians from the patristic to modern eras, including Irenaeus, Athanasius, Anselm, Luther, Pascal, Barth, and von Balthasar. Course requirements will include four 6-page comparative papers and a longer constructive paper.

THEO 20203. Sin and Redemption

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course explores the biblical and theological accounts of sin and redemption. Focus will be on the variety of perspectives in the biblical and theological accounts with regard to the meaning of sin, its social and individual significance, and on the understanding of redemption, its worldly as well as other-worldly dimensions, and its scale, whether inclusive or relatively exclusive. An attempt will be made to distinguish the biblical and theological views from the views of other religions both past and present, and to engage modern criticism.

THEO 20205. Christian Hope: Confronting Last Things

(3-0-3) Daley

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

As individuals and as a world society, we tend to focus our energies on building a happy and secure future for ourselves; yet in a real sense we live surrounded by death, threatened by the impermanence of our relationships and by the fragility of life on our planet. A sense of this threat provides much of the background for human greed and violence, but it is also the context for human hope. The heart of Christian faith is to hope for life in the face of death; it is to see a lasting value in our historical choices and loves, because Jesus is risen and because he promises us a share in his resurrection and his life. Christian hope can only be expressed in images, since what it refers to still lies in the realm of promise; yet the Christian believer can live from that hope now, can love in the freedom it affords, because the Holy Spirit has been given us by the risen Lord as “a foretaste of things to come” (Eph. 1:14). Through faith enlivened by the Spirit, we find in our present reality signs of a life without end that is, in a mysterious way, already ours. This course will study the details of this Christian hope for the future in its origins, development, and implications. It will study “the last things”—death, judgment, purgation, heaven and hell—in both their individual and their social dimensions, as Christian theology has traditionally conceived them; and it will try to articulate an understanding of these objects of hope as they might best be integrated today into Christian thought and practice. In addition, it will consider the ways that a Christian sense of the finality of salvation colors and influences all the other aspects of the intelligent reflection on faith we call theology.

THEO 20206. U.S. Latino Spirituality

(3-0-3) Elizondo; Matovina

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

The purpose of this course is to introduce students to the dynamic origins, development and present status of the collective spirituality of the Latinos/as living in the United States. Emphasis will be placed on the Mexican Americans since they are not only the largest group but likewise the ones who have been living in the United States the longest. Drawing on history, cultural anthropology, Christian theology, and your own experience, this course will explore the roots and development of contemporary Latino Spirituality in the United States. As we explore in depth the spirituality of a people, this course will also help you discover and explore the roots and development of your own collective and personal spirituality.

THEO 20207. Veneration of the Saints, Especially the Mother of God, in the History of Christianity

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

Debated as to its origins and controversial among some early modern and contemporary Christians, the long and complex tradition of devotion to the saints still flourishes in Catholicism and Orthodoxy. This course considers the beginnings of devotion to the saints in ancient Christianity, the origins of the cult of the Virgin Mary, and local transnational devotions in ancient and medieval Christianity and Byzantium. Shrines, pilgrimages, and relics with their associated commerce will receive attention, as will the reaction against such devotion in the 16th-century West. The course will also examine selected modern scholarly examinations of sainthood and cults, as well as the contemporary ambivalence about traditional devotions (especially to the Mother of God), the relationship of devotion to the saint to the developing theological themes of the person of Christ and the church as communion of saints, and the appearance and canonization of new saints in Western and Eastern Christianity.

THEO 20208. Spirituality of the Christian East: Experience, Form, and Expression

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

“Christianity is more than a theory about the universe, more than teachings written down on paper; it is a path along which we journey—in the deepest and richest sense, the way of life” (Kallistos Ware). This course will introduce the student to the Christian East and will focus on its spirituality as the expression of this “journey,” this “way of life.” The different experiences, forms, and expressions of this spirituality will be examined and discussed during the course, having the writings of the fathers of the Christian East as a basis, a foundation, and a springboard for further reflection.

THEO 20210. Theology of the Cross

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

It is a central element of the Christian confession that in the death of Jesus of Nazareth, God has acted decisively in our favor. Jesus was not simply crucified—“he was crucified for us” (Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed). While it is scarcely doubted that this event is central to our salvation, theologians from the authors of the New Testament through today have understood in various ways how this is so. In this course, we will examine a selection of the most significant of these interpretations of the Cross.

THEO 20213. Following Jesus

(3-0-3) Daley

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

Hearing Jesus’ Gospel of the coming Kingdom of God, and receiving it as a word of truth and new life, has meant, since the time of Jesus, not simply accepting a new way of understanding the world, but taking on a new pattern of living, “costing not less than everything.” This course will consider how the Christian tradition, since the time of the Gospels, has understood the person and work of Jesus, and will consider the impact this faith in him and in his message have had, and continues to have, on the way his disciples live in the world.

THEO 20214. Latino Theology and Christian Tradition

(3-0-3) Matovina

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course examines the emergence and development of Latino religion and theology in the United States. In particular, the course will explore how U.S. Latina and Latino theologians have articulated the meaning and implications for Christian living of core theological topics such as Christology, evangelization, social justice, and liturgy.

THEO 20215. Original Sin

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

The doctrine of Original Sin has been elaborated in Christian theology as a way of understanding the human experience of alienation from oneself and God: "For I do not do the good that I want, but the evil I do not want is what I do," wrote Paul in his letter to the Romans. But more than just an explanation of why it's hard to be good, original sin has been a metaphor central to Christian thinking on ultimate questions: Why did God become human? What is human nature? How are we saved, and from what? Why do the innocent suffer? This course will examine the biblical and extra-biblical sources of original sin, the elaboration of the concept, and its reception in the Christian West through the Reformation. Because this topic touches on issues of sexuality, embodiment, and gender, as well as the nature and causes of human suffering, we will spend the latter part of the course examining modern perspectives on original sin, especially among liberation and feminist theologians.

THEO 20216. Elements of Christian Doctrine

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course will offer a theological synthesis of basic Christian doctrine, using the articles of the Creed as the organizing principle. Readings will be drawn from a large variety of primary sources from the tradition, as well as from contemporary theologians and the first two sections ("pillars") of the Catechism of the Catholic Church. This course is for those who desire an overall acquaintance with the fundamental points of what the Church believes, confesses, and teaches, offered in a style which demonstrates the situation and context of these basic doctrines within theological conversation and debate.

THEO 20217. Christian Theology in the Middle East: Origins to the Present

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

The spread of Christianity from Jerusalem to Asia Minor and Europe, and the development of Christian doctrine that followed upon it, is well documented and well known. Less well known is the movement of Christianity east of Jerusalem, and the developments of Christian doctrine that attended this movement. This course will investigate the development of Christianity and Christian doctrine in the Middle East and Central Asia. This will involve consideration of the central doctrines of the Christian faith (especially the doctrines of Christ, the Church, and the sacraments) from the time they were articulated in the period of the first seven ecumenical councils, to their development, in both continuity and contrast, in the churches of the East. Students will acquire a sense of the largely untold story of the origins and history of Christianity in the Middle East (a topic especially timely today), as well as a grasp of the fundamental Christian doctrines at stake in this history and still at stake in the present as they bear on the issue of the reunification of the churches. Readings will include documents from the councils, from relevant theologians, from local history, native accounts, as well as archaeological evidence.

THEO 20218. Christianity and the Political Order

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

What is the relationship between Christianity and political orders? How do particular understandings of the role of the political order from a Christian perspective bear on the way in which the obligations of citizenship are understood and carried out? Does Christianity necessitate or support an endorsement or rejection of any specific political structures? When Christians participate in the political realm, does this participation have any salvific significance? What sort of participation, if any, is required by Christian faith, and to what extent should the form of participation vary depending upon the particular regimes in which we find ourselves? This course aims to address these and related questions. The first section of the course will focus on key historical moments in the development of Christian reflection on these topics. Theologians treated will include selections from the early church fathers, Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, Calvin, and selections from Radical Reformation writers. The second section of the course will put these resources from the Christian tradition in conversation with modern and contemporary authors. The goal of the course is twofold: (1) for students to know and to understand the thought of key figures in the Christian tradition with regard to these questions, and (2) for students to develop the critical skills necessary to think about the relationship between their faith and their obligations as citizens of a contemporary liberal democracy. Requirements for the course will include midterm, final, and several short essays.

THEO 20221. In One Body Through the Cross

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

How has historic Christianity understood the relationship between membership in the church and Christian unity? And how have Christians in the West understood the unity of the church and her sacraments in the wake of 16th-century divisions, schisms, and the like? In what relevant sense, for instance, is the church "one," as confessed in the Nicene Creed? This course examines Scripture and the history of Christian thought on the matter of the church as a baptismal and Eucharistic community. Special emphasis is placed on the achievements of the ecumenical movement in the 20th century, and on contemporary proposals and problems related to Christian unity and difference, communion, and forgiveness, particularly between and among Roman Catholic and mainline Protestant and other Reformation traditions.

THEO 20222. Sin and Redemption: Latin Perspective

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course will survey the topic of sin and redemption as it evolved from the Scriptures and early Church, through today with special focus on its development in Latin America (especially Mexico). In addition to the New Testament, the first half of the course will consider authors such as Irenaeus, Athanasius, Augustine, Anselm, Abelard, and Luther. For Spain we will explore how the encounter of the religious world of Spain and pre-Colombian America gave birth to the conception of sin and redemption, expressed in today's Latin American theology, especially through popular religiosity, liberation theology and Episcopal documents like those of the Latin American Episcopal Conferences at Medellin and Puebla.

THEO 20223. The Church We Believe In

(3-0-3) Gorski

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

From the New Testament on, the Christian community has turned repeatedly to the formulation and description of its identity, essence, and constitutional elements. Specifying what is entailed in the claim of the creed—"I believe in the one, holy and catholic church"—has been especially necessary at certain crucial moments in the history of the Christian movement. Providing an introduction to the main themes and problems in ecclesiology (the doctrine about the church), this course will examine the teachings of leading theologians in the patristic and medieval period (e.g., Augustine, Aquinas, and Luther) and the determinations of the last two Vatican councils, largely concerned with such ecclesiological matters as the constitution of the church, the role of the papacy, infallibility, and the universal versus local churches.

THEO 20224. Christ and the Church in the Christian Tradition
(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course offers students the opportunity to explore and reflect upon the relationship between Christ and the Church. The course readings, taken from Scripture, various Christian authors from different theological traditions, and recent official teachings of the Catholic Church, will allow students not only to understand historical developments in the conceptualization of this relationship, but also to learn how contemporary questions and interests shape current reflections on this topic.

THEO 20225. The Mystery of Christ

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

Affirmation that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God stands at the center of the Christian faith, but what does this mean? A Christology, critical theological reflection on Jesus of Nazareth, attempts to offer a systematic account of Jesus Christ's identity and import. This course will introduce students to Christology, examining theologians representative of diverse historical periods and theological approaches. This chronological order will frame our focus on select Christological topics. The concern throughout will be how Christology seeks to better appreciate the mystery of Jesus Christ.

THEO 20226. Sin and the Incarnation

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

In this course, we will examine how Christians understand Jesus to be the savior. In what manner did he offer salvation and from what? We will first examine in some depth how leading voices in the NT understand Jesus' role in salvation, particularly against the backdrop of the OT. From what was Jesus saving people and how did his healing ministry, his teachings, his death on the cross, the resurrection, and his status as exalted Lord address this problem? Next, we will consider what theologians representative of discrete theological traditions have to say about our topic (Orthodox, Protestant, Roman Catholic). Finally, we will examine two contested issues: the redefinition of sin (and thus salvation) in liberation Christology and the claim that Jesus is a savior, and not the Savior.

THEO 20227. Pilgrimage

(3-0-3) Leyerle

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

This course will examine the literary record and lived experience of pilgrimage throughout Christian history by focusing on particular texts, persons, and sites. To enrich our understanding of this phenomenon, we will deliberately adopt a variety of perspectives (archeological, sociological, anthropological, liturgical, and art historical). We will necessarily also consider relics and the cult of the saints.

THEO 20229. Christianity and Mission

(3-0-3) Kollman

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

The coming of Christianity to most of the world has overlapped with the political, economic, and social processes associated with the term colonialism. This course will seek to understand the history of that overlap, as well as the many theological issues raised, especially for Christians in Latin America, Asia, and Africa. Questions to be considered include: How has political domination, typified (though certainly not exhausted) by European colonialism, shaped Christian mission? What kinds of theological innovations emerged in the relation to colonialism, both among the colonizers and the colonized? How did colonialism create a context in which Christianity encountered other religious traditions? How does contemporary theology reflect a colonial legacy in this current apparently "post-colonial" moment? How do contemporary global political dynamics, sometimes described with reference to the notion of globalization, compare and contrast with the overt colonialisms of the past? How do contemporary theologians respond to the colonial legacy? Is there such a thing as "post-colonial" theology? Should there be such a thing? Students will write three 5-page papers, and there will be a final exam.

THEO 20230. World Religions in Christian Perspective

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20002

The course examines the foundations of several world religious traditions (e.g., Buddhism, Taoism, Hinduism). Focusing on key religious ideas and practices, it compares and contrasts them with one another and in relation to the Christian design for life worked out in Catholic experience and theological reflection. Students will acquire a sense of what it means to reflect in a disciplined way on world religions from a Christian theological perspective.

THEO 20231. From the Crucifixion to the Atonement

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

It is a central element of the Christian confession that in the passion and death of Jesus of Nazareth God has acted decisively in humanity's favor. In this course, we will investigate this confession. There are three questions we will attempt to answer. First, how is it that the earliest Christians came to see in Jesus' crucifixion, this act of Roman capital punishment, the decisive moment in God's plan of salvation? To help us answer this (hardly straightforward) question, we will also attend to how other religious groups (esp. Gnostics and Muslims) offered alternative interpretations of Jesus' crucifixion that this event is saving has, in fact, been seriously doubted. Second, what are the various ways in which theologians, from the authors of the New Testament through today, have comprehended the saving significance of Jesus' cross, and what are the respective strengths and weaknesses of these theories? And finally, we will enter into two of the major debates surrounding our topic: How do people receive the salvation offered on the cross, and, whether, or to what extent, do the classic Christian accounts of atonement promote violence in our society? Along the way in our readings, we will encounter theologians and literary figures that represent discrete theological traditions (Orthodox, Protestant, Roman Catholic).

THEO 20232. On Conversion

(3-0-3) Daley

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

For all believing people, faith is a journey: a lifelong movement of growth in understanding of the divine mystery in whose presence we live, and of commitment to serving God. Christian faith begins in Jesus' call to each person to follow him as a disciple; and while the general shape of that journey of companionship is modeled in the Gospels, it takes on very different concrete features in each particular life. In this course, we will reflect on the theological importance of conversion and spiritual growth for the life of faith, and will consider the stories of several well-known Christians (Augustine of Hippo, Francis of Assisi, Ignatius of Loyola, John Woolman, Dorothy Day, C.S. Lewis) that reveal the long-term implications of conversion to faith. We will also reflect on loss of faith as a kind of anti-conversion peculiar to modern culture.

THEO 20233. Called to Holiness: Sanctification in the Christian Tradition

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

Be holy, as I am holy: God calls human persons, created in the divine image but damaged by sin, to become holy and so to share in the happiness of God's own life. What is holiness, and how does God call and sanctify human beings? What kind of personal transformation is required? And, how have Christians over the ages responded to God's call? This course will explore the Church's understanding of sanctification in its varied expressions from Scripture through patristic, medieval, and Reformation periods, to Vatican II and the writings of Popes John Paul II and Benedict XVI. Ways in which Christians have lived out the call to holiness will be examined (e.g., martyrdom, monasticism, ministry), while sanctification itself will be considered in relation to central aspects of Christian doctrine: the Trinity, Christ and his sacraments, theological anthropology, grace and justification, ecclesiology, and eschatology. Students may choose a service-learning component with weekly written assignments in partial fulfillment of course requirements, with a view to integrating the course material into their own experience of God's call to sanctification.

THEO 20235. The Afterlife and the End of the World

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002 OR THEO 13183

We mortals lack experience but seek knowledge of what lies beyond this life and this world. What will happen? When will it happen? What does it demand for the present? In the history of religions and within the Judeo-Christian tradition many answers have been given in many circumstances on many authorities. Tradition provides a broad framework within which claims compete, leaving each thinking recipient to form a hope for the future and a "bird's-eye" view of the present. This course focuses on reading primary texts (in translation) from the ancient world and up through contemporary theology and culture. We will read each text in historical context with a view to significance for today.

THEO 20236. Mary Through the Ages

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002 OR THEO 13183)

A study of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, as her figure and role in the history of salvation emerge in Scripture and the tradition of the Church. An examination of the Church's understanding of Mary as expressed in sacred and historical text, theological reflection, liturgical expression, iconographic representation, magisterial pronouncement, and the life of devotion. The course will also consider the relationship of Mariology to other branches of theology, such as protology, Christology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology, as well as the impact of the cultus of the Virgin Mary on Western art, music, and literature.

THEO 20237. The Art of Suffering

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002 OR THEO 13183)

In this course, we will explore in some depth how the Christian faith interprets suffering. Why did Jesus suffer? Did (or does) God suffer as well? And why are Jesus' followers enjoined to cultivate the art of suffering as they wrestle with forgiving their enemies and rooting out their own sins? We will read central biblical narratives, hear representative voices from the history of Christian theology, and have the opportunity to pursue service learning in the community.

THEO 20238. Holy Journeys: The History and Theology of Christian Pilgrimage

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 180G OR THEO 100

"We walk by faith and not sight." From biblical texts such as Abraham's migration, the Exodus and the "Road to Emmaus," all the way up to Vatican II's "pilgrim church" Christians have long viewed life as a journey this motif has compelled many faithful throughout the centuries to undertake actual voyages/pilgrimages which are seen as effective means to express devotion, do penance, grow in virtue and walk in the footsteps of Christ himself. This class will use pilgrimage as a lens through which to examine not only Christian history, but also theological topics including Christology, eschatology, popular piety, interreligious relations, and ecclesiology. We will begin the study of key biblical narratives that are foundational to latter Christian notions of pilgrimage and then consider ways in which famous and not-so-famous pilgrims throughout time have viewed their personal pilgrimages as acts of faith.

THEO 20239. Encounters with the Sacred Word: The Bible in the Liturgy

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (THEO 1000) OR (THEO 13183) OR (THEO 20001) OR (THEO 20002)

If theology rests on the written Word of God (Dei Verbum 24), for Christians the primary site of encounter with the Sacred Word is not in the library, but in the worshipping Church. That is to say that in an important way Christian theology, and indeed tradition is founded upon the event of proclaiming and hearing the Scriptures in the context of worship. In this course, we shall explore the theology and practice of the use of the Sacred Scriptures in Roman Catholic liturgy, by studying the historical roots (including patristic and medieval) of the practice known in contemporary liturgy. As with any human event, a number of simple questions may be posed of this encounter. What do we need in order to read the sacred Scriptures in Church? How do we read them? In what way is time of significance for the reading and the hearing of the sacred Word? Who is competent to read and to hear? Where is the Word to be read? And throughout the course we shall ask: what is the theological significance of this practice? The study of typology, the material culture of the sacred text, liturgical lectionaries and rubrics, homiletic practice, and sacramental theologies of the Word will lend us skills in answering these questions.

THEO 20241. The Orthodox Churches: Historical Development and Religious Traditions

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

A survey of the history and particular theological views and religious customs among churches from the Near East to Eastern Europe, from late antiquity to the present. Attention will be given to the forms of worship and community life (e.g. monasticism, iconology, festivals and saints' cults) as well as theological controversies dividing the orthodox churches from the churches of the West. Catholic churches of the Eastern Rites will be described. Primary texts will be featured. The class will attend at least one orthodox liturgy during the semester.

THEO 20242. Heaven, Hell, and Purgatory

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: (THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002)

If there is a life after death for human beings, what is it like? How does a person get there?—reach one of the eternal destinations envisioned as punishments for our sins or reward for good deeds? Are they states of being, or actual places? If the latter, what do they look like, and who are the inhabitants? Early Judaism and two millennia of Christian tradition have developed a variety of sources to elaborate an answer to these questions. This course will consider how the tradition has proposed answers, and will look at various ways in which the answer has been elaborated. Materials for the course will draw from accounts of visionaries and mystics who ascended to heaven (or descended to hell) and reported what they saw, theologians who attempted to give comprehensive and consistent accounts of the paths to these places (or states), and Christian poets who metaphorically evoked heaven and hell to express the consequences of contemporary social or political conditions. The course will consider the development, primarily in Roman Catholicism, of the belief in doctrine of purgatory and the debates about that belief. The contemporary reconsideration of heaven, hell, and purgatory, and the embarrassment about hell will conclude the course.

THEO 20244. Monastic Way in History of Christianity

(3-0-3) Young

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

In the history of the Eastern and Western churches, male and female monastics have composed a long and elaborate tradition of their collective life based on the imitation of Christ. A selection of the written sources attesting to the variety of the forms of monastic life and prayer, and theology and mysticism will form the syllabus for this class. It will explore the modes of life of the solitary monastic as well as those of monastic communities, from earliest Christianity through the present, by reading works from and about this form of life. It will discuss, among other themes, those of discipline, the meaning of the body and its labor, penance, suffering, humility, study and learning, the love of human beings, the love of God, union with God and participation in the life of God within the limits that the monastic life imposes.

THEO 20245. Mary in the Catholic Tradition

(3-0-3) Roy

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

A study of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, as her figure and role in the history of salvation emerge in Scripture and the Tradition of the Church. An examination of the Church's understanding of Mary as expressed in sacred and historical text, theological reflection, liturgical expression, iconographic representation, magisterial pronouncement, and the life of devotion. The course will also consider the relationship of Mariology to other branches of theology, such as protology, Christology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology, as well as the impact of the cultus of the Virgin Mary on Western art, music, and literature.

THEO 20246. From Bernard to Bernadette: The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception

(3-0-3) Astell

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

On Feb. 11, 2008, the Church observed the 150th anniversary of the apparition of our Lady in Lourdes, France. To Saint Bernadette, the "beautiful lady" declared, "I am the Immaculate Conception," thus confirming the dogma promulgated shortly before by Pope Pius IX in 1854. This Marian dogma deserves serious study from multiple perspectives: its historical development as a contested belief, its relation to other dogmas (Original Sin, the Virgin Birth, Redemption, the Assumption), its liturgical expressions, its crucial link to the understanding of Christian marriage as a sacrament, its representations in visual art and poetry, its special significance for women, and its general importance to Christian anthropology, as well as its particular connection to Lourdes. The syllabus will include readings from all these perspectives, film sessions, and a class trip to the Lourdes grotto on Notre Dame's campus.

THEO 20401. Church and Worship

(3-0-3) Driscoll

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

An analysis of the church as a community of believers and a social institution, and a study of church liturgy and sacraments. This course will center around three key areas, namely (1) Anthropology: As humans, why do we feel the need to express ourselves and our relationship to God through ritual activity? (2) Theology: What are the Christological and ecclesiological underpinnings for the sacraments? (3) History: What is the historical development of each of the seven sacraments? What has remained constant in spite of the historical mutations?

THEO 20402. Theology and the Arts

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002

Christian faith is expressed and shaped by a variety of media: the narratives of sacred scripture, the propositions of ecumenical councils, the moral witness of saints, etc. This course will explore how musical, visual, and literary arts have mediated Christian faith in a variety of cultural contexts. From theological perspectives we will explore and analyze musical compositions such as the "Odes of Solomon," Ambrosian hymns, and J.S. Bach's Magnificat," visual arts such as catacomb wall-paintings, icons, and the Sistine Chapel ceiling; and literary arts such as The Dream of the Rood" G.M. Hopkins's poetry, and the short stories of Andre Dubus.

THEO 20403. Sacraments of Vocation

(3-0-3)

Prerequisite: THEO 10001 OR THEO 13183 OR THEO 20001 OR THEO 20002
